Whether they were conscious of it or not, the American reformers of Judaism were reflecting and building on the influence of Spinoza and Kant, adjusting the relationship between reason and faith, and confirming that the total body of Yahwism was continuing to evolve. The total body of Yahwism was in fact involved in the processes of progressive revelation as well as evolution in theological understanding, regardless of whether opponents of the concept such as Isaac Mayer Wise or equally prominent theological figures in each of the other streams accepted it or not.¹³³ The evolution in understanding could not be and was not restricted to any one stream – Christianity, Islam or Judaism – and interaction between them and within any one stream must inevitably provide a stimulus for thinking within each of the other messianic faiths which were at the same time partners and competitors in a dynamic triangle. However, because by its nature no process of evolution can ever reach a fixed and final position, the reformers could no more reach agreement on everything than did the reformers of Christianity. Similarly, while people holding long-established views, calling themselves Orthodox, Traditionalists or Conservatives, or adopting any other label, may find it easier to reach consensus on the issues which separate them from their reforming colleagues, there will always be some degree of dissent among them. In order that their current teaching or understanding may be sustained as the dominant corporate position they may accept compromise and avoid debate on contentious issues by simply deferring debate or by 'sweeping them under the carpet', until they assume a position of greater perceived importance and debate can no longer be avoided. So it was in this case and dissent continued on both sides of the Jewish theological divide.

Further rabbinical conferences were held in New York and Cincinnati in 1870 and 1871 but because of the nature of dissent each was convened on a different basis and with different attendance from the one before it. However they were followed by a convention of congregations in Cincinnati in July 1873 and on that occasion a national body, representative of 34 congregations of both Reform and Traditionalist persuasion in thirteen states, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), was finally established. In 1875 it established, in somewhat straitened circumstances, the first rabbinical seminary in the United States, the Hebrew Union College, which later attained a position of influence and prestige. Then in 1878 the UAHC and the Board of Delegates (set up in 1859 in response to the Mortara affair) merged and the Board became a standing committee of the Union. By about that time the Union was able to report that it represented more than half of the Jewish congregations in the United States, but the strains of embracing groups of highly diverse theological outlook had already begun to show and in 1883 a split occurred in its membership. The Conservatives withdrew and established their own structures in due course and the Reform group was left in firm control of the Union.¹³⁴

No longer constrained within an organization which sought to cater for a very wide range of views, a number of reformers then embraced some much more radical ideas which Meyer says "tested the outer limits of Jewish identity" and required them to explain in what way they differed from Unitarian Christianity or the Ethical Culture Movement. Social justice became a major concern of the Reform Movement with education directed increasingly to Jewish ethics rather than customs and ceremonies and its 1885 Pittsburgh Platform became a defining (or dividing) gulf between Reform on one side and Conservatism and Orthodoxy on the other. Nine years earlier Felix Adler, the son of a New York rabbi and former student of both the liberal seminary in Berlin and Rabbi Abraham Geiger, had established the New York Society for Ethical Culture, saying that he could not accept gradual religious evolution or the 'half-way house' proposals of the Reform Movement. He rejected the idea that Israel was chosen by a theistic God to remain separated from the rest of the world for the purposes of a priestly mission, and he queried whether, if the aim of religion was a universal moral world, it may be better to draw from the tenets of many religious traditions. His ideas were so radical and the public attention which his society attracted was so great that it was decided to convene a conference in Pittsburgh to clearly define the beliefs of the Reform Movement¹³⁵

THE PITTSBURGH PLATFORM

Written in a different form to previous statements, the eight-point Pittsburgh Platform is the most precise statement of beliefs which had been prepared up to that time and its quiet tone of confidence reflects the growth and the maturing of the Reform Movement in the United States which had built on the work of the Jewish reformers in Germany. Firmly non-Zionist or even anti-Zionist, it set the tone for American Jewish responses to the Zionist ground swell which was becoming evident in Europe as a consequence of the growing mood of anti-Semitism being generated by the churches and it therefore set the scene for a confrontation with the Zionist Movement only twelve years later. As we shall see, the Reform Movement retained its attitude to that major and divisive issue until the mid-1930s when Nazi pressure and the abject failure of the churches to recognize the parody of Mein Kampf led to a weakening of resolve, acceptance of Zionism and, ultimately, support for the establishment of the State of Israel. But that was very much a matter for the future when a group of fifteen rabbis set about drafting “the pivotal document for American reform Judaism”¹³⁶. The Pittsburgh Platform not only clearly defined the position of Reform Judaism in relation to Zionism, it also broke completely new ground in defining the relationship between Yahwism and other world religions in a manner which no responsible authority for any of the partners in the triangle had previously been prepared to consider.

Writing “as representatives of Reform Judaism in America” the authors said, in the opening clause, “We recognize in every religion an attempt to grasp the Infinite One, and in every mode, source or book of revelation held sacred in any religious system the consciousness of the indwelling of God in man.” Then, maintaining their belief in the pre-eminence of Judaism, they said, “... Judaism presents the highest conception of the God-idea as taught in our holy Scriptures and developed and spiritualized by the Jewish teachers in accordance with the moral and philosophical progress of their respective ages.” Judaism, they said, also preserved and defended “this God-idea” as the central religious truth for the human race amid continual struggles and trials and under enforced isolation. They could have added “and systematic oppression.”¹³⁷

Concerning the Bible and science, they said “We recognize in the Bible the record of the consecration of the Jewish people to its mission as priest of the One God, and value it as the most potent instrument of religious and moral instruction. We hold that the modern discoveries of scientific researches in the domains of nature and history are not antagonistic to the doctrines of Judaism, the Bible reflecting the primitive ideas of its own age and at times clothing its conceptions of divine providence and justice dealing with man in miraculous narratives.” Such clear, realistic statements were in sharp contrast with the convoluted and dogmatic defences which the churches had to mount to justify the Second (Baptist) Confession, the Westminster

Confession, the inerrancy of the Bible in the light of Darwin's theories of evolution which had been the centre of controversy for the past generation, and the Vatican's pathetic 'justification' of its doctrine of papal infallibility only fifteen years before. The whole of the Mosaic law, they said, was "a system for training the Jewish people for its mission during its (earlier) national life in Palestine", but they accepted as binding the moral laws and ceremonies which elevate or sanctify people, while those which are not adapted to modern civilization were rejected. In particular the Mosaic and rabbinical laws regulating diet, priestly conduct and dress were rejected as "altogether foreign to our present mental and spiritual state" and as obstructing rather than assisting modern spiritual elevation.

THE HAND OF FELLOWSHIP IN MISSION

The clauses concerning messianism, relations within the triangle, and other faiths reflected the social and political environment in which the American reformers were working, almost free of organized anti-Semitism, victimization and oppression. "We recognize in the modern era of universal culture of heart and intellect the approach of the realization of Israel's great Messianic hope for the establishment of the kingdom of truth, justice and peace among men. We consider ourselves no longer a nation but a religious community, and therefore expect neither a return to Palestine, nor a sacrificial worship under the administration of the sons of Aaron, nor the restoration of any of the laws concerning the Jewish state." These words carry the clear implication that those who currently occupied the land were entitled to it and that therefore any act to return to it and to establish a state of Israel would be an act of transgression against those people. Then, the authors said, Judaism is "a progressive religion, ever striving to be in accord with ... reason" and it is of the utmost necessity that its historical identity with its great past should be preserved. "Christianity and Islam being daughter religions of Judaism, we appreciate their mission to aid in the spreading of monotheistic and moral truth, ... we acknowledge that the spirit of broad humanity of our age is our ally in the fulfillment of our mission, and ... we extend the hand of fellowship to all who cooperate with us in the establishment of the reign of truth and righteousness among men."

The clause dealing with immortality of the soul in the Philadelphia statement was reinforced, 'reasserting' the doctrine that the human spirit is divine and finds bliss in righteousness and misery in wickedness, and that the soul of man is immortal. But the concepts of bodily resurrection and heaven and hell are rejected as non-Judaic. Then, finally, the statement on the Mosaic law is qualified with social justice raised to the level of an article of faith. Mosaic law strives to regulate the relation between rich and poor, and Jews must work at "the great task of modern times, to solve on the basis of justice and righteousness the problems presented by the contrasts and evils of the present organization of society."

The adoption of the Pittsburgh Platform proved very divisive. The radical reformers and many of moderate persuasion welcomed it, a Southern Rabbinical Conference and many individual synagogues endorsed it, but Conservatives, of whom many had been supporters of the UAHC and the Hebrew Union College, denounced it. The result was that some members withdrew from both bodies, the Conservatives proceeded to formally develop their own organizations, and the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York was opened only two years later. The Jewish community had finally lost the struggle to remain more or less united and had suffered the fate of the Christians as a result of their Reformation: denominationalism. But a very significant body of people within world Jewry had accepted – with enthusiasm and with a reasonable knowledge of what that acceptance meant – a statement that they did not expect, nor look for, a return to Palestine. They had set themselves to resist the Zionist ground swell which was already apparent in both Europe and America.¹³⁸

THE BAHÁ'Í MOVEMENT: A SHARED IDEAL

The Pittsburgh Platform, although it led to division among the reformers, is a quite remarkable document and places Reform Judaism ahead of any group except the Baha'is in the recognition of other faiths. The Baha'i Movement was only founded in 1860. It was based on the teaching of the Bab, (Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi), a religious, social and economic reformer from the Shi'ite Muslim stream who taught for only six years and was executed by the Iranian rulers in 1850 for challenging the status of Muhammad as the final seal of the prophets, and his nominated successor, Baha'u'llah, (Mirza Husayn Ali Nuri), who spent much of his life in prison-exile in Palestine which was then a part of the Ottoman Empire. Baha'u'llah died in 1892, so in 1885, at the time of the Pittsburgh Conference, the Baha'i movement was still embryonic, little known outside the Middle East, and no serious attempt at expansion or proselytizing was made until after 1908 when Baha'u'llah's son was released from prison and visited Europe and the United States. It is therefore highly unlikely that a knowledge of the principles of the Baha'i faith could have influenced the group of rabbis in Pittsburgh, and the development of their thinking and that of the Baha'is must be seen as quite independent of each other. Baha'i expansion in other regions of the world began only after World War II. Its basic principles include: that God the Creator is one, an entity that cannot be known in Himself, but only through various manifestations including the persons and revelations of Abraham, Moses, Zoroaster, the Buddha, Jesus Christ, Muhammad, the Bab and Baha'u'llah; the unification of mankind is inevitable through the unity of all religions and the harmony of all people, and the purpose of human life is to know and to worship God; religious truth is to be sought through reason and faith, and there is an essential harmony between scientific discoveries and faith which are not incompatible; and religious truth is also to be sought through the study of the sacred writings of each religion.¹³⁹

In the meantime the first conference of a group led by Leon Pinsker, Hovevei Zion, (Lovers of Zion), had been held in Kattowitz, Germany, just a year before Pittsburgh, in 1884, with 22 delegates from Russia and 10 from other countries. They had agreed to raise funds to set up agricultural settlements in Palestine and published an appeal for people to join the scheme., playing down the concept of national renaissance and eventual political independence in order to avoid antagonizing potential financial supporters in Western Europe. When the next conference was held in 1887 an unsuccessful bid was made to convert it into a religious movement but a board was elected which would ensure that its programs were carried out in traditional Jewish spirit.¹⁴⁰

A few years later, in 1889, a Central Conference of American Rabbis, (CCAR), was established, with Rabbi Wise as president, basically as a reform oriented body which would meet annually in order to maintain the momentum of reform initiatives.^{141 142} However it proved impossible to maintain the momentum for reasons well beyond the reformers' control and the peak of reform influence appeared to have passed. The flood of refugees from Russia after the government tightened its anti-Jewish legislation and encouraged a stream of pogroms, swamped the relatively small numbers coming from Germany, the seat of reform, and the needs, customs and demands of the newcomers assumed top priority. By the turn of the century the Jewish population in the United States had ballooned to more than one million, but only about ten percent of the 1,700 synagogues built to serve their needs were affiliated with the UAHC. Zionism had become a formidable barrier separating the Americanized German Reform Jews from many of those from Eastern Europe and Russia. In Meyer's words: "To Reform Jews, Zionism was a counsel of defeat, a surrender to the forces of anti-Semitism rather than the valiant fight to defeat them. It was retreat substituted for advance, a fantastic nightmare for the beautiful American dream."¹⁴³

HERZL BEGINS TO PLAN

It was therefore clear to Theodore Herzl as he pondered alternative solutions to the crisis of anti-Semitism in Europe in 1895 that there would be enormous opposition within the world wide Jewish community to large scale re-settlement proposals but to dismantle the policies of the Christian block required goodwill and understanding from the churches of such substance that it was not an achievable option. Similarly, to counter the policies of the Christian block by the use of force would involve reliance on a powerful ally of one sort or another, (a political, economic or military alliance), which was neither achievable nor an aspect of Jewish philosophy, (regardless of the claims of those who later concocted and distributed the Protocols of Zion). This left only one option: to circumvent the policies of the Christian block somehow. The next question was "how?"

Jewish leaders everywhere were casting around for answers to that, and the twin concepts of Jewish religion and Jewish race kept getting in the way of each other. One could not be tackled without raising conflicts because of the other. Anti-Semitism involved both and therefore the solution had to take account of both. Of all the options available, several had been, or were being, seriously canvassed quite openly by writers and among community leadership groups.

One was to cling to traditional Judaism and await the intervention of the Messiah in a personal sense. But this would mean total subjection to the Christian block, complete withdrawal from business, professional, political and employment competition and abject acceptance of permanent, depressing second-class citizen status. It would satisfy the Christian ego kick but it would aggravate and perpetuate the myth about racial inferiority. In an era of frenzied misinterpretation of Malthus and Darwin that was simply asking to be eliminated. In addition it would be a total rejection of the concept of equality in human rights and if Europe's superior Christians could get away with that, then no minority group anywhere would be safe.

Another, but clearly unattractive alternative, was to drop Judaism altogether. Impossible! The Christian church triumphant had canonized not only Jewish law but Jewish history as well in its Old Testament which it insisted was inerrant. Judaism just couldn't be buried, quite apart from the indelible commitment to it by Jews both in Europe and beyond. And if it could? Rome would press on without inhibition towards its City of God because Jerusalem would be no more than an historic city out in a desert of nomads.

In that case why not retain Judaism and Jewish identity and return to some new form of ghetto? A semi-autonomous state within a state, for example? No point. It would not eliminate either of the religious or racial components in the crisis. Neither would the Jewish community regain the degree of security it had previously enjoyed from its semi-isolation because the whole environment had changed so much. But even more important was the fear that accusations of a conflict of interest would become louder, and with some justification, if the minority Jewish community set up a series of enclaves with efficient, integrated community services within majority Christian populations. They would probably become mini-states within states and would certainly have links across foreign borders. Conflict of interest would thus be proven like that of a multi-national corporation and all hell would let loose. Then, quite apart from considerations of security and happiness for the Jewish people, there was their deeply held belief in personal responsibility to the whole community which was written into the Torah and which was not a peculiarly Christian thing.

The implications of this ran deep. Jews were, in the 1890s, involved in leadership and service roles in every community of which they were part. The Christian community would be the poorer without the contributions of its Mortaras, Disraelis, Montefiores, Rothschilds and Marxes. [Nothing would prove this more eloquently than the bequest of the Swedish chemist Alfred Nobel who was distressed at the consequences when one of his inventions, dynamite, became a plaything in the hands of Europe's powers. Of 313 Nobel Prizes awarded from 1901 to 1959 some forty, or twelve percent, were awarded to Jews.] A return to the ghetto was neither practical nor acceptable.

Well, there was always Marrano-style baptism to satisfy a certain class of sacramental fanatics. It would also circumvent legal restrictions on people of Jewish faith while helping to retain Jewish identity and culture. No. That would not work either. It would only compound the race question with overtones of moral cowardice and the fate of the Marranos was well known. There were a few people who, like Disraeli, made the move successfully but the personal tensions were always high. The majority of Jews still held to the belief that baptism was only tolerable if a life were endangered by refusal to submit. But papal pronouncements since the Vatican Council had given further cause for concern for the safety of Jews. There was Leo XII's directions that the teachings of Thomas Aquinas should be the basis of the theology of the Catholic Church. He had issued that in 1879 during negotiations with Bismarck, Stocker and their colleagues for a new concordat. Then came his proclamation of Aquinas as the patron saint of Catholic education the very next year, just as Bismarck obligingly began to dismantle Germany's Kulturkampf and as the French Government, in contrast, disbanded its seventy four Jesuit schools. It was some of Aquinas' commissioned works which had provided the basis for the Inquisition in response to the embarrassing genius of Maimonides.

CONSTANT RESETTLEMENT, OR A NATIONAL HOME?

The situation was grim and a solution had to be found. Perhaps it would be possible to shift people from threatened communities to a different country. Mass refugee emigration or "resettlement" had been forced on a total of probably three million Jews in just a few years since Alexander's assassination. If movement on that scale could be achieved, largely on foot and under the whip, then very large numbers could also be moved systematically and with less trauma if safe homes could be found for them. For the first time the Jewish community had the motivation, the capacity and possibly the resources within its grasp to carry out such a venture. It would require the firm support of Europe's wealthy Jewish families, and in particular that of the Rothschilds, but they could be expected to listen to reason in spite of the opposition from the Reform Movement.

The concept of a national home for Jews had been evolving since the 1848 rebellions and it was given a gradual boost by the Crimean War, the emancipation of Russia's serfs, the anti-Semitic programs in Germany under the strange alliance between Bismarck and Pope Leo, and then Alexander III's crushing reactionary program after his father's assassination. But the Dreyfus Affair had brought it into prominence. Early leaders of the movement had included Zevi Kalischer and Judah Alkalai who proposed that a company be set up to settle Erez Israel. Kalischer had approached Mayer Amschel Rothschild as early as 1836 to propose an approach to Muhammad Ali for the outright purchase of Israel or at least Jerusalem or the Temple area.¹⁴⁴ He later approached Sir Moses Montefiore also, and it was he who financed an organized Jewish settlement outside the walls of Old Jerusalem in 1860.

At that time the fiery socialist Moses Hess was writing Rome and Jerusalem with strong emphasis on the need for a spiritual centre for Judaism which would be a focal point for Jews in the Diaspora. A number of 'philanthropic ventures' followed in quick succession with Baron Hirsch and others financing Jewish settlements in Argentina. They received scathing criticism from radical Jewish thinkers for their trouble.¹⁴⁵ Then the organization, Lovers of Zion, was established in Russia by Rabbi Samuel Mohilever. Judah Pinsker, a leader of the group and a former officer in the medical corps, had reacted strongly to what he had seen at the massacre at Odessa. He published Auto-emancipation, attacked assimilation, called for a program of self-help and triggered a flood of refugee emigration, largely towards Palestine,¹⁴⁶ just at the time that the procurator of the Holy Synod of the Orthodox Church, Pobiedonoshev, was drawing up the program of repression for his tsar. Then there was another shock in store for Jews which further stimulated interest in nationalism. In spite of his election being vetoed three times by Emperor Franz Joseph, Karl Lueger was elected Mayor of Vienna on an anti-Semitic platform.

At that point Nathan Birnbaum helped to focus attention on the new movement towards organized refugee resettlement in a secure homeland by offering a formal definition for it. Zionism, he wrote, was the establishment of an organization of the national political Zionist party in juxtaposition to the practically oriented party that existed until then.^{147 148}

Such was the situation in Europe when Theodore Herzl was jolted into his attempt to find a solution to "the Jewish question." At first his thin grounding in Judaism prompted him to float the idea of Marrano style mass baptism but although he soon dropped it he could not bring himself to support Zionism. Even as recently as October 1894, the month that Dreyfus was arrested, he attacked the concept in his newspaper column.¹⁴⁹ But then when he watched the public degradation of Captain Dreyfus on January 5th 1895 in Paris the "truth" hit him. There was no possibility of escaping the ghetto atmosphere under Christianity in Europe.

DER JUDENSTAAT

Herzl's conversion to Zionism was complete. Five months later he put a plan of political action to Baron Hirsch and then set about working out the details. His solution was a Jewish State and on February 14th, 1896, the German edition of his plan, Der Judenstaat, was published. He wrote that the Jewish people had gained a national identity through suffering and had tried hard to submerge themselves in the surrounding community to preserve the faith of their fathers. Security could only come in a sovereign state which was guaranteed the right to continued immigration, through negotiation with the civilized powers, because philanthropic colonization had proved not to be the answer. Herzl wrote that a joint stock company would be required to manage the venture with capital of 50 million pounds Sterling. It had to have the authority to sell property which was vacated by Jews to Christians and to purchase property in the new homeland from existing owners. A society would be needed to negotiate such arrangements with the powers. The new state would be governed as an aristocratic republic. It would certainly not be a theocracy and "We shall keep (the spiritual authorities) in their synagogues, just as we shall keep our professional army within the confines of their barracks", he wrote. Either an area of Palestine or an area of Argentina would be appropriate for the new state, he said.¹⁵⁰

Herzl believed that: "If his Majesty the Sultan were to give us Palestine, we could in return undertake to regulate the entire finances of Turkey. For Europe we would form a portion of the rampart against Asia there; an outpost of civilization as opposed to barbarism. As a neutral state we would remain in contact with all Europe which would guarantee our existence. The sanctuaries of Christendom would be safeguarded by assigning to them an extraterritorial status such as is well known to the Law of Nations."¹⁵¹

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE

Herzl began immediate negotiations to set up a Society of Jews. He called on Baron Edmond de Rothschild in Paris and then began actively organizing the Zionist Movement. The First Zionist Congress at Basle formally constituted the Zionist Organization in August 1897. But there was stiff opposition to overcome. The issue was so divisive and feeling in America was so intense that the Reform Movement placed its opposition to Zionism on record at its annual CCAR Convention, only weeks before the Zionist Congress, with unanimous support for the resolution that: "We totally disapprove of any attempt for the establishment of a Jewish state. Such attempts show a misunderstanding of Israel's mission."¹⁵² However Herzl and the Zionists were determined. A second Congress was held in Basle the next year, the Jewish Colonial Trust was registered in London, the Federation of American Zionists was founded, and the UAHC responded by passing a resolution that: "We are unalterably opposed to political Zionism. The Jews are not a nation, but a religious community."

The die had been cast. The Jewish community had its twin organizations which formed, in effect, the arms of a government in exile for a nation without a country. Those who opposed the decision expressed concern about the impact which the decision would have on the people in the area where the national home would be established, and the community was deeply divided over the issue on both sides of the Atlantic. But the vital first step had been taken towards establishing a Jewish State or a Jewish National Home. With few people being conscious of it, the Jewish community had taken the first step towards transgressing in terms of Muhammad's vision of The Night Journey. There was no intention to transgress. Far from it. The planners were not thinking in such terms. It was, as the reformers in the United States had said, basically a mechanism of escape from intolerable and totally unwarranted oppression, "a counsel of defeat, a surrender to the forces of anti-Semitism rather than the valiant fight to defeat them, (and a) retreat substituted for advance." In fact the prophecy of The Night Journey makes no mention of intention: only the action of communal transgression. Neither was the Jewish community generally thinking in terms of being pre-destined to take that step if circumstances made it necessary. The Christian church and its henchmen had forced them into it, but the decision was theirs. It was still reversible, but circumstances were combining to make a reversal most unlikely and very difficult. The die had been cast in no uncertain manner. Just one more step to the final selection of the area for the national home to enable the plan to be implemented.

Europe had changed a great deal since the '48 round of rebellions and it was in the middle of a second round of colonial expansion, but one thing had not changed. Few people except Jews cared much about the fate of a few million Jews. They had their emancipation. What else did they want? The Church-triumphant had spread in one form or another, as its self-definitions said it should, to the ends of the earth. It was in full-blooded competition with every other faith and ideology with which it came in contact, not just its partners in the triangle. Relationships between church and its host states had been very confused but in various ways each was using the other to get its fangs into new countries and to dominate new situations. They were transgressors in a very real sense. But why should they worry? They believed – because the church hierarchy kept telling them so – that they were chosen and blessed with a spark of divine authority. If they did transgress, just a little bit, all would be forgiven as long as they followed the church's rituals and participated in the church's sacraments.

The shock and the lessons of Napoleon Bonaparte had passed but a different political situation had developed as a segment of the philosophical challenge to the church's self-understanding: the Italian Risorgimento. Rome had tried to beat it off and to cling to temporal power by means of military alliances. When these were in doubt it turned to extravagant historical and scriptural manoeuvres to back its claim to exclusive world wide religious authority and continued control of the papal states on the basis of papal and corporate infallibility. It had confirmed not only its rejection of progress and compromise but its completely reactionary stand. It had also confirmed its continued readiness to adapt its theology to the political opportunities of the day, such as in the Balkans, but it had achieved less from it than on some earlier occasions.

Having had the capacity for direct confrontation with its partners in the triangle progressively wrested from it, the church used every means available to it, including the pulpit, the printing press and politics, to keep the pressure up from a position of political strength through its sweetheart deals with the great powers. Anti-Semitism danced a few new steps while the church pulled the strings. Anti-Muslim propaganda included falsification of reports as well as good old-fashioned misrepresentation of Muhammad's teaching. Even disciplinary action taken by the Turkish authorities to end conflict over competing versions of Christian literature had been turned to propaganda use.

Then when it suited their purposes the governments of Britain and France crossed their religious fences and formed one of those strange alliances of convenience. Joining with the Vatican and its strange bedfellows, the House of Rothschild, with all four parties working from a base of conflicting motives, they set out to prop up the Muslim Ottoman Empire which they had been very eager to eliminate until then in order to clip the wings of the Orthodox Christian Russian monarchy. In doing so they added fuel to Russia's interfaith and class struggles. But they also reinforced the arguments of Karl Marx who was challenging Europe's crossbreed religious/political/economic system and began to prepare the ground for both a counter challenge four generations later and the twentieth century trouble in the triangle.

The United States of America had survived its Civil War and as an economic system slavery had all but been buried. The nation had come out of the operation battered and scarred but determined to maintain the image of purity and Christian principles for which its founding fathers had been famous and which had been enshrined in its Declaration of Independence. However it had demonstrated in Japan and Thailand that the image was all that mattered and that when it came to practice it was no different to the corrupt powers of the Old World.

Attitudes and relationships which had been encouraged by, and then designed and built on the church's doctrines, its view of itself and its jaundiced view of the world had enabled Europe and the USA to dominate and exploit the rest of the world unchecked by a soul-searching conscience or the pressure of public opinion saying "you can't do that." A brake or a safety valve was needed, or both perhaps, to stop the process from causing absolute human misery and degradation for the majority of the world's people to whom the church was supposed to be introducing a glimpse of Salvation.

THE BRAKE AND THE SAFETY VALVE

The designers didn't realize it but the State of Israel was about to become both brake and safety valve. They had been persecuted to the point where they had lost sight of Israel's mission and were thinking primarily of their own security. It was only in circumstances of extreme provocation that it would be either necessary or possible to complete the casting and bring the brake into operation but the Western World seemed intent on providing them. The arrogance and greed of the Christian powers was so great that it seemed they were determined to prove Israel's corporate predestination and to force it to confirm the prophecies of people from all three partners in the triangle, including, of course, their hitherto unrecognized Messiah. There was certainly still quite a long way to go before the Jewish community took that final irrevocable step, but the die had been cast. Yes: the process was still reversible at that stage. It was possible that the attitudes and policies of the West would change and that Europe's Jews would scrap the plan, but the church and its powers had a lot of rethinking to do before the process could be reversed and a reversal was becoming more and more unlikely.

Perhaps unwittingly, perhaps consciously, the people involved in both establishing the World Zionist Organization and in the Hebraization of the Jewish community in Palestine with its radically different national self-understanding were moving progressively to a position in which the world at large would again accept the concept of Jews as a people of a nationality – or of a race – and not simply as a people of religious faith. By and large they were being aided or abetted in that movement by a compliant church which saw no reason to discourage it because of its own self-understanding and fear of the consequences of discussing the matter.

The church had been too busy accusing the Jewish community of fifth columns and conflicts of interest to notice that the French action in Vietnam had confirmed the church's capacity to provide fifth columns and that the dogma of papal infallibility had placed an intolerable conflict of interest on Christians worldwide. Proud Christian governments which held out against admitting Jews until circumstances, not Biblical reasoning, forced them to a change of heart were happy to recognize Islam and give treaty support to the Muslim Ottoman Empire when their national interests were affected but they continued to encircle and undermine it as quickly as they could. And of course the church's conduct in Palestine under the rule of the sultan exposed the contrast between their ideals and their actions.

Then there was Darwin. He brought to a climax the scientific and philosophical challenge which the church had been trying to beat off for three hundred and fifty years. It was not his fault that his theory undermined the credibility of the church and the Bible. It was the church's fault because it had backed itself into its comfortable but false doctrinal cubby house from which it could not budge without dismantling the lot. But it was able to avoid the issue at the time through a combination of political circumstances including its sweetheart deal with the aristocracy of the day. It follows that it was also largely the church's fault, and not Darwin's, that people of the Christian community lost the reality of their relationship with other creatures and things in creation, that they lost their sense of responsibility towards their environment and subordinate creatures, and that they adopted more exploitative attitudes than people of other faiths and cultures. If the Biblical creation story was false then maybe there was no Creator. In that case man is absolute master of the environment and resources around him and he can do what he likes. In that case we may as well take Darwin to (our own) logical conclusion and it is then a matter of every man for himself in a community in which the fittest shall survive. Then if that applies within a community it must also apply between communities and between races so let's not worry about the Jews or anyone else for that matter. Let's make every post a winning post and go in boots and all.

That's exactly what the Christian West was doing as the nineteenth century struggled to a close. People all around the world were crying out for relief from Western interference but they would have to cry louder before anyone would take any notice. Of course the Jewish community of Europe was feeling the boot too. If the Messiah would not come they would have to shape their own Messianic Age. As Herzl and his colleagues struggled against enormous odds to consolidate the young Zionist Movement the cry from the common people of their community was not "take your heel off!" It was: "let's find a new home!"

But the bulk of the two and a half million Jews who would do so during the next 25 years, until unrestricted immigration into the United States was stopped, would find their way to the USA where tens of thousands had already found their new home during the previous fifty years. But their contribution to the life and development of that country would be enormous. They would be greatly influenced by a small elite band of Jews from central and eastern Europe who, between the First and Second World Wars, would do more to shape the self- image of the people of the United States than possibly any other group. That band was a dozen or so young men, each of whom had been born in Europe or in the US to immigrant families in the traumatic period from 1861 (the abolition of serfdom in Russia) to 1894 (the year of the Dreyfus trials). Between them they would dominate the motion picture industry during the 1920s, 30s and 40s. Of the 85 persons involved in production in 1936, 53 were Jews but this band of 'Moguls' was preeminent. They had each overcome the trauma of oppression, poverty and family failures as they progressed to control the vast bulk of that industry. They included Adolph Zukor (Hungary 1863), Carl Laemmle (Germany 1867), William Fox (Hungary circa 1880), Danny Selznick (Ukraine circa 1880), Louis B. Mayer (Russia 1885) Samuel Rothapfel (Germany 1881), Marcus Loew (Vienna/Germany 1870), the Warner Brothers Jack, Harry and Sam (Poland 1881–1894) and Harry Cohn (Germany/Russia 1891), with whom must also be listed Rabbi Edgar Magnin (Holland 1890).¹⁵³ We will come to consider their influence and the anti-Semitism they had to contend with in due course. Sufficient to note now that they and their parents had been in the vanguard of those crying “let’s find a new home!” At the turn of the century they were each ambitious young men struggling to find their footholds in the world of business, with the odds stacked heavily against them in the land of opportunity because of their religion – but they were free and they had found their new home in the land of their dreams.

CHAPTER 16

NEXT YEAR IN JERUSALEM

Fifteen minutes of tumultuous applause greeted Theodore Herzl when he strode to the podium at the opening of the First Zionist Congress at Basle in 1897. A delegate had called “Long Live the King!” It was an allusion to Maimonides’ expectation that a Messianic King would arise to renew the dynasty of King David, gather the dispersed of Israel and rebuild the Temple. But it was also an indication of the relief and expectation of millions of Jews at the prospect of being freed from the fear of violence as Europe’s anti-Semitism grew more and more intense.¹

But not all of Europe, and certainly not all of its Jewish community, shared the enthusiasm of those two hundred and one delegates for the plan for a Jewish state. Herzl knew there would be opposition from some Jews, and especially those of Ultra-orthodox persuasion who were deeply committed to the traditional belief that the Jewish people had to put up with whatever might be their lot in life until the coming of the Messiah. To take the matter into their own hands to escape persecution was, they believed, a betrayal of their faith, their fathers, their responsibility and, above all, their God. It would be inviting the most severe judgement, in their view. Then there were others opposed to the plan for personal, political or practical and financial reasons; others because they simply did not believe it would solve the problem, and others who thought the time was not yet ready. Herzl had his answers ready for all of them.

In a sense the evolution of the Zionist idea did represent a weakening of Jewish faith, but that is hardly surprising in the face of militant Christianity which was arrogant, overbearing and apparently triumphant throughout the world. Perhaps the Christians had been right after all, even if they were not living according to their faith. How could a Messiah come along, rescue them from such immense military might as the Christian powers had at their command and set up a new kingdom of Israel? It was wishful thinking. Many Jewish scholars had feared a weakening of faith as a byproduct of emancipation and assimilation and events now appeared to be proving them correct. But it was difficult to isolate the reasons or the factors which brought it about because there were so many complex streams running through European society as it evolved after the fall of the Holy Roman Empire and especially after the fall of Napoleon I. Basically the ‘loss of faith’ involved a change in attitude towards the Messianic era which Maimonides had spoken about. It would not come about through the efforts of one man, so the reasoning went, but through the collective efforts of the community as a whole. In other words, the emphasis shifted in the thinking of many Jews towards the messianic expectation of Amos, Ezekiel and Obadiah, and away from that of Isaiah, Micah, Jeremiah and Zachariah.²

It is a rather fruitless exercise to try to establish which line of reasoning is more supportable by looking for an order of precedence among the prophets or by identifying a pattern of development from one messianic understanding to another. The prophets lived in different periods in different circumstances and they addressed different crises and patterns of conduct. In addition those who can be described as anticipating an individual messiah and those who can be described as anticipating collective messiahship were not only interspersed with each other chronologically, but also with other prophets who did not anticipate messianic intervention at all and who proclaimed that God alone determined divine redemption. Thus the rising tide of Zionism raised fundamental questions for Jewish theologians to ponder on both sides of their Reform barrier. But if it raised questions for them, so it did for Christian theologians. The church's messianic understanding was linked, tenaciously, to the expectations of the second group – Isaiah, Micah, Jeremiah and Zachariah – who were thus given precedence over all the others. Regardless of the steps being taken within the fledgling ecumenical movement towards cooperation in Christian theological education and research there was no way that such an issue could be examined. It led inevitably back to the fundamental questions of the doctrine of the Trinity and the church's self-understanding. It was quite out of bounds. But the Jews were welcome to debate the issue among themselves because, in the church's view, they had no future until and unless they accepted the Christian Trinitarian position.

THE EVOLUTION OF AN IDEA

The man who had given the biggest boost to belief in corporate or communal messiahship in the modern era was a Balkans rabbi, Judah Alkalai, who published a stream of papers and pamphlets between 1841 and his death in 1878.³ One of his contemporaries, Judah Pinsker (variously referred to in literature as Leon or Leo) extended that line of reasoning when he took up Rabbi Hillel's call from the days of Roman rule in Jerusalem: "If I am not for myself, who is?"⁴ In his pamphlet Autoemancipation, smuggled into Germany for publication, he turned it into a call for Jews to stand up and fight to organize their own emancipation instead of sinking to their knees to pray. Pinsker was born in Odessa about 1820. A graduate in medicine from Moscow University, he served with some distinction in the Crimean War and concentrated his efforts for many years into encouraging assimilation. However his experience of the Odessa riots in 1871 and then the crisis of 1882 following the assassination of the tsar in 1881 resulted in a complete change of heart. He rejected assimilation on the grounds that Jews would always be regarded as 'the dead among the living', alien vagrants, beggars in the eyes of the wealthy, exploiters in the eyes of the poor, stateless in the eyes of patriots and a hated rival in the eyes of all and sundry. He maintained that such deep-seated antagonism could not be overcome by legislation even with the best of will by governments and he espoused mass migration to a country where they could form the majority and determine the laws. He urged the existing

Jewish societies to call a national congress and to raise funds for the purchase of a territory which would enable the re-settlement of several million people. But he was essentially a territorialist and not, at that stage, a Zionist, leaving the question of selection of a site entirely open. He adopted Zionism and supported the group Lovers of Zion (Hovevei Zion) for only a few years before he died in 1898.⁵

Apparently the only Orthodox group which supported the Zionist Organization from the point of its establishment was one which owed its origins to the Lovers of Zion, Merkaz Ruhani, known as Mizrahi. Orthodox religious members of Lovers of Zion sought to distinguish themselves from non-religious members of the group and other Zionists and established a separate office, the Spiritual Centre, in 1893. That was the same year that the nucleus of the German Zionist Federation, Hibbat Zion, was established in Cologne and the year before Europe's Jewish community was jolted into action by the trumped-up Dreyfus case in Paris. Rabbi Samuel Mohilever, the early leader of Mizrahi, told the first Zionist Congress in 1897 that the Torah, the source of the Jewish community's life, must be the foundation of its regeneration in the land of its fathers. That philosophy motivated Mizrahi as it worked to realize not only political Zionism's goal of a Jewish society in Palestine but also a religious majority in the Yishuv to ensure that it would be Jewish in both a religious and sociological sense. In 1902 it became the first group within the Zionist Organization to establish itself as a formal political party and, like other groups, it set up branches in Palestine and a number of other countries.⁶

In due course, in 1922 when the British mandate was formalized, while Mizrahi operated within both the domestic framework of Knesset Israel and the international framework of the Zionist Organization, it established a labour organization, Hapoel Hamizrahi, which operated in the welfare and political arenas. Both groups retained a commitment to the establishment of a Jewish national home governed by Orthodox Jewish law, and they were thus quite different to the majority of Zionist organizations. In their view political Zionism was not a movement of secular nationalism. It was the instrument chosen by God for the fulfillment of the Divine Plan for the Jewish people and for the whole world. It was therefore the first stage in the fulfillment of Biblical prophesy and the redemption of the Jewish people, and the rebirth of Israel was not to be seen as a routine or man-made political event. Rabbi Meir Bar-Ilan who became world leader of the Mizrahi Movement in 1926 (just as Hitler was putting the finishing touches to Mein Kampf and Britain was granting more authority to each of the religious communities in Palestine) described the State of Israel as "something celestial, it is the divine world, our eternal destiny." In view of such radical differences in outlook some friction was to be expected but at that stage the Mizrahi 'camp' continued to cooperate freely with non-religious groups within the Zionist Organization. However seven years after the State of Israel was established Mizrahi and Hapoel Hamizrahi merged to form the powerful National Religious Party, Mafdal, and, as we shall see in due course, the situation changed.⁷

Perhaps the drift in faith and confidence in the traditional Messianic expectation of Judaism is shown most clearly in the life and religious development of Moses Hess who was born in Bonn in 1812. Before he wrote Rome and Jerusalem Hess had rejected orthodox Jewish tradition, married a Christian prostitute, linked with Marx and his humanistic movement, taken part in the '48 revolution in Germany, been sentenced to death and escaped to Paris. Then he broke with the Communist movement and returned to the Jewish fold to put his very strong personal imprint on Judaism and to make his contribution towards the evolution of Zionism. He died in Paris in 1875⁸

While each of these writers (and a host of others) lived and worked in isolation from each other they were all influenced by the same basic issues. And although the distinction becomes very blurred, they were all working to change the philosophical direction of their community rather than the religious direction, and they were very conscious of deep divisions within the community. Herzl was therefore prepared for resistance within the Jewish community but he was not prepared for a violent reaction from the Christian community. He had misjudged it. "It seems to me", he wrote, "that Governments will certainly pay attention to this scheme, either voluntarily or under pressure from the anti-Semites; and they may perhaps actually receive it here and there with a degree of sympathy which they will also be prepared to show to the Society of Jews."⁹ He went on to discuss the benefits to the Christian community of Europe from job substitution, professional opportunities and trade as Jewish emigration took place and the new export opportunities when an import-dependent state was established. Then in a spirit of optimism he refuted the suggestion of a Christian backlash during the years it would take to put the plan into effect. "No; if we were merely to begin to carry out the Plan, anti-Semitism would come to a standstill at once and everywhere. For it is the conclusion of peace. The news of the formation of our Jewish company will be carried in a single day to the remotest ends of the earth by the lightning speed of our telegraph wires. And immediate relief will ensue."¹⁰

BITTER RESPONSE FROM ROME

He was to be bitterly disappointed by the venom of the Christian reaction. He had overlooked the church's view of itself. The ambitious, self-confident pope was still a self-styled 'prisoner in the Vatican' without his empire.¹¹ Anti-papal and revolutionary threats had reached such a level in 1881 that he had contemplated leaving Rome for refuge in Austria. The problem which weighed heavily on his mind was that if he fled from Rome the papacy would never return to its home base and all visions of a world theocracy would be destroyed totally. He had stuck it out, encouraged by the fact that his new Bismarck-brand bolster was just as good as Napoleon III's ever was. However his position in Italy was very weak indeed.

In 1886, seven years after his deal with Bismarck, the pope had met the Italian government to demand full restoration of his sovereignty. The government had responded with further anti-papal measures which clearly reflected public feeling. It commissioned a massive monument of Giordano Bruno, the Catholic philosopher who had been burned at the stake by the Inquisition in 1600. Bruno's twin crimes were that he supported Copernicus and then refused to renounce his calls for doctrinal reforms during the peak of the Reformation and the Counter-reformation. The unveiling of the monument was coupled with enormous Masonic demonstrations and such antipapal violence that the pope appealed to the European powers for help. But piece by piece he had to renounce the papacy's claims to absolute supremacy and accept the sovereign rights of democratic governments. He didn't have any option. However he coupled that policy with calls for independent governments to publish codes of state ethics, he continued to denounce the idea of state omnipotence and he pressed ahead with the establishment of Catholic political parties and social movements. Public pronouncements could be one thing. Papal intentions could be another. There was always the hope that if modernism could be held in check the political process could be reversed.

When Herzl came along with his Jewish State plan the idea was anathema. How dare the Jews think they could have a state when even the papacy was being denied one! The financial and professional capacity of the Jewish community and the influence of its few politicians were so great that a Jewish State could become a focal point for world affairs. The world might even begin to swallow the story that the Jewish Messianic Age had arrived. If they did, where would that place the church's teaching? The very thought was ghastly. Or perhaps a challenge. The implications for the church were enormous. It must not be allowed to happen.

Among the first formal responses from the Catholic Church to Herzl's proposal was a statement published in the Jesuit journal Civiltà Cattolica a few months before the first Zionist Congress.

1827 years have passed since the prediction of Jesus of Nazareth was fulfilled, namely that is, that Jerusalem would be destroyed ... that the Jews would be led away to be slaves among all the nations, and that they would remain in the dispersion till the end of the world. ... According to the Sacred Scriptures, the Jewish people must always live dispersed and wandering among the other nations, so that they may render witness to Christ not only by the Scriptures ... but by their very existence. As for a rebuilt Jerusalem, which could become the centre of a reconstituted state of Israel, we must add that this is contrary to the prediction of Christ Himself.¹²

WORLD DOMINATION, OR A SPOT TO CALL HOME?

Accusations that the Jews were looking for world domination began to fly. If they got it the powers of Europe would fall. And so would the church. Then in 1905 The Protocols of Zion began to circulate in Russia just as repeated peasant uprisings were threatening the decadent Romanov monarchy, surrounded by its cocoon of religious mysticism and Anti-Semitism, and just before the manifesto of civil liberties and representative institutions was handed down by the embattled tsar.¹³ The protocols were claimed to be either a plan for world domination prepared by Herzl or proceedings of the First Zionist Congress. The timing was perfect.

There had been a series of Zionist Congresses in quick succession and planning and negotiations were going at a faster pace and with greater success than most people had dared to hope. Herzl had been received in audience by the German Kaiser at Constantinople (October 18 1898) and at Jerusalem two weeks later. He was received again in Constantinople on May 8

1901, this time by the Ottoman Sultan Abdul Hamid II, and he was awarded the Grand Order of the Medjilil, First Class. Then came London. Herzl appeared before the Royal Commission on Alien Immigration on July 7, 1902. He had conversations with Lord Rothschild and he established official relations between the Zionist Organization and the British Government. Three months later he was back in London for talks with the Foreign Minister, Lord Landsdowne, and the Minister for the Colonies, Joseph Chamberlain, about settlement in Egyptian territory at El Arish, west of the Sinai Peninsula. Britain wanted a friendly power alongside the Suez Canal over which it had by then gained control.¹⁴

Then came the first real setback. The Egyptian Government rejected the El Arish proposal in May 1903. As an alternative Chamberlain proposed the Jewish colonization of the region of East Africa known as Uganda. The British Colonial Office confirmed the offer in writing in August while Herzl was at Vilna in Lithuanian Russia being greeted with wildly enthusiastic receptions by Jewish crowds.¹⁵ Demands for land and local government reform which had been brewing in Russia for years with student riots in 1899 and peasant riots in 1902 were approaching their bloody climax. A week later Herzl was back in Basle for the Sixth Zionist Congress. He took on himself the unpleasant task of promoting the Uganda colonization scheme in place of a Palestinian homeland for which immense enthusiasm had built up. The prayer “next year in Jerusalem” was beginning to appear a real possibility because Herzl had not disclosed the sultan’s rejection of the Palestine plan and Congress didn’t take the alternative proposal very kindly at all. All the history and theology of Judaism and its people came out in a torrent of systematic confusion. Herzl was personally humiliated. But time appeared to be running out. The persecution scene had shifted to Rumania and the Kishinev pogrom of only a few months earlier was fresh in everyone’s minds. With an extraordinary personal effort Herzl managed to carry the vote in favour of the Uganda proposal by 295 to 178 with 98 abstentions. However he then had to tackle the task of keeping the Zionist Organization together in the face of a threatened walkout by the anti-Uganda group.

TOTAL REJECTION

Herzl’s next major discussions were in Rome with both Pope Pius X, who had taken office a few months earlier, and the Italian King, Victor Emmanuel III, in January 1904. It is reasonable to assume that in a relationship of confidence and the circumstances of the time Herzl bared his heart to Pius with his innermost personal aspirations for the much-despised Jewish community as well as prospects and problems for both Palestine and Uganda. Five months later, on July 3, 1904, he was dead. The clinical cause of death was a heart attack but the world, and especially those who had been close to him, knew it was the immense strain of the task he had undertaken to rescue millions of people from worsening oppression. No one was in a better position to counter the fabricated protocols when they began to circulate than the new pope. But perhaps he couldn’t, or perhaps he simply did not wish to.

Firstly, according to Herzl's diary notes, the pope's responses in discussion included the following:

On Jews returning to Jerusalem:

We cannot encourage this movement. We cannot prevent the Jews from going to Jerusalem – but we could never sanction it. The ground of Jerusalem, even if it were not always sacred, has been sanctified by the life of Jesus Christ. As the head of the Church I cannot tell you otherwise. The Jews have not recognized our Lord, therefore we cannot recognize the Jewish people.

And on a Jewish community possibly having responsibility for the Christian Holy Places:

I know, it is not pleasant to see the Turks in possession of our Holy Places. We simply have to put up with that. But to support the Jews in the acquisition of the Holy Places, that we cannot do. ... There are two possibilities. Either the Jews will retain their ancient faith ... in that case they are denying the divinity of Jesus and we cannot help them. Or else they will go there without any religion, and then we can be even less favourable to them. The Jewish religion was the foundation of our own, but it was superseded by the teachings of Christ, and we cannot concede it any further validity. The Jews who ought to have been the first to acknowledge Jesus Christ have not done so to this day.¹⁶

THE FRENCH CONCORDAT ABROGATED

Secondly, the French Syllabus Catholics had organized a nationwide anti-Semitic campaign of the most infamous kind taking full advantage of the Dreyfus case and this had helped to open up all the old church/state frictions and arguments. Diplomatic relations between the Vatican and France were broken off in July 1904 and the law of separation of church and state which provided for local religious associations to supervise the church, its bishops and its property was actually passed by the Chamber on the day Herzl died. The papal concordat was abrogated, all financial assistance was withdrawn and the Catholic Church in France was reduced to the status of a private association. A year later, when the pope condemned the law of separation, the church lost all its property as well.¹⁷

At a time when the Catholic Church was being brought to heel so harshly by one of its supposed subordinate temporal powers it was absolute anathema for those same powers to be considering giving Jews temporal authority in the country in which, as the pope had claimed, Christianity sprang from and superseded Judaism. The suggestion that the establishment of the State of Israel would be linked in some way with, or would usher in, the Messianic Age was even worse. It clearly implied a belief that the establishment of the State of Israel would be the result of divine intervention or, at least, a response to a divine plan or divine inspiration. It therefore also raised the issue of the status of political Zionism which had already generated vigorous debate among both Christians and Jews. If the act of establishing an institution is brought about by divine intervention, or if it is divinely inspired, does that mean that those who are involved in the act and the organization through which they work are also instruments of divine intervention? And what does the answer to that question indicate about the concepts of divine election, predestination and freewill, and about the range of motives which might draw a person into such an organization?

Just at that critical time Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Hacohen Kook brought these issues to the fore and confronted both the Orthodox Jewish community and the Christian church directly by insisting that political Zionism was the instrument by which God was fulfilling the divine promise of redemption for the Jewish people and confirming the Messianic Age. When Kook migrated to Palestine in 1904 while France was bringing the church to heel, Mizrahi was making a strong effort to counter the irreligious attitudes of many Zionist leaders and to encourage Orthodox Jews to remain in the movement. He refuted the prevailing Orthodox view that Jewish nationalism was a heresy which gave politics precedence over religious practice and that Zionism sought to usurp God's authority in returning the Jews to Palestine. He believed that the breakup of traditional Jewish communities in Eastern Europe was evidence of a new era in Jewish history, that it had entered the first stage of the Final Redemption, that Zionism was an instrument for the ingathering of exiles and that the Jewish community in Palestine would be reunited with the Divine law and ultimately turn to religious law for governance. He became head rabbi of Jaffa then Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine, and today, more than ninety years later, his thinking continues to have a big influence within the Mizrahi Movement and the National Religious Party in Israel.¹⁸

BLOODY SUNDAY AND THE PROTOCOLS

Then Russia experienced its Bloody Sunday on January 22 1905. The tsarist authorities had been looking for an excuse for an action violent enough to startle the world into supporting the monarchy against revolution and, hopefully, to shock the revolutionaries into submission. They chose to conspire with an Orthodox priest named Gapon to organize and lead a column of workers to the Winter Palace to present a petition. Naturally a large crowd gathered as well as the official deputation. At a given signal a royal regiment opened fire with small arms supported by a cannon and a Cossack cavalry charge. When told that 150 people had been killed and 200 wounded the tsar, Nicholas II, asked his officers whether they were sure they had killed enough people.¹⁹ History would show they hadn't, in terms of the aims of the conspiracy, but it was an excellent occasion for another round of anti-Semitic propaganda.²⁰ It was then that the Protocols of Zion began to appear. The timing was perfect. They generated a degree of support for the Russian monarchy but when they spread right across Europe they played on the fears of both the church, for the security of its self-image, and the public of the Great Powers, for the security of their economic interests. Rumours about their source and authenticity were rife but it was not until sixteen years later that they were shown to be an adaptation of a satire aimed at Napoleon III in 1864 and it has since been claimed that Nicholas II had commissioned a monk, Sergei Nilus, in 1903 to produce some evidence to damn the Jews.^{21 22}

The Zionist Organization met again in congress in Basle in July/August of that year, 1905. It had to resolve the Uganda issue in the light of detailed studies which showed that it was not suitable for large scale European immigration of any sort, let alone Jewish. Civil war between the tribes of Uganda had erupted in 1890 as a result of conflict between promoters of Anglican Christianity, Roman Catholic Christianity, Islam and ancient African animist religions. The British Government's solution after four years of strife had been to divide the region into spheres of influence for Anglican missions and Roman Catholic missions.²³ Naturally it expected they would be able to counter any continuing Muslim influence and they were there to "save" the Animists anyway. It was like a repeat performance of Palestine and to introduce Jewish immigration into an atmosphere already loaded with racial and religious conflict as well as anti-Semitism would have been ludicrous. In fact protests from white Christian settlers against the idea of an influx of Jews being forced on them had already prompted the government to have second thoughts about the proposal.²⁴ It had actually been so unimpressed with the region that it had proposed to abandon it in 1892 and had only stayed and established a protectorate in 1894 under pressure from the Anglican missionaries and commercial interests. Apart from that, sleeping sickness, for which there was no control, had broken out in epidemic proportions in 1901 and it was raging at the time of Chamberlain's kind offer to Herzl. By 1909 when it subsided the disease had claimed 250,000 lives. It can therefore hardly be said that the British Government was doing the Jewish community a great favor by proposing that area in the first place.²⁵

During the months prior to his death, and largely because of bitter personal attacks against him and the Uganda alternative by Zionist leaders in Russia, Herzl had already ceased active promotion of that plan, saying that the whole Jewish community must be involved in the decision on a site,²⁶ but in any case the 1905 Congress firmly resolved to reject it. At the same time, picking up the thrust of the Russian Zionists' concerns, the congress also rejected the notion of organized settlement anywhere other than Erez Israel and the immediate vicinity, and resolved that practical settlement would begin immediately without waiting for public rights to be finalized with the Ottoman Empire or the Great Powers.²⁷ There was to be no more small scale philanthropic colonization lacking a plan and a system, but the Zionist movement would work to strengthen the Jewish position in Palestine in agriculture and industry in as democratic a spirit as possible.²⁸

The Russians had already been buying individual plots of land in Palestine to provide a base for future community development and at their last meeting they had asked Herzl for a written undertaking that he would not seek the support of Congress for any territorial projects other than those concerned with Palestine and Syria.²⁹ Their arm of the Zionist Organization was certainly able to exercise a strong influence on the thinking of the organization overall as the nineteenth century gave way to the twentieth, because of their greater numbers. Obviously the Jewish communities of each region of Europe shared a common heritage of trauma, with the central and western regions suffering most under the church of the Holy Roman Empire and having developed an impressive range of community welfare and educational organizations since the fall of the ghetto. But those within the Russian sphere of influence had suffered on a very much greater scale during the most recent generations and they had already taken the initiative to establish some twenty settlements in Palestine up to that time without a great flamboyant display. Thus the delegates from each region could demonstrate excellent credentials in the struggle for human rights and against oppression. However those within the Russian sphere of influence in Lithuania, White Russia, Poland, Galicia and Rumania – more than five million- greatly outnumbered the rest. Warsaw had the biggest Jewish community in Europe (about 220,000 or between 16 and 18 percent of its population) followed by Odessa (140,000). The business community, professional people and long term army veterans and their families were permitted to live in the major cities and accounted for about 200,000. The rest were required to live in rural towns and villages within the Pale of Settlement, except that they were generally banned from Kiev, Sabastopol and Yalta, and in some areas they accounted for more than one quarter of the population.³⁰ In contrast the Jewish population in the balance of Europe can be estimated at 3.6 million comprised of: Germany, 500,000; Eastern Europe, 1.8 million; other countries including Britain, 1.3 million. An estimated 1 million in the United States and 1 million in Africa, the Middle East and elsewhere makes a world total of 10.6 million.

THE CRUCIAL DECISION: SETTLEMENT

In the circumstances of the time the decision in 1905 by the seventh Congress to proceed with settlement in Palestine may not have appeared to be anything out of the ordinary but in retrospect it can now be seen as a crucial piece in the jigsaw puzzle of the trouble in the triangle. Eight years after the First Zionist Congress had formally constituted the Zionist Organization the Seventh Congress had confirmed that as a community of faith it would proceed with the establishment of a National Home for Jews in Palestine regardless of the vigorous debate over its long-held self understanding, its belief in a special relationship with God, and its Messianic expectation. In taking that decision, in recording for posterity the fact that it would not wait for the agreement of either the local population or the legal powers of the day, and in mustering all of the political influence at its disposal it unwittingly took the vital final step to transgress in terms of the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey.

The decision had not been taken lightly. It had been taken under extreme pressure and after considerable thorough investigations and debate, but the primary motive was self interest. Protection and community preservation. Other favourable factors cited to justify the decision were secondary. Almost window dressing. Even if they hoped that peaceful coexistence would be possible in the manner that Herzl outlined in The Jewish State the Zionists knew that their aims could be achieved only at the expense of the people of Palestine. They knew that they were transgressing but they hoped they would be able to offset the consequences. Their decision was not a one-person leadership decision of the Henry VIII type. The leader was dead. There had been a widespread fear that with his death the organization would fail and it had been commonly accepted that without him there would be no hope of achieving a national home in Palestine while the Ottoman Empire remained. In spite of those considerations, in spite of the extent of opposition from fellow Jews who foresaw some of the consequences, and in spite of the fact that it divided the Zionist Organization, the decision was still taken and it was taken as a broadly based community decision. In a sense it was akin to a Martin Luther-type decision: it was taken in response to the Christian church's constant stream of abuse of human rights and its failure to understand and to act on its assumed role.

The announcement of the Congress decision prompted much the same response as publication of Herzl's original proposal. It helped boost the standing of the protocols quite a bit and anti-Semitism was boosted to new heights right across Europe. It also picked up steam in the USA and the European-culture colonies as well. The fact that the task would be long and hard and that the end of Anti-Semitism and persecution was not yet in sight became even more apparent to the Jewish community. This in turn brought a predictable response like every similar spiral of events. The waverers and even many of the outright opponents of the plan progressively reviewed their positions and swelled the ranks of the Zionist Movement, greatly increasing both its political clout and its economic strength. This encouraged the church to dig its heels in even harder, made it unlikely that the British government would be willing to consider an alternative in view of such an affront, and placed the German and Russian governments in even more difficult positions because they were neither willing nor able to support them directly in a bid for Palestine. But other developments which would all come together to bring the trouble in the triangle to its climax were taking place around the world and we must go back to that other event of 1859 and move forward again.

WORLD GROWTH AND COMPETITION BETWEEN COLONIAL POWERS

As world population growth, urbanization and industrialization each gathered momentum, the need for portable energy supplies, being influenced by all three factors, increased at a proportionately greater rate. Factories, mining operations, railways and the new breed of ships in world trade and naval operations, (offensive more often than defensive), were all dependent on steam boilers. Coal and wood, bulky and heavy to handle, were the only fuel supplies or sources of energy readily available. Petroleum was well known to have real advantages and there were fortunes to be made for those who could find it and use it as a substitute for coal and wood, but there was so little of it available. What there was of it was refined into paraffin for lighting, heating and cooking and fetched much higher prices on the domestic and commercial markets than industry could generally afford. Similarly, the production of animal fats and vegetable oils was not keeping pace with the demand for soap and candles as man unwittingly but inevitably obeyed the urge and the command to "be fruitful, multiply, fill the earth and conquer it" and as his communal evolution reached a more advanced stage.³¹ This situation had led in turn to a big upsurge in whaling. By 1857 whaling fleets operating out of the United States of America had outgrown those of Europe. Out of a total of 700 US whalers 429 were operating from New Bedford alone, prompted in part by the multi-purpose British naval blockade.

Competition and exploitation were the key words. Not cooperation and conservation. Most Americans were looking for a strong independent economy geared to expansion by investment of profits from exports and not by importing either equity or loan capital. They wanted domestic self-sufficiency, a strong export thrust and nil dependence on imports – especially of strategic commodities on which either territorial expansion or industrial expansion relied.³² This was a matter of philosophical attitude which developed because of the Americans' understanding of the complex circumstances of European colonization of the New World rather than a matter of firm government policy. Neither political nor economic organization or science had reached the sophisticated stage where production, exports and imports could be controlled by methods other than naval embargoes. Neither was it readily achievable in the three or four generations after independence because of the country's heavy dependence on imports of manufactured goods which it could not avoid because of the flow-on effects of colonial era policies.³³ As a philosophy, the US approach was a distinct departure from that of the European colonial powers. They aimed for domestic profit and expansion based on cheap imports which were guaranteed by guns and made legitimate by one-sided trade treaties extracted at the muzzle of a cannon or a rifle, as in the cases of Japan and Vietnam. Such a philosophy was made much easier to act on because, as a nation, the US was importing a lot of capital with, (and in the hands of), its adult settlers at the same time that it was swallowing up "new" productive land in a great westward expansion. The mercantile economy had not reached Europe in that way.³⁴ It had been developed with its population or labour force already there and gradually overcrowding the land and towns. Capital, part of its labour force and part of its market potential were all exported as emigration took place either in response to persecution or as a deliberate policy of population thinning by means such as convict transportation.³⁵

In the years leading up to the Civil War the restless energy of the American people put enormous pressure on available fuel resources and that was the primary cause of the growth of their whaling fleet. Farm production didn't demand much energy directly, other than man and horse or oxen power. But the population explosion from Europe's refugees and emigrants did. So did factory development to enable the US to compete in markets for manufactured goods, to offset manufactured imports and to bring more land into food production. So also did the dramatic development of railways and the conversion of its mercantile fleet from sail to steam to compete with Britain which had stolen a big lead.³⁶ Substitution of other materials to release supplies of solid fuels and animal fat-based products wherever possible was important.

Petroleum had been discovered in Rumania shortly before the Crimean War at a time when Russian access to the existing pits at Baku in the Caucasus was somewhat tenuous. Just how important that discovery was in the tsar's decision to push towards the Bosphorus via Rumania or in the decisions of Britain and France to support the Sultan is difficult to assess, but we can be certain that it was a factor. Work was pushed ahead to exploit the discovery as soon as the Balkans power game had been played out and in 1857 about 2,000 barrels of oil was produced – for the markets of Western Europe, of course. The volume was small compared with that from the Baku fields and production was difficult, but the potential was unknown and Britain and France were smug at having prevented Russia from gaining control of the fields.

In the USA, just running into its civil war and facing a dual challenge from Britain on the high seas, the news of oil in Europe was greeted with anything but glee.³⁷ The exploitation of America's massive Connellsville coking coal deposits was still at the early speculative and planning stage and extra fuel supplies could only push Europe further ahead in technical and commercial development and competition. Americans joined Europeans everywhere in a determined hunt for petroleum. Envious eyes turned south when petroleum deposits were discovered in Trinidad, (additional to naval pitch deposits which were already in use), just about the time that production started in Rumania.³⁸ But within a matter of weeks they turned north when a well drilled for water in Ontario, Canada, flowed oil.³⁹ Seepages had already been located in Pennsylvania and the efforts to find commercial flows took on a feverish urgency, especially when discoveries were made at Kleczany in Poland in 1858 and in Italy a little later.

OIL CHANGES RELATIONSHIPS

Then it happened. E. L. Drake set up a drilling rig at Titusville, Pennsylvania, and in August 1859 struck free-flowing oil at the meagre depth of 21 metres. Celebrations turned to frenzied activity. Caution, organization and (almost) any sense of responsibility was thrown to the winds as people rushed to cash in on the black gold. Recorded production for the balance of 1859 was 2,000 barrels but actual production is anyone's guess. Within months fifty three refinery plants were operating, and 201 out of 240 wells drilled in 1860 produced oil. The largest of them produced at an annual rate of 650,000 US gallons (about 15,500 barrels) of refined fuel oil. United States production for that year has been put at 500,000 barrels while in three years Rumanian production had only increased from 2,000 to 8,000 barrels.⁴⁰

The boot was suddenly on the other foot. The ability of the United States to resist the British and French naval operations was lifted beyond measure, together with its capacity for development and trade. Exports began in November 1861, just six months after the civil war had burst, with a shipment, to Britain, of 5,000 barrels, equal to more than one third of Rumania's production for the year. It is problematical whether that shipment was in response to a cutback in naval harassment by Britain or whether Britain's cutback was in response to the oil supplies, but the event was certainly the centre of much political manoeuvring.

However while the trading and political capacity of the United States had been boosted so also had its capacity to tear itself apart as it slid into the civil war. In fact the availability of unlimited oil supplies in Union hands hardened the war stance of both sides. It is reasonable to believe that if the federal government had been able to effectively control the distribution of oil and to restrict it to the Union states, the Civil War would have been shorter and less traumatic. But it could not. Profiteering oil producers kept it flowing to the Confederate forces as well. The war dragged on and the world failed to properly consider the implications. During the first year of the Civil War, (1861), US oil production had reached 2.1 million barrels. It leaped to 3.1 million barrels in 1862, fell to 2.6 million in 1863, to 2.1 million in 1864, and then recovered to 2.5 million barrels in 1865, the year the war ended. In that year other producers were Canada, 110,000 barrels; Russia, 67,000; Rumania, 39,000; and Italy, 2,000.⁴¹ Within two years of Drake's little spot of luck the young United States was producing well over 90 per cent of world petroleum oil supplies. All other producers between them accounted for a mere five to eight percent. The US took full advantage of that flow to boost national development and to tear itself apart at the same time.

In the complex period of Reconstruction which followed the civil war a number of conflicting streams of reason and philosophy surged through the exuberant American society as it retouched its tarnished national self-image, recovered its confidence and forged ahead to build a unified and powerful nation. Just like the basic causes of the civil war, many of those streams had European roots. The controversy over Darwinism had broken in England just as the US was sliding into its civil war, Drake was presiding over the newly-founded Oil Men's Association and wagons and railways rolled towards the west coast which was being opened up as fast as the arrival of settlers would permit. The waves of new settlers who had been pushed out of Europe and the veterans of the civil war who had fought against each other were equally determined to make a new start. As they did so, their particular understanding or misunderstanding of Darwin showed in their attitudes and actions. There was large scale irresponsibility in the destruction of the existing environment, exploitation of wild life and resources, and harassment and slaughter of American Indians. It could not even be camouflaged by the immense scale of the resources being discovered, the productivity of the land or the low numbers of Indians who the newcomers encountered and with whom they ought to have been able to live in harmony.

THE CHURCH AND INDIANS SHACKLED BY BELIEF

Of course the churches, being generally in confrontation with Darwin, were not in a position to influence peoples' attitudes in such matters. In fact the particular expressions of Christian triumphalism and piety which many American Protestant churchmen peddled only served to make the problem greater. Their young republic had dismantled the Divine Right of Kings. It had escaped most of the papal politicking of Europe and it had maintained a high level of church activity and piety, even if, in retrospect, its application of the Gospel fell far short of the target in the major issues of slavery and reconciliation within the community. Then in the wake of the civil war they took note of the unprecedented raw material resources and food production potential opening up before their astonished, almost incredulous, eyes as if from a vision. They linked this with the ending of slavery which many of them had opposed anyway and adopted Augustine's version of Christian predestination to their own situation. Or was it Calvins? Pulpits, politicians and the press then peddled the common theme that America was God's own country, that they were the new chosen people into whose hands the resources had been placed so that they would be the pattern for a new world. Of course they had some excellent precedents to fall back on. Even Jefferson had said in his second inaugural address in 1805 that “God led our forefathers, as Israel of old”, extending the theme he had used four years before, that the United States was “the world’s best hope.”⁴²

Like the Battle Hymn of the Republic which had stirred anti slavery fervour during the Civil War, the new line was morale boosting stuff. It filled pews and encouraged family and community reconciliation but it also had other effects. It compounded the exploitative reaction to Darwinism and people could do almost anything to take advantage of resources – as long as they were at church on Sunday. If there was a non-Christian Indian standing in the way it just added to the challenge to bring the resources under God-fearing American control and the whitewash brush was splashed across some of the nation’s worst excesses. As if to highlight this, the degradation of the Navaho people was current news, although it could not compete in horror with earlier race-based attacks on North American Indians. The Navaho people were pushed from their ancestral lands in 1863 while the Civil War was at its bloodiest. Riots were occurring in New York against conscription for the Union army and in favour of peace with a continuation of slavery, and the bill for emancipation of Negro slaves was being debated.

The Navaho tribe was one of the last to be able to cling to its land against the combined pressure of governments, settlers and churchmen. The high-sounding sentiments of the 1787 US Northwest Territory Ordinance which provided that Indian lands and property would never be taken from them without their consent, and that their property rights and liberty would never be disturbed unless in connection with just and lawful wars authorized by Congress, had in reality been only words on a scrap of paper. A policy of confining Indians to defined reservations was officially followed by successive federal governments and even as late as 1814 the Territory of Indiana had offered an Indian scalp bounty as an encouragement to the enterprise and bravery of its white European citizens.

Then in 1825 the reservations policy was tightened. From that time all reservations were to be west of the Mississippi in the dry and treeless land which whites were unsuited to, so that all fertile farming land would be available to white settlers. Wars, massacres and even deeper racial hatred were only to be expected. They happened on an appalling scale such as in the slaughter of all but 150 of about 1,000 Sauk Indians in 1832.

But perhaps the fate of the 17,000–strong Cherokee community demonstrates most clearly that in their cynical double-talk the Christian legislators of the United States were little different to either their European forebears and Protestant contemporaries or the Spanish and Portuguese Catholics of Latin America. The Cherokees had responded to both the efforts of missionaries and to the policies of the US federal government. They had settled and farmed their Georgian land and maintained schools. They had adopted a written constitution for their local government with legislative, executive and judicial arms corresponding to those of federal and state models. They had developed a written alphabet for their language, established a newspaper, the Cherokee Phoenix, and they had even translated parts of the Bible into Cherokee. Even so they still had to go. The white man’s congress authorized the War Department to shift them with $50,000 budgeted for their transport, a blanket each, rifles, kettles, fifty dollars in cash, a year's food supplies and five pounds of tobacco. Naturally the Indian's wouldn't budge. Georgia declared their laws void, denied them legal rights against whites and denied them the right to prospect for gold on their own land. Three white missionaries who backed the Cherokees felt the full force of their Christian white brothers' anger, serving four years hard labour for their trouble, and Federal law was changed to provide for the removal of Indian tribes by force without regard to existing treaties. When Federal Supreme Court Chief Justice John Marshall found in favour of the Cherokees in a case brought by them against Georgia the president, Andrew Jackson, refused to accept the decision. Seven thousand troops plus civilian "volunteers" were used to transport 14,000 Cherokees by force to Arkansas and Oklahoma, to confiscate their farm implements, livestock and household goods and to totally destroy their homes and settlements. Four thousand failed to reach their new "home." They got their chance for premature salvation instead.

Alabama and Mississippi followed Georgia's fine example and the "ceding" of tribal lands and the removal of eastern tribes to their new reserves was complete by 1846. Three years later administration of Indian affairs was transferred from the War Department to the Interior Department. The dissolving of Indian tribal societies and organizations was stepped up, a similar programme was enforced in the west coast states as in the eastern states and the foulest of racist attacks were used in parliament to justify a tribal shift whenever minerals or an area of farming potential was coveted by whites, especially after Darwin.⁴³

Then it was the Navahos' turn. They were pushed into their stony desolate reserves which the white man didn't want, to suffer malnutrition, unemployment, destitution and white man's diseases like all the rest. They couldn't resist. The nation was happy and of course the benevolent government cared for their interests through a treaty entitling them to royalties for minerals just in case any should be discovered. There they would have languished, seemingly forever. But there was coal and uranium beneath the stones and four generations later, when his greed and arrogance had got him into his twentieth century trouble in the triangle, the white man was to come back to take that too.

The Civil War and the new churchy morality hadn't changed things very much at all, except that the links between Protestant Christianity and Capitalism of the dynamic but exploitative new American model had been pulled tight. They had been pulled just as tight as the links between either pre-Reformation Catholicism or Orthodoxy of the Russian kind and power and privilege in Europe. The long-awaited 'social Reconstruction' of the American nation had begun very promptly after the close of the Civil War but by the nature of the problems to be tackled it had to go hand in hand with economic Reconstruction. Too little thought was given to the interaction between the two.

If, as the popular sentiment ran, America was God's own country being built by the new chosen people then government control over the individual's actions was hardly necessary. Christian liberty was, by that reasoning, to be equated to freedom of action and contract.

Unequal private accumulation of wealth was therefore a natural and proper aspect of community life subject only to the judgement of the market place. The government's role was to assist new ventures and economic growth and to open up opportunities for the exploitation of resources. It was not the government's place to interfere with private innovation.

Free or very easy settlement and exploitation of timber, stone, coal, minerals and oil had already started in the north and west under the Homestead Act and with the end of the war it took off in the South as well. High tariff barriers were put up and speculation was encouraged by an inequitable policy of indirect or consumer taxation without income or inheritance taxes. There were big gains to be made by successful risk takers while the burden of national development was carried by farmers and labourers. The country was thrown open to immigration and persecuted Jews and Christians alike from Poland, Lithuania, Hungary and other countries of Europe arrived in droves. Their hope was to set up small business or to settle on the land, (unwittingly in place of Indians), but more often than not they had little option but to live in overcrowded, unsanitary slums prone to crime while they provided factory fodder for the new breed of industrial capitalists who were gradually replacing the mercantile capitalists and landed gentry as the real controllers of the United States.⁴⁴

It was serious that the tensions the migrants already faced were complicated by the ethnic mixing bowl and periodic recessions into which they were thrown. Interfaith and ethnic conflict and ghettoism tended to develop. But on top of that the southern plantation system had begun to collapse as a way of life with the end of the civil war and two other very contentious issues had to be faced as well. One was how to manage and develop the economy of the southern states under a new order. The other was the relationship between the black African former slaves and the white European property owners and businessmen. Unfortunately the attitude of prominent Protestant churchmen towards these issues and their role in the Reconstruction period helped to roll all of the issues into one big untidy ball. They became camouflaged behind a facade of economic development so rapid that the United States and the philosophy and domestic policies which it pursued became sought after as a pattern by envious countries around the world. Within a few generations the United States was being promoted in spite of all its pimples as the ultimate in a Christian community. Politicians, businessmen and the church competed for space on the band wagon.

WAYLAND'S CHRISTIAN ECONOMY ...

During the critical period when the study and practice of economics was evolving into a separate recognized discipline, or science, Protestant churchmen were prominent among America's economic theorists. It seemed natural for those trained in theology to look at the "laws" by which social and community arrangements were affected from the standpoint that there was a providential intelligence at work. They were picking up the threads worked by the Church of England and the establishment to prop each other up with the Protestant Work Ethic in the wake of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars. The Rev. Francis Wayland who later became professor of moral philosophy and president of Broun University had already given an indication of what was to come with The Elements of Political Economy, first published in 1837, some years before the Civil War. After the war it was taken as a pattern by a series of other ministers holding similar academic posts.

According to Wayland those who laboured were fulfilling an established law of man's being, and property was founded on the will of God, as made known by natural science, by general consequences, and by revelation. He wrote that God assigned rich and abundant rewards for the industrious but that the results which the Creator attached to idleness were all to be considered as punishments.

The Rev. Francis Bowen, professor of natural religion, moral philosophy and civil polity at Harvard College took those lines of reasoning even further during the Reconstruction period. He wrote that the real author and governor of society was divine; that men cannot interfere with His complex and delicate machine without marring it; that attempts by legislators to direct the industry of society away from its natural and self-chosen channels or to increase or decrease market supplies or prices would almost invariably cause harm; and that God regulates them by his general laws.

Protestant clergymen, writers and politicians, unable to distinguish man's manipulation of migration policies, taxation laws and resources policies from the positive hand of God, added their own touch to such views in pulpits, periodicals and presidential elections. The world was told that Protestant sobriety, thrift and devotion to one's labour set apart God's elect, paved the way to Salvation and enabled man to overcome Original Sin and achieve a Christian life. Grace, according to Henry Ward Beecher, was achievable through personal effort and service. Good stuff. Or at least it was just what the capitalists wanted to hear. A part of the accumulated untaxed profit from uninhibited and quite often ill-gotten gain began to flow into good works like community welfare programmes, family and child care societies, schools for Negroes, chapels for the poor and, of course, foreign missions in countries where there were markets or resources to be won. Wealth, according to the preachers, was a sign of Divine approval just as poverty and unemployment were signs that people had failed in their struggle with Original Sin. Or as Bishop William Lawrence saw it, material prosperity was favourable to morality.⁴⁵

... AND CHURCH GROWTH

The Protestant churches grew from financial strength to financial strength. Naturally. It was quite consistent with their new doctrine and proved that they were having a good influence on the United States. Similarly, very few people voiced any disapproval when clergymen took public relations jobs with resource-exploitative corporations such as John D. Rockefeller's notorious Standard Oil. As time passed, thinking people did begin to question the links between the church and such companies with their unethical activities although it was at least a generation before cracks began to show in the alliance, somewhat longer before the "tainted money” incident caught the national headlines, and even longer before the “Social Gospel” became an accepted part of American Protestantism.

But during those soul-searching Reconstruction years few pulpit-polishing Protestants noted the further drift in interpretation of the Biblical concept of justification by faith through God’s grace. They were more inclined to be impressed by the fact that it was a distinct, apparently successful and therefore correct departure from papal attempts to get people back onto the sacramental track via the kind invitation to Vatican I. It probably didn’t occur to them, either, that there were interesting similarities between their Salvation through money-into-church-good works approach and the papal money-into-indulgences approach. But they did know that their theologians and their economists were chanting the same chorus: the more the world advanced, the faster it could advance. The world would reach its ultimate state according to the acceleration which is part of the nature of things if man and governments stood aside and didn’t interfere.

So during those critical Reconstruction years everyone stood aside and let the successful new northern industrial capitalists have free rein and determine the thrust of national policies. Whistling the Battle Hymn of the Republic with a cleft tongue all the way to Capitol Hill and the bank, they tried to impose Negro emancipation and voting rights on the south, under armed military supervision, by withholding both development capital and a range of white electoral rights until full equality had been established. It must have been obvious to the concerned thinking public – even if not to the churches which were propping up the system – that such sanctions were to the economic advantage of the north, that reconciliation between the Union and Confederate states would be undermined and not enhanced and that the south would be shaken by continued discord. It all happened. Race hatred swept the south which responded to the federal policies with an equally cleft tongue. Many important reforms were introduced but no real effort was made to redistribute land so, with capital funds withheld, development which could have provided jobs was slow, Negro unemployment was high, corruption in government was widespread and social distress was a fact of life.

Slavery had not provided a base for either assimilation or self-supporting community development within the Negro population and inadequate services, provided by unwilling state governments at the point of a barrel, did little to help. The Ku Klux Klan sprang up, apparently as an organization of worthy, responsible white gentlemen with the aim of preserving and recovering white rights rather than of suppressing Negroes, but it is said to have come under the control of rowdies and drunkards and to have changed course completely. Efforts by the founders to disband the Klan failed and it was soon spreading terror and hatred by whipping, tarring and feathering, and lynching. The sadism and torture which were soon a part of the southern scene rivalled the worst excesses of the Inquisition.

MISSIONS OR MISERY?

On one hand the Reconstruction period had spawned a rash of Christian foreign missions intimately linked with the new American Protestant Ethic and the successful new version of American Capitalism which was catching the world's attention. But on the other hand it had spawned racial bigotry without precedent.

Before and during the Civil War pro-slavery propagandists had been happy to portray the Negro in a condition for which God had fashioned him, childlike in his helplessness, willing to be led and even loyal and devoted to slave owners who were virtuous, humane and motivated by the highest sentiments. To abolitionists he had been the pathetic victim of a cruel system, but not necessarily the equal of the white man into whose society he had been thrust. However under enforced social Reconstruction the Negro's characteristics suddenly changed. H.R. Helper, US Consul to Buenos Aires after the war, was opposed to slavery as the basis of an economic system, but he described the Negro as incapable of adapting to citizenship, with vile and vomit-promoting stench, and only worthy of being recolonized abroad (together with Chinese) or even of being exterminated if Providence willed. He poured contempt on the "Negro kissers" who promoted Negro equality in Congress.⁴⁶

Unfortunately Helper was not an isolated example of a government official who held such views. They were common. President Lincoln had gone into the Civil War deeply committed to the view that the United States was for whites only and that emancipation of the Negro slaves had to be coupled with their total recolonization elsewhere. He had publicly affirmed his belief in white superiority and his view that physical differences would forever forbid social or political equality and intermarriage. But he was opposed to the use of Liberia which was popularly mooted as a site for recolonization because the climate was unhealthy and, more to the point, because the cost of transporting a large population between five and six thousand miles was too high. He considered both Panama and Colombia but when his investigations became known several Central American governments protested vigorously. Facing such opposition and recognizing the enormity of the task, (transporting a few tribes of Indians half way across the US paled into insignificance alongside it), Lincoln changed his approach. Half way through the war he began moving towards the granting of political rights to Negroes as well as emancipation.⁴⁷

It took nine years after the war for Congress to pass the last of the Reconstruction measures and it was another three years (1877) before federal enforcement troops were withdrawn from the south. It was then from ten to fifteen years before several of the southern states began dismantling the Reconstruction and disenfranchising Negroes by indirect, devious means. And it was not until the shock of World War I, a generation later, that federal courts declared the discriminatory state legislation invalid and the Reconstruction process rolled forward again.⁴⁸

One aspect of the race question had been laid to rest but certainly it was not the end of the question, either for Negroes or for people of other races. Other aspects had arisen to complicate the issue and to produce in the United States a multi-racial population with some massive hangups. Among the most important were Chinese migration into California with the 1849 gold rush and the Jewish refugee influx from Eastern Europe. And of course as the pressure of World War I helped to dismantle one issue, others, including the German and Jewish questions, intruded to complicate the picture.

It was only during the 1920s that a better understanding of race and a greater degree of racial tolerance began to develop as anthropology became accepted as more than a curiosity and as biologists and educationists gained more confidence and published their research assessments. One of the triggers for that development was the intervention of the band of Jewish Film producers who had all migrated with their parents or been born to migrant families during the traumatic period from 1861 to 1894 which coincided with the Reconstruction Period. Eager for full assimilation but refused financial assistance or support by WASP banks and film trusts in New York ⁴⁹ they naturally turned to Jewish financiers and, refused membership of university and social clubs in California ⁵⁰ they turned increasingly to tight knit communities of Jews in Hollywood and Los Angeles, even though there was antagonism between those two communities for a long time. ⁵¹

JEWISH PATRIOTISM ... AND ROSE TINTED SPECTACLES

During World War One all the Jewish-controlled motion picture companies readily supported the government's recruiting campaign as a patriotic gesture. One company, controlled by Zukor, produced what were in reality little more than propaganda films. Another, Warner Brothers, produced a film on venereal diseases for the army. ⁵² They followed that, at the end of the war, with a film which "appealed primarily to the American post war jingoism and blood lust" ⁵³ It followed that as a consequence of a lack of formal constraints on the media industries, the companies aimed to use their facilities to promote their personal moral values through their productions. ⁵⁴ Regardless of their good intentions this brought further anti-Semitic attacks such as in Henry Ford's I in 1921.

The movies are "Jew-controlled, not in spots only, not 50 per cent merely, but entirely; with the natural consequence that now the world is in arms against the trivializing and demoralising influences of that form of entertainment as presently managed.... As soon as the Jews gained control of the "movies," we had a movie problem, the consequences of which are not yet visible. It is the genius of that race to create problems of a moral character in whatever business they achieve a majority." ⁵⁵

This meant that as much as they might choose to avoid it the Jewish-controlled companies produced films in reaction to the social isolation imposed on them, and these illustrated what they expected in the land of their dreams. While the WASP controlled companies produced films which portrayed the natural superiority and success of the WASP communities, to which migrants, including Jews, and even blacks were welcome if they recognized their subordinate roles and played according to WASP rules, the Jewish studios produced films which exemplified the need for racial tolerance and integration, the right of the oppressed, and which championed the success of the underdog. Harry Warner has been described as “the self-appointed conscience of the family” and tirelessly and “often tiresomely” Messianic about racial and religious prejudices.⁵⁶ Many of those films projected the starry-eyed view of what life could be in America: the good life, escape from torment and oppression, freedom as a matter of course, and unrestricted human rights. They did not portray America as it was. They swamped reality with the dream of what it might be like and the Great American Dream gradually became the basis of American self-understanding.⁵⁷ That self-understanding masked reality, including the concept of the Protestant Work Ethic and, helped along by politicians and controllers of commerce who all found it a wonderful platform for voter and consumer support, it perpetuated the myth of the New Israel – or the new “chosen people.”

There were certainly differences between the film companies. The Warner Brothers were opposed to assimilation. While others sought to appease the WASP establishment, Warner Brothers set themselves against the establishment and challenged its legitimacy.⁵⁸ But as a group, the Jewish industry leaders became increasingly conscious of the bonds between America’s Jewish communities and those in Europe.

So although America and the Western World were gradually moving towards a position in which they should have understood Peter’s vision of the unclean food, the church’s doctrines and its self-understanding had become almost unshakably entrenched and had obscured that vision. Racial bigotry which had been carried to the New World with the first ship had been compounded by the policies and actions of both the church and the European colonial powers in their unholy collaboration. The young American nation had an opportunity to make a fresh start and to reject the racist attitudes with which it had been infected at birth and it also had a strong incentive to do so as it struggled to establish its identity and its role in the world. It had come close to grasping the opportunity at the time of independence but unfortunately it had let it slip.

Although subsequent generations of ordinary American settlers would have shown a remarkable degree of enlightenment if they had acted any differently, it is reasonable to expect that, in view of the divinely inspired role which it claimed for itself, the church and its leaders should have known better. In this respect there are a number of other events and actions by the United States, Europe’s colonial powers and their ally, the church, which were helping to set the world stage for the unfolding trouble in the triangle and they must be considered together with the struggle for national reconstruction in which the people of America were still bitterly embroiled.

TIME FOR INDIA’S RECONSTRUCTION

India also, was embroiled in a form of national reconstruction under British crown rule imposed after the Sepoy revolt (or the Indian Mutiny) of 1857 which, to Indians, has always been a war of independence.⁵⁹ The huge subcontinent had progressed quietly for over a thousand years before the fall of Constantinople spurred European Christian powers, with Portugal in the papal vanguard, into colonizing India via the sea route around Africa. It had attracted a series of invasions but had shown no tendency to foreign expansion itself. The brilliance and strength of its princely Hindu civilization, best known to the rest of the world for the segregation or disunity of its caste structure, had ebbed and flowed over almost 3,000 years. It had reached its lowest point in the tenth century when moral decadence was common among the upper classes and feudalism crept into the self-supporting villages. Strong centralized empires broke down and this encouraged the harsh Turkish Muslim invasions which followed. But, stimulated by a new awareness of the love of a Supreme and Divine Being through the writings of Ramanuja, Hindu thought and culture survived, adapted to and accommodated the Muslim invasions and reached new heights in a great revival in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries while the power and influence of the Muslim Mughal dynasty was also at its height.

Unfortunately that revival coincided with the beginning of European encroachment and it wasn't long before political, commercial and military competition between the intruders, each pursuing its own brand of colonial exploitation, began to undermine the political and community structures, productivity and stability of the great nation. India had enjoyed far greater stability and harmony than Europe had been able to maintain since Pompey stormed Jerusalem and religious conflict had become a standard factor in Europe's affairs.

At the time of the fall of Constantinople the population of the Indian subcontinent was greater than that of the European subcontinent but it was being rapidly overhauled.⁶⁰ Naturally both subcontinents were affected by occasional droughts and famines, by uneven population growth and by the pressures which result from regional differences in productivity and capacity to support a growing population. However the responses to such things by the people of the two regions were very different, largely because of the differences between the philosophies which were dominant in them, intertwined with both government policies and religious observance. When famine occurred in Europe there was a prompt surge in emigration which put all sections of the community and government under pressure to find solutions to avoid conflict, such as colonization and wars for food or resource producing land. But when famine occurred in areas of high population density in India the prevailing attitudes towards life and death and the caste system worked against both migration and government intervention. The result was human distress on an appalling scale and even mass suicide.⁶¹ The ammunition was ready made for those who wanted to take advantage of Malthus and Darwin.

Apart from Mughal imperial efforts to achieve common ground between each of the religions which were then present in India, including Akbar's 'Divine Faith' of 1582, several independent efforts were made by teachers and philosophers to bring together the principal beliefs of Islam and Hinduism. Their work was much more systematic and reasoned than the process of political syncretism in which the Christian church had surreptitiously engaged throughout its history. The work of Nanak (1469–1538) pre-dated Akbar and was outstanding in both perception and impact, and provided the basis for the Sikh religion.

Of course the papacy was also very busy during Nanak's life time. It was trying to eliminate the pre-Messianic Aztec religion from Mexico and to eliminate both of its Messianic partners,

Judaism and Islam, from Portugal. At the same time it was trying to beat off Erasmus, Luther and their colleagues in Europe to avoid a reassessment of its own doctrines and its self-understanding. Its efforts were in sharp contrast to those of Nanak who was working at the very same time to relate the rigid monotheism of Messianic Islam to the philosophical truths of his pre-Messianic Hinduism. His ideas were put into scriptural form a few years later by Arju but, unfortunately, persecution by the Mughals, who were still trying to achieve religious accord by their own methods, led the Sikhs to develop a military and tribal base for their community. This became a factor in later struggles and led eventually to the establishment of a separate Sikh state.^{62 63 64}

India already had immense trading capacity before the fall of Constantinople and it was happy to trade with anyone who came its way by land or sea. But although it had some 3,500 miles of coastline forming two sides of a triangle jutting towards the Equator midway between the Horn of Africa and South East Asia, and although it was isolated from the main land mass of Asia by massive mountain ranges with very few passes, it had never developed its maritime potential. This, coupled with stories of wealth and splendour which were carried overland with spices, pearls, precious stones, laces and fine fabrics via the trade routes which Europe could not control, encouraged Europe's powers to want a piece of the Indian action – quite apart from the pope's eagerness for eastern alliances to support a twin pronged assault on the seat of Islam.

The demand for goods when Europe's traders arrived by sea naturally stimulated production in all fields, especially hand loom fabrics, hand crafts, jewelry and precious metals, spices and crops for fibre and sugar. Even the conflicts generated by the traders, troops and theologians couldn't stop the progress during the sixteenth and seventeenth century. But when trading posts turned into land grabs and then into European colonies, with India's hereditary rulers relegated to the role of vassals, the picture began to change. The British East India Company was established under Royal Charter in 1599 and it was based in India from 1633. At that stage India held a position of proud supremacy in trade and industry as the pre-capitalist workshop of the world but the East India Company soon put an end to that. The company's conduct and administration became so questionable that in 1773 the British parliament split its absolute authority under Royal Charter and sent a governor-general, Chief Justice and three English judges to share responsibility with it in territories which were then under its control. However attempts to apply English law in a completely different cultural setting and with the same heavy-handed mentality which kept the convict ships sailing for Australia proved catastrophic. The administration rode slip shod over Hindu ethics, customs and religious beliefs. The first governor-general, Warren Hastings, used oppressive force to reduce Indian hereditary rulers into abject submission to the company but some justice was done when, on returning to England, he was impeached by the House of Lords.

THE BRITISH EXPAND, DIVIDE AND RULE

Lord Cornwallis, the next formal appointee as governor-general, tried to stop the rot with some reforms to the company's administration, its mercantile policies and the army but his complete rejection of, and isolation from, both Hindu and Muslim leadership groups counteracted his efforts. Christian arrogance and assumptions of superiority showed through every action under his regime. All higher posts in administration were reserved for Europeans while Hindus and Muslims were eligible only for menial clerical positions. A new caste of alien, white, Christian rulers had been established. However his most devastating action was his reform of the land tenure systems. At the stroke of a pen, for convenience in collecting English-style land taxes, he destroyed the traditional system of hereditary land occupancy and replaced it with absolute tenure with confiscation on default of tax payment. When successive governors-general set about a series of wars of expansion which brought some four fifths of India under British control within two generations they imposed the same land tenure system. The result was that about twenty million small land holders were dispossessed and turned into serf-like subjects of a new landed aristocracy. The basis of India's rural community had been destroyed and its agriculture was in chaos.

The country was rapidly being reduced to such a state that even Britain could see its interests at risk from the unrest. At that stage British fear of Russian intervention in India via the Afghanistan route was growing to the point of imbalance and obsession and a hostile anti-British movement was seen as a possible encouragement for such a Russian adventure.⁶⁵ A similar fear of French intervention in collaboration with Persia had been laid to rest with the final fall of Napoleon. After the Napoleonic Wars, when Britain was able to strengthen its grip on India at everyone else's expense, the British East India Company assumed an even more dominant role.

Of course, according to most British officials and politicians, the state of the country was not Britain's fault, it was all a matter of Indian incompetence. But there were a few people, like Sir Thomas Munro, who called for a policy of British non interference in Indian affairs. The Indians could, he believed, run their affairs very well if Britain was prepared to simply protect them and the country would recover very quickly. Englishmen should, he told them, drop their fanatical idea that no country could be saved without English institutions.⁶⁶ Branded a romantic, Munro was ignored and in the 1830s an accelerated programme of educational and cultural Anglicization was undertaken as a means of pacification. But the pacification process was very slow. Military defence in depth was seen as the answer. This could perhaps have been achieved by treaties with friendly border provinces but the long established colonial mentality which Britain was ruthlessly pursuing was hardly consistent with treaties which implied equality with remnant Hindu, Sikh and Muslim rulers. In addition the growing antagonism towards the white Christian overlords as a consequence of British policy hardly augured well for such treaties. Annexation seemed to be Britain's solution. But then it decided to have "a bob each way." Showing an appalling lack of understanding of the situation and of the relationships which it was continuing to undermine, but with its eyes wide open, Britain galloped headlong into one of history's monumental blunders.

In attempts to set up a series of friendly rulers (puppets would be more accurate) and to manipulate the border between India and Afghanistan to ensure control of the Khyber Pass, Britain triggered a series of wars with the Afghans and the Sikhs of the Punjab. Anti-Muslim sentiment, and the return of a set of sandalwood gates thought to be those stolen from the sacred temple of Somnath by Sultan Mahmud about nine hundred years earlier, was used to whip up Hindu support for the British cause. (Shades of Heraclius and the "true cross", Chapter 7, p. 16). In the middle of it all the Muslim region of Kashmir was annexed and sold to the Hindu dynasty of Gulab Singh. The Kashmir question remained, latent, ready to surface together with the Sikh question in the Punjab, until Britain would finally be forced out of India and the relationship between Hindu and Muslim communities could be resolved.

Then came the Crimean War and British fears about Russia's interests in India increased. Pacification had to be speeded up. Among the measures introduced was a two-for-one subsidy for any voluntary organization which cared to operate schools at which English was taught. The well established church-state establishment alliance came to the fore again. The churches in England were both eager and geared to take advantage of the opportunity and schools appeared everywhere, teaching English of course, but also teaching denominational Christianity and the attitudes towards Islam and Hinduism which went with it.

TIME TO BITE THE BULLET ... IN FAITH

The smell of revolt filled the air. The princes whose states had already been annexed and those who felt threatened had had enough. The small landholders who had been dispossessed had had enough and so had big ones holding land under dubious titles. Religious leaders could see undisguised attacks on every aspect of Indian culture and the structures of society in every British regulation and in every new school. The focal point of rebellion when it came in 1857 was the introduction of the new Enfield rifle and the need to bite each cartridge in loading it. They were greased and the probability was that the animal fats used included cow and pig fat. The cow being sacred to Hindus and the pig being unclean to Muslims, this was believed by many religious leaders to be another deliberate effort to denigrate their religions, although it may have been simply an administrative indiscretion. However it was a very effective focal point around which to draw together all those opposed to continued British rule and within weeks of the first shot being fired rebellion was sweeping much of northern India.

Delhi fell to the revolt in May and the Sepoys proclaimed the old king, Bahadur Shah, Emperor of India. In town after town old scores were settled and Europeans were massacred in large numbers. Then the tide began to turn and Delhi was retaken in September. English vengeance knew no bounds. The total slaughter of everyone found within the city walls recalled the fate of Jerusalem at the hands of the Crusaders. India was to be taught a lesson. Britain was in India to stay. And so was the church. When the British parliament revoked the authority of the East India Company and assumed direct imperial rule in 1858 Queen Victoria, later proclaimed Empress of India as well as Defender of the Faith, declared that "...firmly relying ourselves on the truth of Christianity ... we disclaim alike the right and desire to impose our convictions ..." and also that "... we desire no extension of our territorial possessions ..." Both sentiments were somewhat hollow and both were jettisoned at the first opportunity.

There was somewhat more sincerity in her declaration that Britain wanted to restore internal tranquillity, to promote works of public utility and improvement, and to administer the government for the benefit of all residents. "In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security" she said. Quite right. But there were still plenty of hollow words in her declaration, especially that Britain wanted to stimulate peaceful industry and that India's gratitude would be Britain's best reward.⁶⁷ A second European Christian version of India's reconstruction was about to begin. There was a long way to go. In just three generations the entire community and social structure of a great nation had disintegrated or been shattered under the impact of the policies and actions of the country which now proposed a second reconstruction. India had been reduced from its position of preeminence as a trading nation to a semidestitute plantation for raw materials for Europe's factories and a dumping ground for cheap manufactures from the new mass production factories of the industrialized capitalist west. It had reverted to a feudal society kept in subjection by the rifle and bitter antagonism was being generated between Hindus and Muslims by both the denigration of their customs and social structures and a policy of divide and rule.⁶⁸

NO COMPETITION ALLOWED

The hypocrisy and ruthlessness in the actions of Britain's traders and troops made a mockery of Victoria's declaration that the colonial authorities would stimulate peaceful industry. The fate of Dacca's fine weaving industry illustrates this. One of the attractions of trade with India which encouraged intense European colonial competition for access and control of the country was its finely woven fabrics, especially silk. A key centre for the cottage industry was Dacca, in East Bengal, (now Dhaka, the capital of Bangladesh), where the skills of hand loom weaving had been passed from generation to generation for many centuries. The country became part of Britain's India with Robert Clive's victory in the battle of Palassy in 1757, just as the Seven Years War moved into its second year. The demand for quality fabrics was rising sharply, control of a major supply in Bengal was exactly in line with colonial policy, and Britain's traders were very happy indeed with their Bengali servants. But then Britain's cotton milling capacity began its tenfold sky-rocket rise in 25 years under the stimulus of both the Seven Years War and the dramatic increase in cotton production in the American colonies which had been made possible by the slave trade. Bengal's situation changed. Its weavers were no longer skilled, respected suppliers of fine fabrics. They were dastardly fiends in competition with the cotton mills of Manchester both on the British market and in their home country. They were no longer playing the proper role of good subordinate colonial servants. Weaving had to stop.

Britain now wanted only raw material plus an export market for its manufactured goods in India, a colony which had been a major supplier. But of course its importers did not want to sacrifice their trade so the millers and the colonial authorities took another tack. It is extremely difficult to operate a hand loom without a thumb so people found weaving were 'discouraged' from continuing their trade by having a thumb chopped off. Bengal's cottage weaving industry slumped and Manchester got more raw material as well as exports of manufactured goods back to India.

The possible motives behind that action require some thought, especially as it is not clear whether the mutilation was carried out at the direction of magistrates or indiscriminately at the whim of British commercial interests. The population of East Bengal was, and still is, more than eighty per cent Muslim. Hand and foot mutilation is authorized under Islamic religious law, Sharia, for certain offences and this has long been a matter of revulsion and an excuse to denigrate Islam among Christians. They have selective memories when it comes to the torture chambers of the Inquisition, the destruction of civilizations and the use of the stake. This is different. This is Islam. If the British acted as they did in Bengal backed up by trade regulations, on the basis that it was an appropriate penalty understood by the people of the dominant religion of the region, then it was a back-handed compliment to the junior partner in the triangle and an admission that 'we British Christians cannot enforce our regulations without using your teaching.' If on the other hand it was a purely punitive commercial action which the authorities chose to ignore, then it is a damning indictment of both the authorities and those who did it and exposes colonial practice yet again as inhumane exploitation based on greed. In either case the action further undermined India, poisoned relations between the colonizer and the colonized, inflamed passions and contributed to the build up of the trouble in the triangle.

CHINA'S TURN

But India's neighbours were in trouble too. A European Christian version of China's reconstruction was also being pressed hard in 1858 and European minds, great and small alike, would soon be applied to the reconstruction of Africa as well. It was that year that British and French gun barrels, pointed at the Chinese emperor in Tientsin, had extracted a declaration of religious tolerance; Napoleon III's infamous agreement for Catholic missions' property rights; and an agreement for Western diplomatic missions to reside permanently in Peking with ministerial status.⁶⁹

The proud Chinese of the Ch'ing dynasty had not liked what they saw as they were forced into more and more direct contact with Europe's bickering powers after the fall of Constantinople and Vasco da Gama's 1498 trip to India. They had an older and more highly developed civilization, a system of ethics which had stood the test of time and good justification for regarding Europeans as outrageous barbarians. After all, the Portuguese kidnappers, plunderers and blackmailers who arrived to set up a fortress trading post near Canton in 1517, just after Gianfrancesco Pico had made his scathing attack on papal morality at the Fifth Lateran Council, were the official channel for papal-sponsored investment from all of Europe. If they were a fair sample of it, the Chinese could be excused for regarding Christianity as a somewhat inferior system.

For a couple of centuries China succeeded in restricting European traders to the single port of Canton. It also succeeded in maintaining an arm's length relationship with their governments which were required to pay tribute to the emperor for the privilege of trading with China. But gradually the position changed. After the Napoleonic Wars Britain emerged as the dominant Canton trader with the United States a long way back in second place and France, Holland, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Denmark and the papacy also present. They all wanted to break the system and widen their trading prospects, but especially Britain. The opportunity came with a pretty little poppy.

YOUR OPIUM AND A TREATY, OR WAR!

Opium had been used as a painkilling drug in Chinese medicine long before seaborne Europeans began to intrude but, because it was known to be a very destructive drug of addiction, it was never smoked and its use was strictly controlled. Then came Spanish American traders bringing tobacco from Mexico.⁷⁰ Tobacco smoking was soon an accepted social habit in southern China and it was a very short jump by the line of "if one, why not the other" reasoning from tobacco to opium. An illegal trade in distress and terror developed rapidly. Chinese efforts to control or suppress it failed. Confident that China was too far away for the trade to pose a problem at home, and ignoring all pleas for support to stamp it out on moral grounds, the self-styled superior Christian government of Britain saw it as an opportunity to extract other trade and political benefits as well as quick cash flow. In 1839 it demanded a piece of the opium action at gun point.

The opium war dragged on for almost four years and out of it came the Treaty of Nanking. Britain gained Hong Kong, trade and residency rights at five ports instead of one,⁷¹ and twenty one million Mexican dollars in indemnities to cover the cost of the war and lost trade.⁷² Out of it also came a highly organized criminal drug running racket which could no longer be stamped out either with or without Britain's cooperation. Its legacy is crime, distress and the threat of community disintegration in many countries without regard to their level of technical advancement but, chiefly in the affluent West. Humiliated, China had to sign similar treaties with the United States and France in 1844. Anti-foreign and anti-Christian sentiment increased. So did the Western appetite for Chinese concessions, and it was only fourteen years before those British and French "negotiators" arrived for more talks.

Actually the Chinese refused to ratify the 1858 agreement covering equality of status for diplomatic missions so the British and French returned two years later with 41 British and 60 French warships, 10,500 British troops, 143 troop transports and a coolie corps of 2,500 Cantonese.⁷³ Having had a successful scrap with a Chinese imperial army, a few scuffles over a captured negotiator and lots of excitement in looting and destroying the emperor's summer palace, the negotiators left. They were well satisfied with ratification of the 1858 treaties, increased indemnities for loss of Roman Catholic church properties, almost uninhibited trade access to the whole Chinese empire and a hunk of the Kowloon Peninsula, adjacent to Hong Kong, for Britain.⁷⁴

Of course there were hawks in the Western countries who believed that China should be totally subjugated and colonized just like any other part of the world. Why, they asked, should it be treated any differently to other countries which existed to supply resources for Europe and its Christian offspring? Basically the reason that Britain opposed that line and insisted on treaty arrangements with China was simply the impracticability of subjugating an empire as advanced and as powerful as China. The West should simply use its technical and military superiority to extract what it wanted. Britain and France would have first bite of the Chinese cherry and then the USA, Russia and other European powers were welcome to scramble for the crumbs under the table.

In fact Russia's General Ignatiev outsmarted Britain's Lord Elgin and France's Baron Gros in that round of negotiations and, by superior knowledge of China and adroit diplomacy achieved the position of mediator. He stayed on after they left for home with their spoils, residing in the Russian Orthodox ecclesiastical mission of course, and secured the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Peking. In addition to confirming previous treaties which had been in dispute, this ceded to Russia the Maritime Province between Manchuria and the Pacific coast. It meant that Russian territory then stretched right to the base of the Korean Peninsula. But more important to Russia than the territory it had gained was the fact that within a few years of the Crimean War it had confirmed its right to the port of Vladivostok. It could hardly be called a warm water port in the Mediterranean sense but at least there was the prospect of keeping it open to trade for most of the year.⁷⁵

CHRISTIAN SACRAMENTS IN PLACE OF A CONFUCIAN CREED

The Western European powers were still clinging to the doctrinal statements of their respective churches, even if they paid only lip-service to the Gospel in framing their laws. They were therefore very happy to act on their agreed task to carry Christianity around the world while they could benefit from doing so and they continued to denigrate any culture which was neither European or of their particular brand of Christianity. On that basis they were hell bent on Europeanizing China and expected the emperor to dismantle two thousand years of development in culture and ethics.⁷⁶ It meant nothing to them that Rome had botched up its opportunities to carry the Messianic message across the Orient through its contacts with the Great Khans and they may not have even known of its attempts to develop an alliance with the Mongols with the aim of eliminating Islam. Their own religious bigotry was so deep-seated that if they had known about it they probably would have seen nothing inconsistent in their nineteenth century posture.

Certainly there were things to criticize in Eastern cultures. There was barbarism in the Chinese imperial practice of maintaining court eunuchs, for example, just as there was barbarism in the Hindu practice of widow burning. But, as in the case of the much more barbarous religious rites of the Aztecs, there was no justification for the church and its props using pre-Messianic barbarism, or worse, to eliminate pre-Messianic philosophies and religions which had well founded systems of person-to-person relations. However, as if to support its claim that there was some justification, the church was still actively tearing itself and the nation apart with the methods of the Inquisition in the bulwark of New World Christendom, Spain.⁷⁷ (The Inquisition had been re-established after Napoleon's demise but was officially discontinued in 1834, barely 20 years later.) And of course twenty years later that 'justification' would be officially confirmed when the pope proclaimed the writings of Thomas Aquinas to be the authorized basis of Catholic theology.

By imperial decree the Sacred Edict of sixteen points based on teachings of Confucius and covering social conduct, livelihood, education and peace and order had to be read and expounded like a sermon to every community in China twice each month. In practice that wasn't much different to the approach in England where religious "truths" were to be instilled into the community on a cyclical basis by act of parliament. In concept the Edict was like a Chinese Ten Commandments but without any reference to God's absolute authority or to the honour due to God. It was, in influence, certainly a politically and socially conservative document. But it was no more so than the liturgy of the Church of England, (especially when the effort by the church and the establishment to develop the Protestant Work Ethic is considered), and it didn't even demand prayers for the person of the imperial majesty.^{78 79}

But it was not Christian, so vigorous efforts were made to denigrate it and to flood China with missions and missionaries. The intruders had technical and military superiority on their side, as in all of the countries which were suddenly being engulfed by a wave of Western influence and interference. It was therefore quite natural that superiority in those fields should imply, as it had so often in the past, some Divine benevolence in their favour or some superiority of religious belief. Westerners generally and the missionaries in particular lost no opportunities to press that implication.

A DECLARATION OF TOLERANCE

When the Chinese emperor issued his declaration of religious tolerance the population of his empire was between one quarter and one third of the entire world population. Trade opportunities from China's enforced contact with the west were, of course, a two-way affair but the benefits were weighted heavily in favour of the west both in resources to be gained and in potential markets to be supplied.⁸⁰ And while the church was eager to have a go at the immense target population and to make up for previous ruined opportunities, its colleagues in trade and government in Europe had another motive for wanting it in China with them as well as their doctrinal pretensions. It was the old issue of political stability through religious conformity. This had clearly been a factor in Britain's policy of divide-and-rule in its dealings with faiths already established in India while it encouraged Anglicization by every available means.

Western Europeans generally, and Vatican strategists in particular, were very conscious that several waves of “heathen invaders” had swept into Europe from Asia. It was quite clear that although they were holding the upper hand in the nineteenth century the military position could again be reversed. They knew that after their devastating early invasions the Mongols thrusting north of the Black Sea had reached an understanding and coexisted quite well with the Russians and their Orthodox Christianity. But they also knew that the other Mongol thrust, south of the Black Sea, had eventually lost contact with Rome.

They had adopted Islam and mingled, by conquest, with the Turks who had carried the main determined wave of Islam through Afghanistan and into India, strengthening the Arab Muslim position in the East Indies as well. Now that China had again come face to face with the world around her it was vital that her religious affiliations should be with Western Europe. There wasn’t a Prester John reigning somewhere in the Orient for the church to link up with but there was a very strong Muslim presence in both the northwest and southwest. If China were to become linked to the religions of either of those earlier Mongol movements, and if the political or military balance were to shift in their favour, then the West could be in trouble. Yes. The politicians and traders were happy to have the church along for the ride, as long as it didn’t rock the boat again.

AFRICA: OPEN COMPETITION

So the reconstruction of China got underway and Europe’s Christian powers could turn their attention to the immense and little-known continent of Africa. It had been a wonderful source of slaves but the market for human beings had dried up almost completely as a result of all the international intrigue and bickering. Until Napoleon began his big shakeup Europeans had hardly penetrated beyond a fifty mile coastal strip around Africa.^{81 82}

Slave and general trading posts and Christian missions, usually associated, were confined to the coast with a few exceptions such as along the Senegal, Niger and Congo basins, in Angola and, in particular, along the Zambezi River. It was there that Portuguese and Christianized Goan adventurers had settled at the gold-rich Monomotapa court and negotiated, with little success, for missionaries and merchants to be taken to the legendary mines of Zimbabwe. The Nile Valley through Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia was historically well known, as were the portions of Morocco and Algeria north of the Atlas Mountains. But it was only in the strategically important and temperate, southernmost wedge of the continent, around which ships had to pass and where they preferred to reprovision on the route to and from the east, that serious attempts at inland settlement had been made. Even the Cape had not been intended as a base for conquest or colonization when the first settlement was established by Holland in 1652. It was administered by the powerful East India Company from Batavia simply as a resupply station,⁸³ but expansion was inevitable.

With the Dutch East India Company administering the Cape, in much the same way as its British counterpart had run much of India, Boers were soon brought from Holland as free settlers. With them came Negro slaves from the Gold Coast and Malay slaves from Batavia. The African Bushmen and Hottentots who were running cattle at the Cape proved no match for the Boers with their European weapons, and although it always involved a fight the land grab for expansion was relatively easy.

The Boers had no difficulty at all in reconciling their land grab from people they regarded as pitiful and inferior. As rigid Calvinists they had known persecution from Catholics in Holland and many of them clung to a very narrow doctrine, somewhat Augustinian, of Salvation for a very few “elect.” Naturally the “elect” included the Boers but as the Bushmen and Hottentots had proven resistant to the new Christian presence they were lost and their fate was of no consequence. In view of that it is noteworthy that the Malay slaves were allowed to continue to practice their Islamic faith on the basis that an inferior people were welcome to an inferior religion. At the same time the Boers saw nothing contradictory or shameful in their men, (who outnumbered their women by a big margin), using women from the free Bushmen and Hottentots for sex. A large population of mixed bloods known as Bastards, Griquas, or Coloureds was being bred and it would test the future goodwill of all concerned.

Just a generation after “free settlement” had been introduced the Boers were joined by several thousand Huguenots when Louis XIV responded to a bit of papal support for his Dutch and Indochina adventures by revoking the Edict of Nantes. Another round of terror was unleashed against France’s Protestant minority. Their common background of religious persecution, extremism and determination made the two groups natural allies and, against East India Company opposition, they teamed up to push settlement at the expense of the company’s interests. Every step the company took, including recruiting German Protestant migrants, strengthened the growth of new nationalism and weakened Holland’s grip on the Cape. By 1700 the settlement extended as far as fifty five miles from Capetown.

While that European enclave was becoming firmly established several tribes from the Central African Bantu region were moving southward through the Monomotapa region. More efficient farmers and fighters than either the Hottentots or the Bushmen, they settled the region and established thriving communities. By 1700 the Sotho had reached the River Vaal and the Ngoni had crossed the Drakensberg Mountains and colonized the coastal region as far south as the River Kei. In a sense, and on a very much smaller scale, the Bantu were to Central and Southern Africa what the Mongols were to Central Asia and Eastern Europe.

BANTUS, BOERS AND BUSHMEN

During the next three generations Bantu and Boer pressed on relentlessly towards each other, little aware of the others’ presence or activities, but each squeezing the Bushmen and Hottentots out of their homelands and into the Kalahari Desert and South West Africa. The confrontation between civilizations and the test of technology and goodwill came in 1775 when Bantu and Boer met at the Fish River. Goodwill soon gave way to conflict which was not as one-sided in its results as the availability of advanced European technology might suggest. Half-hearted support for the Boer cause from the Dutch East India Company encouraged a series of local declarations of independence as Boer communities sought to resolve the conflict by their own methods.

It was then that Britain took full advantage of an invitation, by courtesy of the French Revolution, to join the action in Southern Africa. With Holland in conflict with France the Dutch East India Company asked Britain to administer the Cape, temporarily of course. Ignorance of the situation and unbalanced reliance on well intentioned but over dramatized and sometimes fabricated reports from a missionary of the London Missionary Society led the British colonial office to make some provocative decisions. The L.M.S. had set itself the target of liberating the Hottentots from the Boers who, although hardly changed in their attitude towards them, were dependent on them for labour. Recruitment of Hottentots into the police corps to enforce Colonial Office cum L.M.S. policy outraged the Boers.⁸⁴

Control of the Cape changed a couple of times during the war and peace deals of the Napoleonic era but Britain was back again in 1806 and its possession was confirmed by the Congress of Vienna in 1815. The Boers became British. So did the Hottentots. To keep in step with both the antislavery pressure which it was applying to the United States and with the policy which it had found it necessary to adopt in South America, Britain had to adopt a policy of racial equality in the Cape. This was clearly out of step with India and Australia, but they were different. Or at least they were further away and not linked in to the trade politics of the Africa/America sphere.

As admirable as the basic policy was, the need to pursue it as a matter of expediency and not as a matter of humanitarian principle led to the Colonial Office making a further series of blunders which made the policy unworkable. These showed in land tenure decisions; agricultural and labour policies; and in responses to provocative L.M.S. tactics. They included the governor's policy of Anglicizing the Dutch Reformed Boers by recruiting Scottish Presbyterian ministers for the established church which had, as a matter of course, become part of the Church of England system. This may have been a deliberate effort to counterbalance the influence of the L.M.S. because, like the L.M.S. people, they spoke an alien language, English, and not Dutch. But their theology in matters of baptism and predestination, which directly related to race relations, was very definite and quite different to that espoused by the Boers. The differences of language and theology combined to encourage antagonism rather than reconciliation.⁸⁵ Then, as land became scarce, wars broke out between Bantu peoples and added to Britain's troubles. Although the L.M.S. helped to resolve some of the issues it came into more and more conflict with the Boers.

In 1815 a minor charge of maltreating a Hottentot servant was laid against a Boer settler. Mishandling of the court action and his attempted arrest led to his death. When a neighbour attempted to form an alliance with the Bantu chief to set up an independent republic his letter was intercepted. Charges of sedition were laid, there were further bloody battles with the police, and eventually there was a confused mass hanging which provided the basis for legends which continue to rouse race hatred.

Then in 1818 a new administrator, the Rev. Dr. John Philip, took charge of the great string of mission stations which the L.M.S. had set up. A strong advocate of race equality, he took the view that Hottentots and Griquas could develop a civilization, under missionary supervision, given extensive land grants and a ban on alcohol. Presumably he meant a European-type community and life style when he used the term "civilization." They had previously had one. It had simply been destroyed.

IMPOSED EQUALITY BACKFIRES

During the next decade, as a younger contemporary of Wilberforce, Philips' reports and recommendations had a big bearing on the attitudes and policies of the L.M.S., the British Parliament and the Colonial Office. Reforms to civil rights laws in 1828 which he had pressed for, put Hottentots and Griquas on an equal footing with white Europeans. Unfortunately the government had failed to understand the impact which the reforms would have on the Boer population. It did not introduce complementary economic and planning measures and, with some justification, the Boers complained that their economic position was undermined by the withdrawal of labour.

However another policy which Philips proposed was not immediately put into effect. When it was eventually acted on in somewhat changed circumstances it set up shock waves which continue to rattle Africa today. It was similar in concept to the Negro re-colonization proposal which Lincoln had been unable to implement and it was the forerunner of South Africa's Apartheid policies. He proposed the complete separation of Africa's races into distinct districts and he envisaged this being done somehow without removing European settlers from land they already held.⁸⁶ This suggests that he envisaged an embargo on further European settlement and the resettlement of Hottentots and Griquas in regions not then settled by Europeans. Only in that way could they be separated, own and work their own land, and trade freely with each other. If that is what he envisaged it is no wonder it was never implemented. Neither the Boer settlers nor Europe's governments were in a mood to embargo further settlement in Africa. The big hunt for resources was well under way in every other part of the world and Africa was to be no exception.

In 1834, just six years after the Philips reforms, the British Parliament abolished slavery and a place in South African society had to be found for 39,000 former slaves as well as the Hottentots and Griquas. When mass apprenticeship plans broke down and border clashes between the Xhosa (Bantu) and Boers increased the governor sought to solve a series of problems in one go by annexing parts of Xhosaland and making the Xhosa chief directly responsible to him. The Boers complained it was an Anglo-Bantu alliance against them. The missionaries complained it was a scheme to control the Bantu. The plan was doomed. Three Boer frontiersmen set out to look for land further north, beyond Britain's control. The race for the Transvaal and Rhodesia and the epic Boer Treks had begun.

For almost a generation Britain and the Boer Trekkers tried to outsmart each other. Britain wrestled with the problem of whether it should stay in the region to protect Bantu interests or get out. The Boers wrestled with both Britain and the Bantus in a determined bid to set up a series of republics which seemed almost as keen on wrestling with each other as with Britain and the Bantus. The Bantus were in a similar situation.

Then Britain became preoccupied with the Irish famine, with avoiding Europe's round of revolutions, with gold rushes to California and Australia, and with the looming crisis of the Crimea. It had to concentrate on pacifying India and it wanted an end to the distractions in Africa. The Colonial Office decided that humanitarian intervention and actual occupation of the interior were expensive, somewhat impractical and generally unpopular at home. The best course would be cooperation with the Boers and development of a common policy towards the Bantu. Britain immediately recognized four Transvaal Republics and two years later, in 1854, granted partial self-government to the Cape Colony which had remained loyal, and extended recognition to the independent Orange Free State.⁸⁷ But of course such simple political acts did not end the tension between Boer and Bantu. The situation gradually worsened and the Xosa were devastated by starvation when a religious upheaval which their chief had planned in an attempt to spark a war with the Boers backfired badly in 1857.

The future for Southern Africa looked grim. Although a range of crops was being grown there didn't seem to be a fortune to be made from any of them and no great mineral finds had been made. The economy was depressed and the governments couldn't balance their budgets. Even the L.M.S. was talking of scaling down its operations because its social reforms seemed to be gaining acceptance; the problems which Natal was bringing on itself through the indentured Indian labour system seemed to take the gloss off the short-term benefits of alternative cheap labour, and the Boers were becoming fragmented on gaining their independence. And now the impending opening of the Suez Canal seemed to spell doom for the Cape which would be bypassed and would lose its strategic and commercial importance.

MISSIONS, MEDICINES AND MINES

Such was the depressing situation when Dr. David Livingstone made his appeal for the establishment of Christian missions in Central Africa in a speech at Cambridge University. But the Scottish-born medico and theologian, just two years in front of Darwin, provoked an eager response with his vivid reports of scientific and commercial possibilities in Africa, coupled with the opportunity for Christian missionary success. He had gone to Africa first in 1841, under L.M.S. sponsorship, and by 1856 had penetrated parts of the Zambezi basin, Angola and Mozambique which were previously unknown to Europeans. In 1858, having persuaded supporters and philanthropists to establish the (Anglican) Universities' Mission to Central Africa, he returned to Africa to set up a mission, to continue exploration and to represent British interests as Consul to Quelimane (Portuguese Mozambique). On his earlier visit he had clashed repeatedly with the Boers and his sympathetic support for the Bantu showed in his best selling travel reports. After the conflict of the previous generation Livingstone's writings helped to strengthen the British government's resolve to stay in Southern Africa. However too much importance can easily be put on his influence because, although it certainly recognized its humanitarian responsibility, the government was still working within the framework of the generally held European colonial philosophy. Crudely put, it was "if it's no use, we don't want it." The government was more concerned about two things: what it might lose if economic developments eventually occurred, and its sense of political prestige and history.

Of course while governments and astute observers might recognize such interests the general population did not. Opening up Africa simply represented one integrated activity. It was increasingly described as either a Christian responsibility or a European responsibility. It didn't seem to matter which because they had come to mean much the same thing to the European mind, and of course one didn't talk about benefits when an activity was a Christian responsibility, especially if there was a bit of glamour attached. In any case, as the Americans were intent on telling the world, rewards and profits would flow automatically by Divine Will when one carried out one's Christian responsibility and, by implication, if a person was growing wealthy it indicated that his or her Christian good works were being rewarded. People of such mindset – and that included most of the church – did not seem to bother much about what it meant for their theology if a non-Christian was also growing wealthy. Presumably such wealth was ill-gotten gain.

Then the various streams of thought, often in conflict, became rapidly entangled as Darwin followed hot on Livingstone's heels. In the confused thinking about competitive evolution, survival of the fittest or the devil take the hindmost the word "responsibility" lost much of its meaning when it was applied to a person's conduct towards other people, beasts, plants or soil. The debate on that issue was still raging when Livingstone was back in the headlines again. He had established a mission at Lake Nyasa and had learned that Muslim Arab traders were still bringing slaves from as far as the Congo basin in defiance of the Hammerton Treaty of 1847. Britain was indignant. Christians everywhere were incensed. This traffic had to stop and, (irrespective of what one thought about the church's credibility in the light of Darwin's work), Christianity was Europe, it was still the superior religion and it had to be pushed into Africa to supplant Islam.

On top of that, Western Europe had other reasons for concern. There had always been internal competition for resources but Russia had come to pose a serious threat which Britain, in particular, was so sensitive about. In addition, with its Civil War behind it, the United States had developed a dynamism and a unity (superficially anyway) which, coupled with the enormous resources which it seemed to stumble over at every stride, was a potential threat to the economic dominance and therefore the political position of the European powers. If Africa could be tapped for similar resources it could offset those threats and Britain could retain the industrial lead and security of which it was so proud and which it had grown to take for granted.

Quite clearly, Africa was up for grabs. Its people didn't have the capacity of the Chinese to prevent or to restrict foreign intrusion. One motive was as good as the next for being there. The church, Europe's governments and an assortment of investors made strange bedfellows once again as explorers and missionaries flocked to darkest Africa.

Britain didn't have to wait long after Livingstone's appeal for the economic justification for its decision to stay in Southern Africa but it didn't come through systematic exploration. It was a case of sheer luck and it put Britain's humanitarian goodwill to a very severe test. In 1867 a Griqualand farmer's child was found casually playing with a diamond. Within two years some quite large ones had been found and prosperity for Southern Africa, in the broad sense anyway, was assured. The question was who would benefit because Britain had made an undertaking as part of the 1854 agreement with the Boers not to make treaties covering Griqua or Bantu territory north of the Orange River but the discoveries were also just outside the agreed Orange Free State borders. A firm stand by Britain would have secured the future for the Griquas beyond question. But Britain didn't act, except to prevent anarchy, and a bitter power struggle began in keeping with the wealth which was expected to flow from the rash of diggings which pockmarked the Kimberley landscape. By 1870 the flood of British prospectors had declared a Diggers' Republic which threatened to drag the British High Commission and the Boers into violent confrontation. The Griquas were left to watch from the sidelines.

Among the British who flocked to the fields in 1871 was an eighteen year old youth, Cecil John Rhodes, who was supposedly looking for a weak heart rest cure while he helped run a miners' supplies business. But with maniacal impatience to achieve an economic empire, with entrepreneurial genius, a fanatical social Darwinist belief in the superiority and destiny of the Anglo-Saxon (for whom all other peoples were mere pawns and labourers), and with ruthless determination to bow to neither laws nor High Commissioners, he set about amalgamating as many diamond diggings as possible.⁸⁸ With capacity equalled by few men and with the absolute loyalty of his subordinates, Rhodes was able to visit England each year to read part-time for a BA at Oxford. He attracted the financial support of the English Rothschild brothers who, with well established expertise in railways and resource ventures, were quick to recognize the potential in his grandiose schemes. By 1880, at the age of 27, he had control of almost the entire Kimberley diggings, he had opened a railway from Capetown to Kimberley and he had joined in partnership with another speculator, Alfred Beit, in the De Beers Company.

We should not be surprised that he also had a seat in the Cape Colony parliament and that Britain had obsequiously transferred Griqualand West from Crown control to the self governing colony. Any hope of Philip-style self-government for the Griqua people who were the despised product of Boer lust and warped theology in the early days of settlement, had been thrown down the diamond mines to be buried with their self-respect. Barbed wire security fences; body checks; the death penalty for smuggling "a girl's best friend" out of a mine; regulation by passes and perpetual misery on low wages were the rewards for the "sinfully idle" (unemployed) Bantu who were brought from the reserves onto which they had been pushed. They would learn the moral value of hard work, Protestant ethic style, or so the reasoning ran. Ten years later he became prime minister of Cape Colony. That year, while he was still in close collaboration with the Rothschild brothers, Rhodes reconstructed his private empire. He acquired his partner's interest in De Beers, bought out his main competitor and established the brutally monopolistic De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd. in which the Rothschild brothers took a large block of shares.

1884: A CARVE-UP BY CONFERENCE

In the meantime the European mad scramble for Africa had been thrown into top gear by the diamond strike. In East Africa conflict had developed between British, German, French and Portuguese interests and their governments, complicated by strife between Christian missions and Muslims, and Bismarck was being pressed to annex South West Africa. He called a conference to resolve the conflict short of war between the powers by seeing that each one got a piece of the cake, except Russia, of course, which had to be content with the Turkish Caucasus to which Britain and France had restricted it in settlement of the Russian/Turkish war of 1877. Fourteen powers met in Berlin in November 1884. Even the United States was there. In view of its growing power and its "hands-off" attitude towards Latin America, (but officially because it was sponsoring the state of Liberia for freed slaves), it had to be known to be happy with what the European powers did.⁸⁹ Britain could afford to make one or two accommodating gestures. It already controlled the lion's share of the continent; it didn't want any alliances to develop against it; and it needed to support France's claims if it was to keep alive its own effort to bottle up Russia in the East with the aid of a continuing French Alliance.

Britain had caused quite a few ripples across the channel in 1875 when, in an historic volte-face, it bought the Khedive of Egypt's shares in the Suez Canal to prevent France from dominating Egypt and the Red Sea trade route.⁹⁰ But that problem had been more or less resolved two years later when Britain supported France's occupation of Tunis as its entitlement in a settlement of the Russian/Turkish war. Britain took Cyprus. Its 'support' for Turkey against Russia in the Balkans was simply an excuse to take a couple more bites out of the Muslim Ottoman Empire while they contained Russia.⁹¹

Britain's main concession at the conference was to allow unrestricted navigation on the Niger Delta, thus giving France the inland access it needed, in return for control of Nigeria. The conference ratified all the important grabs which had already been made including Spain's occupation of the Sahara (which no one else seemed to want anyway); France's claims to Algeria (1847), Tunisia, and Equatorial Africa; Britain's occupation of Egypt (1882); the various Portuguese claims; King Leopold's trusteeship over the free trade Congo region, subject to international access to the waterway as in the case of the Niger; and Germany's annexation of the Cameroon, Tanganyika and South West Africa.

There wasn't much left for anyone else to grab but the conference agreed to recognize future claims to title provided that the claimant power exercised effective management as well as occupation. It was agreed that effective management included support for any and every recognized Christian mission. No distinction was to be made between Protestant and Catholic. But of course there was no room for Muslims. It was 430 years since Pope Nicholas V had assumed the divine authority to allocate Africa to his European Christian collaborators, starting with Portugal, in his bull Rominus Pontifex, and 390 years since Pope Alexander VI had extended that 'principle' to the piecemeal division of the New World in a series of bulls which culminated in the Treaty of Tordesillas in 1494. The competing European powers had very quickly dealt the papacy out of that game as they scrambled for the spoils available, but as the European Colonial Era reached its climax the Great Powers still thought they could exercise the same divine right and refine the map of Africa to (more or less) everyone's satisfaction. The Treaty of Tordesillas would hardly have passed its 400th birthday before the fledgling World Zionist Organization would seek to be dealt into the game with its claim to a suitable piece of real estate. Herzl and his colleagues were in very good company indeed.

The conference had hardly gone its way in February 1885 when more German expansionist rumblings were heard in South West Africa. Some of Bismarck's men wanted to get as close to the diamond action as possible. It was no wonder really, because Cecil Rhode's personal income for 1885/86 was greater than the entire revenue of the four Boer republics which had joined to form the South African Republic in 1860.⁹² Rhode's British South Africa Company immediately laid claim to all land west and north of the Boer republic and pressed Britain to annex it. It became the Protectorate of Bechuanaland, (Botswana), most of which was Kalahari Desert.

Negotiations dragged on for five years. But it wasn't because of the diamonds. It was because of gold. Discoveries were made early in 1886 in the Witwatersrand hills and it soon became clear that the deposits were large. The scramble bore all the hallmarks of the diamond scramble except that the government of the republic kept firm control.⁹³ Bantu interests hardly got a hearing. They didn't own enough guns. Another Rhodes company, Consolidated Goldfields, (which had been prevented by the republic from gaining monopoly control), and other lesser operators all adopted much the same policies as those that De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd. pursued in the Kimberleys. They were well supported by most of the splinter churches which had grown around language and race issues in the republic. The big issues were who would control future resource development, access railways and trade; relations between the Cape Colony, the Republic of South Africa, Natal and the Orange Free State; and who would ultimately control the whole region. The Bantu could provide labour for the winners.

Rhodes wanted a federation which he clearly would have dominated. The Boers wanted independence with Dutch connections and laid claims to lead the whole of a white South Africa. Britain wanted to control a strategic strip from the Cape to Cairo but was happy to collaborate with Rhodes in his ambitious push northward. He had sent what was, in effect, a private army north of the Boer republic to surround it with a sea of federation supporters, to claim the anticipated mineral resources and to eliminate the established Bantu kingdoms. By perverse means his British South Africa Company gained control of an immense area from the Limpopo River to Lake Tanganyika but Britain insisted that it be administered as three areas each under Resident Commissioners Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe), Northeastern Rhodesia and Northwestern Rhodesia (Zambia).

In little more than three generations Southern Africa had become tangled in a web of complex conflicts such that they could only be resolved short of war with the greatest goodwill. It was lacking. As the only party involved which might have been able to find solutions, Britain was caught in its own round of domestic and international conflicts of interest and could not untangle the web. The region drifted in dismay towards the Boer War. It could not resolve the basic issues but it did provide a veneer of political stability and respectability for those who held the reins. The veneer held for a couple of generations while the world was preoccupied with other issues. For that time it looked as if the European Christian version of Africa's reconstruction might hold but the same factor which had prompted it would prove its downfall. The Western World was hungry for everyone else's resources.

DIVINE DESIGN, OR A PATENTED $ SIGN?

While Christian Europe was going about the reconstruction of each of India, China and Africa all at once it, and the United States seemed hell-bent on proving that what the Congregationalist Henry Ward Beecher had said about technical development was correct. The more the world advanced, he had said, the more rapidly it could advance. Accelerated development was in the nature of things. From that it followed that perpetual acceleration, science fiction style, was a divine design.

It also followed that it was a Christian responsibility to get stuck into scientific research and the technical development which came from it. Or at least it was a Protestant responsibility because, being consistent with papal attitudes ever since Copernicus, Pope Leo XIII had turned his guns on science and Catholic universities were expected to concentrate on arts and law. But under the pressure of the profit motive, which America's Protestants had now made more respectable than ever, most of the western world could afford to ignore the pope. They could also ignore ethical implications which they didn't like because there were plenty of acceptable arguments from Wayland, Beecher or Darwin with which to counter them. So, in the interests of stimulating scientific achievement through profitable commercial exploitation, Europe and the United States got together in 1883 to devise a uniform international system of patents, (to which the matter of trade marks is inevitably linked), and which the nonwestern countries could ignore at their peril. Need (and war) had previously been the mother of invention. Now the parentage changed at bit. It was greed and war.

The new system helped to swing the balance and benefits of technical development further in favour of those countries and enterprises which were already in front. It was they who had the technology on which further technological developments could be based and who tightly controlled the publication and transfer of that technology. It was they who could utilize and control both the resources and the markets to which additional new technology could be applied. And it was they who could commit development funds with confidence of a high profit, protected by the barrier of the convention plus their own governments' competitive policies which included taxation and other incentives. People did not think in terms of a gulf between rich countries and poor countries or 'the haves of the north' and the 'have-nots of the south.' Why should they? The concept could only be understood and developed under the pressures of the twentieth century when it would become another factor in the trouble in the triangle. The people of the north were perfectly comfortable in their belief that the resources of the world existed for the benefit of their Christian 'north', and the people of the south were in no position to do anything about it even if they had been aware of the consequences of the convention.

The 1883 conference had been prompted largely by the invention of the internal combustion engine. Engineers had struggled with the problem of how to build lighter, more efficient steam engines, or some alternative to them, for just over two hundred years and although Watt, Stephenson and others had introduced improvements, the world seemed to be stuck with it. In 1860 a Frenchman, Etienne Lenoir, built a gas driven engine but the world didn't seem to be very impressed. However it sat up and took notice when a Boston (USA) engineer achieved a breakthrough with an engine powered completely differently.

The United States Congressional Record for 1875 reported that under certain conditions the new engine may be used to supplement steam engines. Society, it said, had never in history been confronted with a power "so full of potential danger and at the same time so full of promise for the future of man and for the peace of the world." The discovery "begins a new era in the history of civilization (which) may some day prove more revolutionary ... than the invention of the wheel, the use of metals, or the steam engine." The menace of vehicles "hurtling through our streets" at "14 or even 20 miles per hour ... and poisoning the atmosphere would call for prompt legislative action even if the military and economic implications were not so overwhelming."

The Congressional Record went on to note that the destructive capacity of gasoline powered vehicles made it "imperative" that the defence forces should have first call on petroleum supplies and that agriculture could be wrecked by the displacement of the horse. But the gem of the report was that the cost of producing gasoline from petroleum "is far beyond the financial capacity of private industry, yet the safety of the nation demands that an adequate supply should be produced."⁹⁴

Within a year a practical four stroke petrol engine had been developed and three years later, (1879), George Selden applied for a US patent for an automobile driven by an internal combustion engine. But it was a German, Karl Benz, who gained the credit for building and running the first successful petrol driven motor car in 1885. The race was on and there had to be some rules to run it by so the world, (or part of it anyway), had its conference on patents. In 1890 Herbert Stuart in England applied for a patent for a major refinement of the internal combustion principle: the compression ignition engine. But it was Rudolph Diesel in Germany who pressed ahead with its development.

The congressional theorists had been right and although they had to wait a few years for their tanks, (by courtesy of Winston Churchill who made the British decision to push ahead with them), and for their aeroplanes (by courtesy of their own Wright brothers in 1903), the world was being transformed. Industrialization took on a new dimension. So did the demand for capital; the demand for resources to be processed; the demand for petroleum supplies for mineral extraction, transport and for running the factories; and, gradually, the demand for petroleum for processing as a raw material for a multitude of synthetic products.

Very quickly and very definitely, but without the world being conscious of it, the technically advanced countries were becoming petroleum dependent. That meant the Christian Western countries. The dependence was not absolute for some time. It was only partial and it could have been kept that way. However the faster those countries trod their treadmill of greed, chasing ever accelerating technical advancement for the sake of advancement, and determined to achieve the highest "standard of living", the greater their dependence became.

The effect became like that of a narcotic. The greater the use, the greater the need. And the heavier the degree of dependence, the more severe the withdrawal symptoms. In economic management terms that means that as the use of petroleum in industry and in consumer products becomes greater, it becomes more difficult to find substitute materials which may be needed for reasons of either price or supply. As a consequence, the problems of employment, economic management and social pressures also become more acute.

There is no other resource currently in use which can cause that cyclic effect. There are others which may be used either as an energy source or as an industrial raw material such as wood, coal, gas or even uranium but their supply and use as raw materials are not directly linked to their use as an energy source. It is the fact that the supply of petroleum derivatives available for use as raw materials is directly linked to the rate of use of petroleum products as an energy source which gives petroleum its unique importance and influence.⁹⁵

Refining processes can be varied to increase or decrease the production of a particular fraction, but as one goes up others must go down. Basically the proportion of liquid fuel produced from a plant remains steady and the balance of production is juggled between a range of non-fuel solvents and chemical intermediates. It follows that when supplies of petroleum are short for any reason the production of all fractions for both energy and non-energy uses will fall by about the same proportion. But if a producer or a government decides that one particular fraction must have priority then one or more other fractions must be cut back further to allow for it. The economic and political juggling which becomes necessary is very important. Someone has to make a decision about which products will be cut out and, in effect, whose plant or factory will lie idle, who will lose their jobs and what, if any, provision will be made for them.

PETROLEUM: A NEW ERA DAWNS

But in the period of our reconstructions the use of petroleum oil had not reached such a critical role in western countries. Industrial practice was still relatively simple and economic management had not yet become a sophisticated national or international pastime for politicians and captains of commerce. Petroleum was seen basically as the liquid energy on which industrial development would depend and, therefore, on which the prosperity of nations would be built. It was only gradually, as the world argued its way towards World War I, that petroleum became vital to national defence, but the hunt for black gold had already become an important consideration in world affairs.

By the year of the first motor car, (1885), world oil production had reached 37 million barrels. The USA produced 60 percent, or 22 million barrels. Russia, with 38 percent or 14 million barrels, was the only other significant producer and those two countries competed for the European market.⁹⁶ Europe's needs are shown by the breakdown of United States exports for that year. Out of gross exports valued at $US49.7m, kerosene for lighting and heating accounted for $39.5m; lubricating oils $2.7m; fuel oils $1.2m; waxes, solvents and other refined products $0.3m; and crude oil for local refining $6.0 m.

The importance of the hunt for oil can be gauged from the fact that just at that time the English Rothschild brothers were developing a concession in the Baku fields of Russia's newly acquired Caucasus provinces. In 1883 they had made a loan to the tsar through the French branch of the family in return for the concession.⁹⁷ In view of relations between the tsar's regime and Jews at that time it cannot be passed off lightly as an ordinary investment agreement. It was just two years since the assassination of Alexander II, the May Laws and the Odessa massacre. Mass expulsions and emigrations were in full swing and in Germany Bismarck had turned his wrath on the Jews in line with his new accord with the pope. It is therefore reasonable to assume that, in keeping with their long established policy of using their financial strength to relieve the plight of oppressed Jews, (especially in raising finance for the British and French Crimean War effort), there were some strings attached or an understanding that tsarist repression would be eased. It is unlikely that they would have agreed to prop up the tsar's regime in that manner otherwise.⁹⁸

In the United States there was great elation with the scale of the oil fields which had been discovered and with the ease of production. It helped to offset the effects of the loss of cheap labour through the abolition of slavery and it helped push development westward at a great rate as well as providing substantial export income. It was good to have the Old World eating out of the New World's hands. It fitted the economic theology which was sweeping the country and it fitted America's image of itself. But all was not well in the oil industry and there was pressure for government intervention in spite of the Wayland philosophy.

The industry had sprung from nothing into world prominence overnight without a system of regulation being laid down beforehand. It was, after all, a completely new industry and no one knew what to expect. It was every man for himself with no restrictions, no organization and very little sense of responsibility. In such a situation an astute operator could take advantage of his competitors with ease and the man who did it, America's counterpart to Cecil Rhodes, was John D. Rockefeller.

In it almost from the first drill hole, Rockefeller realized that to gain control of the oil industry he didn't have to own every well. There were several strategic points in the black gold system, (production, refining, transport and distribution), and control of any one could mean effective control of the whole system. He recognized refining as the critical point and set out to stake his claim. By 1870 he, his family, or his associates controlled twenty five percent of the country's refining capacity. It was time to put some system into the mushrooming empire's operations and the Standard Oil Company of Ohio was established.

Within a few years Standard had gained control of about 95 percent of America's refining capacity and John D. Rockefeller had the stranglehold on the oil industry which he wanted. He was supplying probably 80 percent to 90 percent of Europe's petroleum products with demand increasing at an exciting rate, especially for fuel oil and industrial lubricants, and at that stage his only competitor was Robert Nobel at Baku.

But Europe's industrialists and governments, notably the British, were joining the race for oil fields and as they were having little success at home they were naturally looking in their overseas possessions. Their twin motives were profit and independence from the blackmailing dominance of the American Standard Oil machine, not necessarily in that order, and therein lie two other possible reasons for the English Rothschilds' readiness to invest in tsarist Russia.⁹⁹

Britain's standing and influence in Persia had improved somewhat due to good relations between an Anglican missionary and the Shah's regime and a mission was established in 1871. This helped to smooth the way for Baron Julius de Reuter who obtained a sweeping mineral and oil concession in Persia the next year. It was so all-embracing that it amounted to the surrender of national sovereignty over the oil and mineral resources of Persia and the world was rather shocked.¹⁰⁰ However the old rivalry between Britain and Russia got in the way and helped to rescue the Shah from his folly. They were still each trying to counter the other's influence in Afghanistan in the wake of the Crimean and Indian border wars. Russia therefore bluntly warned Persia that such a British 'presence' on its southern border and within a stones throw of its own vital Baku oil fields, (which it had once taken from Persia anyway), was not acceptable. The message was clear. The Baron's concessions would inevitably lead to the occupation of Persia by either Britain or Russia if work went ahead. In 1873 his concession was cancelled and his deposit was confiscated.¹⁰¹

Meanwhile the US Federal and State governments were under growing pressure to break the Rockefeller stranglehold and he was under pressure to put the Standard house in order. In 1879 some cosmetic manipulation was tried in a bid to stall government intervention. A trust agreement was agreed to which was said to protect the independence of each company under the legal umbrella of the trust. In fact it simply enabled Rockefeller to tighten his grip still further.

When the senate of the state of New York began an enquiry into the effects of trust operations in 1888 it looked as if action to break up Standard might result but the state of New Jersey kindly came to its rescue. It legislated to permit trusts and picked up some rapid cash flow and the prospects of new development as Standard moved its base to its new home. The Federal Government then passed its Sherman Anti Trust Act but it didn't have the will to do anything with it. However, undeterred by such federal vacillation in the face of Rockefeller's immense influence, some of his detractors pressed actions in the state of Ohio. Its Supreme court ordered Standard Oil of Ohio to withdraw from the Trust in 1892. Action to dissolve the trust was begun but was neither completed nor effective. The existing management, with John D. Rockefeller holding 256,785 shares out of a total of 972,500 (26.4 percent), retained control. Five years later the Trust was back before the court on a contempt charge, which was dropped, and facing an antitrust suit which was dismissed. It seemed to be rolling all opposition before it.

Other countries were having only limited success in their hunt for oil and by 1903 the United States was still producing more than half of the world's supplies, or 100 million barrels of the total of 195 million barrels. Production had begun in Indonesia and Venezuela (limited), Mexico (75,000 barrels) and Peru (278,000 barrels) with discoveries also recorded in the Philippines, Burma and India, but Russia remained the only serious competitor for the US in the world market of 76 million barrels.

Concern was mounting among all of Europe's powers but Britain, which had begun to convert some of its long distance navy to fuel oil, had most to fear from being dependent on either its intense rival, Russia, or its increasingly arrogant, resource-rich former colony, the United States. While the United States had successfully challenged Spain for control of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines in its war of 1898,¹⁰² Britain had struggled through its divisive Boer War and the Boxer Rebellion in China at the same time.

GANDHI'S BOER WAR MEMORIES

Certainly the Boer Republic had reverted to British Crown Colony status but the cost had been enormous. Some 250,000 Boers would remember for a long time that they had lived in concentration camp conditions. Britain had promised grants and loans for yet another reconstruction and they would be tiresome to meet on top of the repatriation of 35,000 Boer prisoners of war and 200,000 British troops. (It had taken 450,000 troops from all over the empire to put down 87,000 Boers.)¹⁰³ But the Bantu and Griqua people had something to remember, too. They would remember that Britain had promised, as part of the settlement with the Boers, not to grant any new voting rights to nonwhites until the colonies had acquired self-government.

There was also a young English-educated Hindu Indian solicitor who would remember that too. Mahatma Gandhi had gone to work in South Africa in 1893, soon after graduating, and he had experienced the full force of racial discrimination both personally and as a spokesman for the Indian community. On the outbreak of war his personal sympathies were with the Boers but he accepted his responsibility, as a British subject, to support the British cause. He had also been moved by a belief that “India could achieve her complete emancipation only within and through the British Empire.” He had collected together as many of his comrades as possible, organized them as an ambulance corps and “with very great difficulty got their services accepted.”¹⁰⁴

The Boer War was certainly one that Britain could have done without. It was a war which different policies two generations earlier would have avoided. It was a war which finally exposed the British Government’s long-running policies of racial equality and emancipation for what they were: high sounding, prestige inflating principles which were quite acceptable if they coincided with or promoted the home country’s economic and political interests but which were expendable in times of conflict of interest. And on top of all that, it destroyed Britain’s chance of a naval treaty with Germany, it prompted Germany to begin construction of a high seas navy of its own and it nearly led to an alliance against Britain of France, Germany and Russia.¹⁰⁵

CHINA’S HUMILIATION: THE BOXER AFFAIR

From some points of view the Boxer affair had been little better. The ailing Ch’ing dynasty had been out of touch with the problems and aspirations of its own people. It was having little success in tackling famine, industrialization and the European Christian form of democracy which the church and the powers, together, seemed to see as their God-given responsibility to impose on China in return for the “right” to exploit its resources and markets. Threats of regional rebellions and the break up of China had been increasing steadily for some years, with unrest directed against both the local governments and Christian institutions and converts. They were being fuelled by abuses of commercial and religious privileges under the numerous treaties extracted at gun point and by open attacks by foreign Christian missions on Chinese culture and family traditions.

Rebellion finally became inevitable with conspiracy between Catholic converts and foreign powers providing a dimension of civil conflict as well as another example of an Asian Christian fifth column. The Empress Dowager, after accepting reforms in an unsuccessful attempt to modernize Chinese government including the inclusion of Christian clergy in the formal Chinese civil hierarchy, finally decided to support the fanatical religious Boxer sect in a bid to stop the erosion of China’s political and military authority. She thus deflected the anti-dynasty aspect of the movement which unleashed its full fury against foreign and Christian interference in China.¹⁰⁶

Of course the affair was put down. It even brought together about a dozen governments – including Russia, Germany, France, the United States and Japan – in a remarkable display of military cooperation. And of course the foreign powers were all suitably compensated for the loss of life, damage to property including churches, loss of trade, and the cost of putting down the rebellion.¹⁰⁷ But China had again been deeply humiliated; the Ch’ing dynasty had been badly undermined and was not likely to survive; relations between China and the west had been dragged in the gutter; and both religious and race relations had been given another shot of poison. The next ten years were to see a strong rise of both Christian and Japanese influence in China while the declining dynasty, reduced to a Western vassal, struggled to reform and to stave off the republican rebellion which finally pulled it down in 1911/1912.¹⁰⁸ It would seem just so natural that the West would take hardly any notice when it happened, but it was still a few years away.

THE MIDDLE EAST: THE ENTENTE CORDIALE

So in 1903, with so many international commitments to attend to, Britain was in no mood to be messed around over strategic resources. There was thought to be oil in the Middle East region extending South from Russia's Baku fields and Britain wanted it if it was there. To get it, it needed peace in the Mediterranean. To be sure of peace it needed a strong alliance. Chamberlain's efforts to build one with Germany had broken down over the Boer War but France had much the same interests and an alliance with her might just provide the answer, at least in Europe and Africa even if not, perhaps, east of Suez.

While Theodor Herzl was reflecting on the refusal of the British-controlled Egyptian government to allow a Jewish state on the Sinai Peninsula and also on Chamberlain's offer of the Bantu territory of Uganda, which Britain didn't really want, Chamberlain was finalizing his Entente Cordiale with France. The British government recognized France's claims to Morocco, subject to an understanding with Spain on certain issues, and the French government recognized Britain's "special position" in Egypt. They also came to terms over Newfoundland, Siam, Madagascar and the New Hebrides to ensure that friction in Europe would not occur through such minor colonial matters coming between them.¹⁰⁹

What was not spelled out in the Entente Cordiale was just how the two countries would cooperate, if need be, in the Middle East. That could be left for time to determine and Britain was confident. It had been quietly working to strengthen its position in the Arab countries while at the same time it had pressed hard for Persia to reverse its decision on the de Reuter oil concession. The Sheikdom of Bahrain had been declared a British protectorate in 1880, (three years before Britain had walked into Egypt), and in 1886 the joint Anglo-Prussian Protestant bishopric had been discontinued, leaving the Anglican church struggling but uninhibited in its attempts to strengthen both its own position and that of Britain in Palestine. However its relations with the authorities continued to provoke diplomatic problems for Britain in that region and it even had to admit that it was losing converts to Islam.¹¹⁰

In 1889 the British government succeeded in squeezing a new, less embracing, concession out of the Shah of Persia for Baron de Reuter. It was to be for sixty years with sixteen percent of net profits to be paid to Persia. A bank and a mining corporation were established and exploration began in 1891 but, with no success by 1893, operations were curtailed. Dissatisfaction with the company's efforts and its attitude to the Persian government resulted in that concession also being cancelled six years later, in 1899.

For a time Britain's overall strength continued to increase in the Middle East and the Sheikdom of Kuwait was declared a protectorate the same year. However her preoccupation with recolonizing the republic of South Africa, (in the face of general opposition from almost everyone outside her empire), coupled with Turkey's progressive decline, encouraged other powers to test the waters for a move into the region also. The United States threatened to support Venezuela in an action against British interests and then used the Armenian massacres of several years before as the excuse for a show of force to establish its interest in Middle Eastern affairs. It sent the USS. 'Kentucky' to Constantinople to back up demands by its resident minister for compensation for American missionary property destroyed during the massacres. It was becoming almost as expert as the European powers at using protection of the church and related compensation claims to its political advantage.¹¹¹

Not to be deterred by a few unfriendly gestures, there being a new Shah on the throne, and knowing that recent geological surveys had indicated rich oil fields in western Persia, the British government pressed ahead to win yet another concession for one of its subjects, this time William Knox D'Arcy. Negotiating in strict secrecy to avoid any whisper reaching his Russian counterpart, the British Minister to Teheran, Sir Arthur Hardinge, offered shares in the proposed operation to the Grand Vizier (Prime Minister) and other senior ministers. The result was another concession of quite staggering generosity. It covered all of Persia except the five northern provinces which were reserved to allow for negotiations with a hostile Russia. It was to run for sixty years from May 1901 and it was to cover all petroleum products but not minerals.¹¹²

TURKEY: CAUGHT IN THE CROSSFIRE

D'Arcy wasted no time organizing drilling. Work began at Chiah Surkh, near the frontier with Iraq which was then still a province of Turkey. Then complications began to appear because Germany was also keen to get its hands on oil fields and, like Britain, it had helped to support Turkey's claims to keep some of its European provinces intact at the Berlin Congress some years before. But unlike Britain it had been somewhat more open in admitting self-interest as its main motive and it did not make a territorial grab under the pretext of providing a defensive umbrella for Turkey, as Britain had with Cyprus. In addition, Germany had maintained reasonably stable relations with Turkey in the years following the conference. In 1903, two years after the D'Arcy concession had been granted, Germany obtained commercial concessions from Turkey and gained control of the railway to Baghdad, just across the border from D'Arcy's drillings. Britain began to fear the worst. Out came the Entente Cordiale! Then a few months later out came an agreement between the Anatolian Railway Company, (acting for the Deutsche Bank), and the sultan for surveys of the Baghdad and Mosul regions. German competition was going to be strong but above board. However at about the same time Standard Oil began producing from a Rumanian concession, so the US had stolen a march in Europe, right in the middle of the Great Powers' playground!

Then D'Arcy's first two wells both produced oil, but not at quantities which would have been commercial in view of the distance and the terrain between the field and the Persian Gulf. A nearby railhead may have been a different matter! In 1905 it was decided to shift operations to a field closer to the Gulf, at Mamatain, but in the meantime D'Arcy's funds had run low and he had begun negotiations with foreign capitalists for the sale of his concession. Also in the meantime the British navy had begun its conversion to oil and defence security made a British controlled oil supply of the highest importance. The British government (which had put a strong and protracted effort into negotiating the concession in order to obtain a national asset and not simply as a commercial service to one of its citizens) therefore asked D'Arcy to break off his foreign negotiations and to enter a joint venture with Lord Strathcona's Burmah Oil Company which provided services for the navy. Drilling went ahead at Mamatain on that basis but D'Arcy's and Britain's troubles were not that easily solved. Two more unsuccessful attempts and he was on the move to another field again.

As might be expected Russia had not been at all pleased when it learned of the concession which Britain had inveigled from the Shah. However being rather fully occupied with the debacle in Manchuria and the war with Japan, and then with rounding up his Jews and other undesirables to throw into their shtetls, prisons or rivers, the tsar had not been able to give the Persian question much attention until Bloody Sunday, (January 1905) was well behind him.¹¹³ At that point, with a brutally firm grip on home affairs, he was keen to get a bit of the Persian cake and, with Germany making rumbling noises both in Europe and Turkey, Britain was happy to oblige. In fact it was rather keen to bolster the Entente Cordiale with an extra alliance at the same time that it removed a few points of friction. In 1907, without consulting the Shah or his government, Britain and Russia agreed on three zones for oil exploration in Persia. The northern zone went to Russia, the southern one was Britain's and the central one was "neutral", or perhaps negotiable. At the same time they buried their differences over Afghanistan and Tibet, at least for the time being. In view of Russia's exclusion from the Berlin Conference carve-up of Africa 23 years earlier, this side play between only Britain and Russia (but based on the same theme that the world's resources were Christian Europe's to carve up as it saw fit) exposes the cynical admission that one only calls a conference if there is uncertainty about who will win a game of 'might is right.'

At that stage D'Arcy had still not struck payable oil. With two holes drilled at his third site, with funds running out for the second time and with orders drafted to abandon the whole enterprise, the situation was grim indeed. Then his fairy tale came true. On May 26, 1908 the drill broke through cap rock which had hidden one of the world's great fields. Not only were D'Arcy's financial troubles at an end but security of fuel supplies for Britain's navy seemed to be just around the corner. It could continue the conversion from coal to oil. The Anglo-Persian Oil Company was floated to operate the field, to extend drilling, and to construct both a pipeline to the Gulf and a refinery. At the same time, disregarding both the spirit of the concession and the granting of constitutional government by the Shah in 1906, the British Government recognized Sheik Khazal as the ruler of the region (Mohammareh) and guaranteed the rights of his successors.

The new field became fully operational in 1913, twelve years after D'Arcy had been granted a concession. In the meantime Mr. (later Sir) Winston Churchill, who had been appointed first Lord of the Admiralty in 1911, (while the pipeline was being constructed), issued orders that all vessels in Britain's naval expansion due for completion from 1913 onwards were to be either oil powered or capable of conversion from coal to oil. With war clouds hanging over Europe he then put a case to parliament for the government to buy a controlling interest in Anglo-Persian. The foreign relations of neither Britain nor Persia would be affected, he said, and the arrangement would tend to make the Persian government strong and the tribesmen tame. He also said that Britain's defence and general interests would be free from reliance on world markets dominated by Standard Oil and Royal Dutch Shell. In spite of vigorous opposition from Shell, whose founding-family director, Samuel Samuel, complained of Jew-baiting tactics in the government's attack on monopolies, the House agreed by 254 votes to 18.¹¹⁴ The British Parliament was well aware that thirty years of effort to break the Standard Oil grip on the US oil market had finally reached its climax in 1911 with a unanimous decision by the federal Supreme Court to order the dissolution of the Standard Oil group. But it was also well aware that the Rockefeller family had once again been able to keep a dominant position in the industry because stockholders in Standard Oil of New Jersey received stock in each of thirty two successor companies in proportion to their equity in the holding company. The company had a total of 6,006 stockholders with 983,383 shares issued. John D. Rockefeller's holding had been 244,385 shares, (24.9%), valued at $160,000,000 at that date and William Rockefeller held a further 6,000 shares, (0.6%).

However the spectacular success of the D'Arcy venture in the Persian Gulf region had triggered intense competition for concessions in Turkey's province of Iraq and the British government was making vigorous efforts to keep United States interests out of the region. This makes Mr. Churchill's public statement about no untoward effects on Britain's foreign relations sound a little hollow. Within a few years the foreign relations effects had come home to roost.

Even before the first commercial field had been located on Iranian territory and before the Anglo-Russian accord, the British government had turned the diplomatic screws on Turkey. The German railway agreement had been cancelled and negotiations had been opened on behalf of D'Arcy. With encouragement from Germany, and sensing a touch of corruption within the government over the deal, a group of Turkish officers forced the sultan to transfer oil concessions from the 'Civil List' of matters subject to confidential government negotiation, to the Ministry of Finance which was under more public scrutiny. The matter had still not been finalized when the 'Young Turks' forced Sultan Abdul Hamid to reintroduce constitutional rule and to convene parliament in 1908 and then deposed him, putting Sultan Muhammad V in his place, in 1909.

With the European powers squabbling to get a place in the Turkish sun the United States decided it wanted a place, too. The man who had commanded the USS. 'Kentucky' in the show of force ten years earlier, Rear Admiral Colby Chester, went back for another visit. He negotiated a concession to build a port and three railway lines, including the key Kirkuk/Mosul stretch, with mineral and oil concessions over the entire area for twenty kilometres on both sides of each line. An agreement to ratify the deal was put to the Turkish parliament in 1911 but shortly afterwards Albania revolted against Turkey and, taking advantage of the situation, Italy triggered war with Turkey by its annexation of Libya. The Colby Chester deal was not ratified.

Such confusion gave Germany a chance to test the sincerity of the Entente Cordiale without challenging both parties at once. It challenged France's protectorate over Morocco. Britain didn't intervene. But in return for a slice of the French Congo to complement its Cameroon territory, Germany decided French rule could go ahead in Morocco after all!

Then it was all eyes back to Turkey as four interests, each backed by the full diplomatic weight of their governments, pressed for those vital Mosul concessions in Iraq. There was the German Anatolia/Deutsche Bank group; D'Arcy for the British Anglo-Persian Oil Company; a Royal Dutch Shell subsidiary, (Anglo-Saxon Oil Company) assisted by a Turkish national; and there was the American Chester group. Fearful that Turkey may decide to split the concession, thus letting the United States into what they regarded as a European sphere of influence or, even worse, that the whole concession might go to America, the three European groups joined forces to establish the Turkish Petroleum Company.

There was undoubtedly an awareness in British government circles that a joint resources venture with Germany on the scale anticipated would, as it required close cooperation, tend to curb Germany's expansionist tendency, reduce tensions in Europe and offset the slide towards war. How this ranked in importance with the common (and unifying) desire to keep the United States out of the Middle East and thereby secure European oil independence is difficult to assess. There is certainly reason to believe that it had encouraged confidence within the British government that war was less likely.

A KURDISH SUM: OIL + BORDERS = TROUBLE

Still Turkey hesitated over the vital concession, right through 1913 while the remainder of its Balkans provinces were dragged away piecemeal and none of the contenders for her resources were prepared to intervene to support her. The possibility that Turkey didn't want to issue a concession at all does not seem to have occurred to any of the contenders. The assumption that the world's resources – wherever they occurred – existed for the benefit of the Christian powers was so deeply ingrained among the contenders that, even in view of the history of their relationship with Turkey, they could not countenance the thought that she had a right to develop her resources at her own pace and in collaboration with whom she chose. Former great empire or not, Turkey had to accept whatever crumbs the West might throw to her in her declining years – especially seeing she insisted on clinging to Islam. However, when a dispute broke out on the border between Turkey and Iran in December 1913, Britain and Russia were very quick to agree that the disputed area should go to Turkey. Let's not allow a minor issue like independence for the Kurdish people to stand in the way of oil for Europe!

But the new alliance didn't succeed in keeping the United States out of Turkish territory. A few months later, while still delaying an announcement on the major concession, Turkey allocated a total of fourteen exploration licences in Palestine. Eleven went to Standard Oil of New York and three to Turkish nationals who later transferred them to Standard as well. It was almost as if those licenses had been a consolation prize – or perhaps the sugar coating for a bitter pill – because two months later, on June 28 1914, the Grand Vizier announced the government's intention to grant major concessions to the Turkish Petroleum Company. However Britain and Germany were at war only six weeks later, and action to establish the company lapsed.

Much has been said about the need to curb Germany's expansionism or empire building as if it was something new, peculiar to Germany and most undesirable. Only on the last point can there be any agreement. Germany was the only major power in Europe which had not sailed off during earlier phases of the European colonial push to do its land and resources grab. It was in the process of reconstruction itself. During the traumatic colonial and reformation era which followed the fall of Constantinople the German empire, providing the basis for the disintegrating Holy Roman Empire, had been in no position to compete with its neighbours. It was only after the Napoleonic era that the reconstruction of such an empire was possible. By the time it was ready to compete all of the world except portions of Africa had gone under the hammer and any German imperial expansion had to be at the expense of some other European power as well as at the expense of the subject people themselves.

GERMANY'S PLACE IN THE SUN

Germany had just managed to get its foot into New Guinea by annexing the North eastern sector in 1884. That was all that was left after the British colony of Queensland had annexed the South eastern portion in 1883 ¹¹⁵. Then it also staked its claims to what was left of Africa immediately before Bismarck convened his Conferences on African and colonial questions in 1884. It grabbed a hunk of China (Kiaochow) in 1897 (not to be outdone by Britain, France, Russia and Portugal which had already taken their bites) and then it had forced France to cede part of the Congo in 1911.

But Germany was technically and industrially highly advanced and its interests were geared to minerals and heavy industry rather than fibres and fabrics. Its industrial position had been greatly strengthened when it forced France to cede Alsace Lorraine after the Franco-Prussian war which had brought down Napoleon III (and the papal state). It is therefore hardly surprising that when immense oil belts were either known or thought to straddle the Near East from the Caucasus, down the Tigris Valley and along the Persian Gulf that Germany's industrial and political leaders wanted a share of that neocolonial prize as well. ¹¹⁶

The catch cry went up from imperial Berlin that the German Empire would span from Berlin to Baghdad. Britain didn't like it one little bit. Britain was being represented, at least by the London lobby, as the friend of Turkey and any other presence in the Turkish empire was an intrusion and a threat to world stability in spite of the fact that by treaty arrangement Germany was already training and equipping Turkey's army and navy! Obviously, from a purely objective point of view, a belt of common interest overlapping Europe and Asia could have a strong unifying influence. A railway from Berlin, in the heart of Europe, through Turkey and its provinces of Syria and Iraq, via Baghdad to Basra on the Persian Gulf, would have provided a second trade and communications route as an alternative to the Suez Canal/Red Sea route. The stimulus to cooperation, trade and face-to-face contact between Europeans, Arabs, Asians and East Africans would have been far greater than from an isolated sea lane, with real prospects for improved relations overall.

THE PATH TO WAR

Such was not to be. Even though the proposal for a Turkish Petroleum Company had provided an excellent starting point the "great" powers could only think in terms of exclusive control of resources owned and exploited according to current western concepts of private enterprise. It had been conceived by greed and competition and it died from the same causes. War would not be long in coming. In December 1916, with that war at its height, Professor Ernest Jackh said that the war had come from the east, would be waged for the east and would be decided in the east.¹¹⁷ But of course he was only talking German propaganda, so nobody (outside Germany) bothered to take any notice. Why not? As Europe's war gathered even greater momentum the three partners in the triangle of faiths each tried to go their own way, but they were each being manipulated by the Great Powers for their particular interests so that they could not. We must retrace our path again for a while to see what each of the three partners were doing while Europe dragged the whole world into war. In order of seniority, we start with the Jews.

POGROMS SPUR A PUSH FOR PALESTINE

Under the pressure of pogroms in eastern Europe a series of settlements had already been established in Palestine by Jewish communities before the World Zionist Organization (W.Z.O.) came into being.¹¹⁸ However settlement policy and administration were put on an organized basis after the eighth Congress at The Hague in 1907. As already noted, the deliberate decision was taken in 1905 to begin "small scale" settlement without waiting for either formal approval from the Sultan or a charter from the European powers. Although this course was hotly contested and, as a result, no action was taken until the next congress in the Hague in August 1907 it was regarded by many as an acceptable alternative in view of Turkey's condition of virtual vassalage. As a consequence, the decision of 1905 was confirmed in 1907, a Palestine Office of the W.Z.O. was opened in Jaffa in 1908 to direct the work of Jewish agricultural settlement, and the Palestine Land Development Co. was established by German sociologist

Arthur Ruppin, the ‘father of Zionist settlement.’ Ruppin negotiated the acquisition of large tracts of land in the Jezreel Valley and was instrumental in purchasing land in Haifa, in the Rehavia quarter of Jerusalem and in the area of Mount Scopus where the Hebrew University was subsequently established.¹¹⁹

So it was that while Britain was firmly anchoring itself to the Middle East by its resources policy, prompted by America’s resources policy, relying on the treaty support of its arch rival, Russia, at Persia’s expense, and taking full advantage of Turkey’s ‘virtual vassalage’ the Zionist community was also anchoring itself to the Middle East under pressure from the European powers and their church but without formal agreement from anyone and also taking full advantage of that virtual vassalage. The basis had been laid on which the trouble in the triangle would reach its critical level in a mere two or three generations. The Church and the West could not say they hadn’t been warned. It was the firm policy of the W.Z.O. to hold its congresses with maximum publicity and to make all of its decisions open to public scrutiny and as widely known as possible.¹²⁰ It wanted a strong base of world support but it desperately wanted all of its actions out in the open so that no accusations of secret plans for world domination could be justified against it.

But not even the constant cruelty of pogroms under tsarist Russia or legalized oppression in Austria-Hungary¹²¹ was enough to break the traditional religious spirit and Messianic beliefs of the majority of Europe’s Jews and the World Zionist Organization did not gain the spontaneous support of Europe’s Jewry, let alone those beyond Europe. In 1905, after the decision had been taken to reject Britain’s offer of Uganda and to press for Palestine at all costs, the organization split in two. The Jewish Territorial Association formed from those who believed for either religious or practical reasons that Jews should not attempt to resettle Erez Israel. The pattern of Jewish emigration illustrates their dilemma. During the critical years of persecution from 1882 to 1914 the Jewish population of Palestine probably increased by only about 61,000, from 24,000 to 85,000.¹²² During the same period an estimated two million Russian Jews and 125,000 Rumanian Jews went to the United States of America.¹²³ They were the main waves of probably two and a half million Jews who emigrated from continental Europe to all other countries¹²⁴ and they chose to go to the new promised land of America rather than the old Promised Land to which the Zionists urged them to go. It is very significant that they made up 10 percent of total European migrants (about 25 million during that period) although Jews made up only about three percent of Europe’s total population. That migration rate of more than three times the average for all religious groups gives a clear indication of the overall effect of persecution on the Jewish people.

SOME CHURCHES BEGIN TO WORK TOGETHER ...

While their senior partners in the triangle were being driven out of Europe at that rate and while they were struggling with the issues of reform and the growth of Zionism within Judaism, there was growing recognition among Christians that division within the church was undermining its work and influence. In the Roman wing this resulted in approaches to the Orthodox churches during the 1880s aimed at reconciliation but these had been rebuffed, largely as a consequence of the Vatican Council's decision on papal infallibility and the centralizing of authority in Rome. In the Protestant wing, a series of events early in the century illustrate that there was growing recognition of the state of the church and a yearning for reunion or reconciliation. One was the publication by Revd. James Stewart of the Church of England in 1821 of Hints for a General Union of Christians for prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit.¹²⁵ Another was publication of Principles of Church Reform by Thomas Arnold in 1833. He proposed a constitutional change by act of Parliament to enable the Church of England to reorganize and to incorporate all of the Protestant Churches with a completely new form of governance including elected councils of clergy and laity. A year earlier he had written: "The Church as she now stands, no human power can save."¹²⁶

The first substantial move came even before the '48 round of revolutions, with the establishment of the Evangelical Alliance in 1845/46. But it was not an alliance or a council of churches. It was an association of individual Christians who could adhere to a set of rigid Trinitarian and Protestant beliefs which quite deliberately excluded Catholics and Christians of non-Trinitarian persuasion. Consultations between American and British clergy over several years led to a preliminary conference being held in Liverpool, England, in 1845. In pressing for such a meeting Dr. Patton, a Presbyterian minister, had reflected feelings which were widely held in America when he proposed a convention of delegates from all Evangelical Churches of the Continent, Britain and America to "lift up a standard against papal and prelatical arrogance and assumption, and to embody the great essential doctrines which are held in common by all Protestants." Similarly, Congregationalists in England had proposed that a union be formed amongst churches "holding to the voluntary system" (Nonconformists) with the object of combating Infidelity, Popery, Puseyism,¹²⁷ and Plymouth Brethrenism.¹²⁸

Following that conference the Evangelical Alliance was formally established at a conference in London in August 1846 at which 800 churchmen, including about 80 from America and 50 from the Continent, represented 52 different branches of the Christian Church.¹²⁹ The Alliance developed considerable influence throughout the church, even though it had no formal links with any denomination and even though for many years it relied entirely on honorary office bearers. It organized international conferences every few years and a strong program of Christian education, it provided support for missionary programs and it promoted annual weeks of prayer for Christian Unity. Its existence also concentrated attention on the need for the churches to be organized internationally and for some formal means of cooperation between them, but it refused to become involved in plans for a confederation of churches. At the same time the Alliance undermined its own potential influence by refusing membership to non-Trinitarian believers and continuing in an outspokenly anti-Roman Catholic mode while seeking to promote Christian unity in other senses.¹³⁰

... BUT COMPETITION AND CONTROVERSY CONTINUE

But the environment in which the churches were working and in which they were a major factor was the European Colonial Era, still in a highly competitive phase, with repeated changes in relationships between colonies and their rulers, and between the European powers and both their national and independent churches, aggravated by the social and political turmoil of the mid-century round of revolutions. The Protestant churches were stirred by what they saw as the need to compete with the Vatican's centralized and highly organized and disciplined international network. But at the same time there was a varying level of antagonism between each of them as they competed to gain acceptance of their own particular theology and liturgy, to save the souls of the black and coloured races around the world, and to pacify them for the benefit of their colonial powers, their landlords and investors. In many cases antagonism on the mission fields turned to open confrontation. This complicated the lives of the colonial administrators so that in some countries access was closed to all churches except the national church of the colonizing power. In other countries those denominations which were approved were each allocated an area of influence or operation for their missions. In some cases when a denomination was refused an allocation, such as the Roman Catholic Church in Papua, it simply ignored the colonial authority and set up in competition with the others anyway. The result was a worldwide patchwork of confusion. In many instances denominational antagonism and intrigue were added to ethnic differences and have remained to haunt the world as they became a factor in regional and tribal conflicts around the globe.

In the circumstances some farsighted churchman pressed on with their efforts to bring the churches together or to form associations of churches which might offset the effects of continuing fragmentation, the proliferation of sects and the weakening of the gospel message. Whether they were aware of the efforts at reformation and reinvigoration within the Jewish community, and whether they appreciated the significance of the Cleveland Rabbinical Conference in 1855 is not clear and it is doubtful whether the church at large paid it much attention. However such efforts within the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches led to the establishment of the short-lived Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom. The association received the blessing of the pope when it was formed in 1857 and within seven years it had recruited five thousand Anglican, one thousand Roman Catholic and three hundred Greek Orthodox members. Then in 1864 the pope hardened his attitude, condemned the principle on which the association was based, and forced all Catholics to withdraw. He said in effect that united prayer between Roman Catholics and other Christians was impossible.¹³¹

Agitation for the establishment of denominational fellowships or alliances continued and a rash of these were formed before the first council of churches could be organized. In most cases these were prompted by the need to coordinate and support mission activities and to establish competitive international structures, but in some cases they were prompted by the need to ensure uniformity of teaching and doctrinal purity throughout affiliated branches of the denomination. This was actually the motive behind the first venture in inter-country coordination by a Reformed church – that of the Church of England.

The first Anglican Lambeth Conference was convened by the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1867 in response to an approach by the Canadian branch of the church concerning a doctrinal dispute involving the Bishop of Natal. It was set up as a non-binding conference of bishops of the independent Anglican churches, disclaiming any authority as a synod of the church, but it gradually saw the ecumenical possibilities before it and in 1888 it accepted a modified Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral as the basis for conversations with other churches, and set up a series of structured committees to consider relations with the Scandinavian Lutherans, the Reformed Churches, the Old Catholics, the Eastern Churches, and the Free Churchman in England. The Quadrilateral, like the articles of the Evangelical Alliance, was a rigidly Trinitarian statement. It required recognition of: the Old and New Testaments as ‘containing all things necessary to salvation’ and the rule and ultimate standard of faith; The Apostles’ Creed as the Baptismal Symbol and the Nicene Creed as the sufficient statement of the Christian Faith; and the two sacraments “ordained by Christ Himself” – Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.¹³² While it clearly shut the door on discussions with any of the non-Trinitarian churches and it fell far short of anything that the Roman Catholic Church would have been prepared to accept, it was seen by the conference “as essential to the restoration of Unity among the divided branches of Christendom.”

Next came the Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian System, sponsored by two Americans and one Scot, which was convened in 1875. That was the same year that the Hebrew Union College was established by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and while Bismarck’s Kulturkampf was still raging in Germany. That Alliance prepared the ground for the first general conference of the World Presbyterian Alliance which was held in Edinburgh two years later. Its role was to promote support and cooperation between its member churches rather than organic unions.¹³³

In the meantime, in 1876, the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States made approaches to the Wesleyan churches in Britain which resulted in the first meeting of the Methodist Ecumenical Conference in London in 1881. The sponsors of the conference in both the United States and Britain were eager to play down the issue of doctrinal controversies, to ensure fraternity, liberty and variety in worship rather than uniformity, and especially to ensure greater economy, efficiency and moral power in the missionary enterprises of the church. However the issues of opposition to certain aspects of Roman Catholicism and competition in the field were also noted in their agreed statement: “A Methodist Ecumenical Conference might properly consider ... the duty of Methodism in respect of popery, paganism, scepticism, intemperance and kindred vices ...”¹³⁴

SIGNS OF HOPE: COOPERATION AND REFORM IN PARALLEL

Thus the strengthening of organization and missionary resolve within the mainstream reformed churches continued. But so did efforts to achieve reform within Judaism, and before the next of the Christian alliances was established the Pittsburgh Platform – the key statement of American Reform Judaism, with an attempt to define the relationship between Judaism and other world faiths – had been adopted.

The next of the Christian alliances was The Union of Utrecht, 1889, which progressively brought together the Old Catholic Churches of the Netherlands, Switzerland, Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia, and the Polish National Catholic Church in the United States and in Poland. The Declaration of Utrecht, adopted by the Union at that time, gave its Conference of Bishops the authority to determine the relationship of the Old Catholic Churches to each of the other Christian communions.¹³⁵

After fifteen or more years of discussion between the Congregational churches it was another Canadian initiative which led to the convening of the First International Congregational Council in 1891.¹³⁶

The last of the series of church alliances of the ‘great missionary era’ was not established until 1905 when the first Baptist World Congress was held in London and provided the foundation for the Baptist World Alliance.

The Lutheran World Federation, although it grew out of the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference which drew together the Lutheran Churches of Germany and Scandinavia late in the Nineteenth Century, did not convene as a world body until 1923 and is generally regarded as of a later era. It then drew together all churches which acknowledged the unaltered Augsburg Confession and Luther’s Shorter Catechism on the doctrinal basis of Holy Scripture.¹³⁷

During the intervening years, while Christian anti-Semitism was reaching new intensity across Europe, peaking with the Dreyfus Affair and the publication of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and when “the shame of division had begun to penetrate the consciousness of the church”¹³⁸ there were a number of other initiatives which focused the church’s attention on the ecumenical idea.

In one of the most important, from 1891 to 1896 a young Methodist minister cum doctor, journalist and missionary, Henry Lunn, published a periodical, Review of the Churches, in Britain in which he brought together in symposium format the views of leaders from many churches on the contentious issues which separated them. These included the nature of the church, episcopacy, Apostolic succession, clerical celibacy, Biblical criticism and many more. But he believed church leaders should be prepared to debate these issues face to face as well as in print and he organized six conferences at Grindelwald, Switzerland, and published the proceedings in the Review of the Churches as well. He brought together Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Quakers, Old Catholics and people from the French and Swiss Reformed Churches, and the impact was immediate and strong.

The Grindelwald Conferences have been criticised for ignoring almost entirely the great possibilities for church reunions and also the significance of the missionary enterprise of the church.¹³⁹ However they appear to have raised new interest in reunion in many countries and in many churches and they were probably an influence in the eventual establishment of the Federal Council of Churches in the United States.

The concept of churches working in cooperation in a council of churches was the preferred option for those church leaders who, like Elias Sanford, a United States Congregationalist, could not support organic reunion. Sanford said that the union of Roman, Greek and Reformed Churches into one great Catholic body was a goal that was neither possible or desirable. He said that while there was indeed one flock, there was "room in the pastures of Divine love and service for many folds." He gained such support for his ideas among the Protestant churches of the US that in 1905 an Inter-Church Conference on Federation was held in New York. It was the first time that representatives of a number of churches, as opposed to concerned individuals, had met with the approval of their ruling bodies to consider formal cooperation. The conference drew up a constitution for a Federal Council of Churches and, following its adoption by each of the churches, the Council was established in 1908. Like each of the denominational alliances, the council was a union of equals which could only make recommendations to its members on matters of common interest. It had no authority to require action or to impose uniform creeds or forms of government or worship.¹⁴⁰

NO END TO FRAGMENTATION

Each of these developments during the second half of the nineteenth century were very important in improving the capacity of the major Protestant denominations to carry the gospel message around the world. They also established structures and contacts which made it easier for the churches to think ecumenically as the pressures which would require them to do so built up. But the establishment of denominational alliances had also been expected to offset the effect of the fragmentation of the Christian community and to discourage the establishment of new denominations and sects, and to this extent they must be regarded as a failure. Continued fragmentation occurred and some of the vigorous young fragments developed very strong influence. This led to increased tension, antagonism and competition within local communities and to increased attention being placed on the things which divided the churches and other religious groups rather than on their common messages. Controversy raged over whether a Christian of one denomination could take communion with a Christian from another, and bitter criticism was launched against Anglican clergy who took part in joint communion services at conferences of the Evangelical Alliance, the YMCA and at Grindelwald. Thus for the time being each denomination still went its own way. They each established their own theological colleges to train their own ministers in theologies with their own emphases, preaching different routes to salvation, glorying in their distinctive liturgies, organizing their own schools, hospitals and mission agencies and competing for government and private support to do so.

Among the most influential of the new fragments in the United States was the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. Founded in 1830 on revelations which mainstream churches have never accepted, by a prophet whose credentials they have rejected, and with their acceptance of the practice of polygamy (which also brought them into conflict with federal laws which had been based on mainstream Christian ethics), the new fragment represented yet another aspect of the continuing challenge to the church. Its adherents, known as Mormons, are regarded as either heretics or neo-Christians by most churches but they see the revelations to Joseph Smith as completely in harmony with the Bible and as restoring both the primitive church and the universality of the Gospel message. Vigorously evangelical right from the start, the church grew rapidly, drawing converts from the Protestant churches as well as attracting people of no previous religious commitment. That was, of course, an embarrassment to the mainstream churches but, worse still, it was anti-Trinitarian in the sense of the Nicene Creed. It taught that God the Eternal Father, Jesus Christ His Son, and the Holy Ghost are separate and distinct. It had to go. Relentless persecution of the type usually reserved for Jews forced its adherents out of New York, Ohio, Missouri and then Illinois. Finally, in 1847, after a long distance trek they set up their 'Rome' at Salt Lake City, Utah, from which its world wide missionary programme is administered.¹⁴¹

The Salvation Army, a vigorously evangelical, uniformed and highly disciplined movement founded by William Booth in 1865 is probably the best known of the new British fragments. Through its highly organized and extensive community welfare programmes, in which heavy emphasis is put on help for socially disadvantaged groups, the Salvation Army attracts wide public support and exerts an influence quite out of proportion to its numerical strength. Even so, it is still regarded with a touch of suspicion by many mainstream Christians who see its rejection of all sacraments as something akin to heresy rather than as a challenge to the introversion of "normal" sacramental Christianity.

Later, coinciding with the Vatican Council controversy and spurred on by it, a number of anti-Trinitarian movements developed. Noteworthy among them were theosophy which provided the principles for the establishment of the Theosophical Society by Madame Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott in 1875; the Christian Science movement, established by Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy in 1879; and the Jehovah's Witnesses, formally established by Charles Taze Russell in the early 1880s. Each of these were directed at people prepared to explore their religious beliefs and they therefore tended to attract people academically inclined and university students.

The Christian Science movement placed heavy emphasis on the concept of salvation from all evil, including sickness and disease. On the basis that sin, sickness, death and matter only seem real in human understanding, it encouraged people to apply principles of divine harmony to every aspect of life to retain and restore good health.¹⁴² The movement gained significant recognition and credibility through the publication of its highly regarded international newspaper, The Christian Science Monitor.

The Jehovah's Witnesses, known at the time as the 'Millennial Dawnists' or 'International Bible Students', set out to 'shock, rattle and unfrock' the traditional church. Highly pacifist, and using a distinctly different translation of the Bible to mainstream churches, they preach the rejection of any civil laws, steadfastly refuse to enter military service, reject procedures which they see as contravening the laws of God, including blood transfusions, and they anticipate the imminent second coming of Christ.¹⁴³ C.T. Russell, raised as a youth in the traditions of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, was perturbed by such teachings as predestination and eternal torment in hellfire and in 1870, at the age of 18, he started a weekly Bible study group for young men. Seven years later he sold his share of the Russell family business and began full time preaching. The group around him grew steadily but began to fragment due to a dispute over the interpretation of the doctrine of atonement.

In the wake of that dispute Russell began publishing a magazine, the forerunner of The Watchtower, and in 1881 he was instrumental in the establishment of a non-profit Bible Society, the Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society. The Society became anathema to the mainstream churches through its denial of the teachings of a mysterious 'Most Holy Trinity' and they set out to denigrate it on the basis that its teachings were ill-conceived as a result of its rejection of the need for a separate seminary-trained clergy class. It was embroiled in controversy over Russell's teaching that the Great War was in some way related to the imminent second coming of Christ. In some countries Witnesses were gaoled and suffered very badly because of their conscientious objection to war service, but in due course the laws were changed or their sentences were revoked. When Russell died in 1916 he was succeeded as leader of the society by Joseph F. Rutherford.¹⁴⁴

Unlike the other two, the Theosophical Society encouraged the study of comparative religion, and especially the religions of India and the East, in order to further the cause of world harmony and to investigate the spiritual element in human beings and the world.¹⁴⁵ The similarity between the fundamental aims of the Theosophical Society and Bahaism, and the manner of their establishment within a decade of each other, one within a Christian environment and one within a Muslim environment, is noteworthy. A Russian-born American spiritualist and mystique who was derided as a charlatan in many quarters, Blavatsky moved from the United States to India only two years after establishing her movement. It has been suggested that she drew heavily on Hindu and Buddhist writings as the basis of her philosophy,¹⁴⁶ which has also been described as an amalgam of Neoplatonic and Eastern ideas.¹⁴⁷ As one of the first people to present Eastern philosophy in a popular form she, and her successors, had considerable impact on Western awareness of the East, especially in America, Britain and Germany, and on the revival of interest in Hinduism and Buddhism.

GOOD WORKS WITH STRINGS ATTACHED CAUSE TENSION

While all of these developments were taking place – and stimulated by them – there was another group of Christian organizations which were flexing their muscles to become an important part of the ecumenical movement without being formally linked to any of the churches. They were youth movements: the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), a corresponding association for young women (YWCA), and the Student Christian Movement (SCM). They were each organized non-denominationally but most of their support came from mainstream Protestants.

The YMCA was established in England in 1844 and the YWCA ten years later. The four founders, an Episcopalian, a Methodist, a Baptist and a Congregationalist, were determined to bring young people together in a social, educational and working environment free of denominational inhibitions, and committed to evangelical and missionary pursuits world wide. The YMCA spread rapidly and the World Alliance of YMCAs was founded in Paris in 1855 to link related societies which were already established in a number of countries. Henri Dunant of Geneva reflected widely held feeling when he wrote that their aim must be "to spread abroad that ecumenical spirit which transcends nationalities, languages, denominations, ecclesiastical problems, ranks and occupations: to realize in a word, and as far as possible, that article in the creed which we all adhere to: 'I believe in the Communion of Saints and in the Holy Catholic Church.'"¹⁴⁸

However there was one effect of its activities in countries in which it worked alongside 'fringe' Christian groups who were antagonistic to the Nicene formula, and non-Christians, which is clear from the statement of purpose adopted by the alliance. It reads:

The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be His disciples in their faith and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of His Kingdom among young men.

Persons who could not subscribe to that statement were unable to use the facilities of the association and this put another barrier between the mainstream churches and the rest of the community, whether liberal-fringe Christians, Jews, Muslims, people of non-Messianic faiths, Agnostics or simply those of no view at all.¹⁴⁹

In parallel with the YMCA, Student Christian Movements were started independently in many universities and colleges. In 1886, when a student Christian conference was held at Mount Hermon, some one hundred students offered for service in overseas missions and the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions took root as the missionary wing of the SCM. Nine years later the World's Student Christian Federation was established at a conference in Sweden and over the next two or three generations the two linked youth movements provided many of the people who were to lead their churches in missionary work as cooperation gradually replaced competition in Africa, India, China and elsewhere. Similarly, many of the leaders of the international ecumenical movement had their first experience of interdenominational cooperation within the S.C.M.s.

A prime mover in the formation of the World Student Christian Federation in 1895 was Dr. John R. Mott, then thirty years of age, who had also been closely involved in the YMCA. Dr.

Mott was a firm believer in both the continuity of the task of missionary work and the need for it to be tackled on a basis of cooperation. His influence shows through the conduct of two interdenominational conferences in 1900, one in London for students, and the other in New York for missionary organizers, promoters and functionaries. The New York conference was immense for the period (with 1,700 representatives from 115 societies in 48 countries plus 600 working missionaries) and its sheer scale suggests a new sense of cooperation. However it seems to have been characterized by the triumphalism and arrogance of Christians whose belief that their religion had “it” – God Incarnate – and this led them to act as if “it” gave the church the right to ride slipshod over lesser faiths.

‘PARLIAMENT’ A BOLD STEP IN INTERFAITH RELATIONS

The organization of the World’s Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893 may not have been planned to offset this aspect of the church’s attitude but it certainly helped to stimulate cooperation between churches rather than competition and it provided a stimulus towards the establishment of councils of churches. Professor Philip Schaff, theologian and church historian at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, who had previously predicted an eventual merging of Protestantism and Catholicism into an Evangelical Catholicism, urged the churches to form a federal or confederate union. Such a union, he said, would be a “voluntary association of different churches in their official capacity, each retaining its freedom and independence in the management of its internal affairs, but all recognizing one another as sisters with equal rights, and cooperating in general enterprises, such as the spread of the gospel at home and abroad, the defence of the faith against infidelity, the elevation of the poor and neglected classes of society, works of philanthropy and charity, and moral reform.”¹⁵⁰

STOP THE DRIFT!

Not everyone in the church agreed with John R. Mott. In his ninety third and final year in 1903, Pope Leo XVII, in a clear reaction to the disquiet which Zionism had generated within the church, had set up a Pontifical Biblical Commission consisting of several cardinals and consultants to strictly supervise interpretation and criticism of the Bible and Biblical history.¹⁵¹ The boat rocking which had built up under the modernists was getting worse with the stimulus of Zionists crawling out of the woodwork. It just had to stop! Four years later, in 1907, Pius X had taken the war against theological subversion a step further. He issued a decree and an encyclical letter exposing a wide range of modernist doctrines and theories. But, like the Zionists, the Modernists wouldn’t keep quiet. They couldn’t be sent down by the Inquisition. It had been disbanded. There had to be some method of suppressing them. An oath might do the trick. While John R. Mott and the progressive group of Protestants in Edinburgh were planning how to stir up some fresh thinking, Pius was putting the finishing touches to a lengthy Oath Against the Errors of Modernism which was obligatory for all Roman Catholic clergy in teaching or pastoral positions, world wide, from 1910 to 1967. Even then it was simply replaced with a shortened text. The full oath begins:

I firmly embrace and accept each and everything that is defined, proposed and declared by the infallible teaching authority of the church, and in particular those principal truths which are opposed to the errors of this time.

There follow eleven clauses dealing with the Creator; revelation, miracles and prophecy; the Roman Catholic Church's authority "directly instituted by the true historical Christ Himself" and built upon Peter; the church Fathers and dogma; faith; submission to the twin documents of 1907; history; interpretation through education (rejected, of course); interpretation through science (likewise); and the divinity of Tradition. Finally come the death-defying promises to hold the lot as absolute and immutable, to keep it inviolate and to teach it without deviation. 152

Having set itself so rigidly against scientific development and historical interpretation the papacy very largely lost the capacity to keep abreast of such matters and having, in effect, rejected both the capacity and the opportunity to be involved in them it also effectively forfeited the right to pronounce on them. Of course that has never stopped it from doing so. It simply undermined both its own authority and the ability of other fragments of the church to have their voices heard. An apologist for the papal line of reasoning might declare that being infallible it doesn't need the facts to make a judgement.

Naturally the church's immutable traditions and doctrines included its library full of Mariology. In fact it was very fresh in people's minds. It had been reinforced with two encyclicals by Leo XIII in 1891 and 1896 and yet another, by Pius X, in 1904 to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. That was within months of the setting up of the Pontifical Biblical Commission. The church just had to believe that "... nothing of the vast treasure of all grace ... is, according to God's will, given to us without Mary." ¹⁵³ She had become, according to Pius X, "... the primary minister in the distribution of the divine graces."¹⁵⁴ The net effect, with the introduction of special October Masses, heavy emphasis on family rosaries and the requirement for children to be given mass from a very young age, was to cloak Christianity in even more mysticism and to make it extremely difficult for believers to grasp the meaning of the Messiah's life and the Gospel message. The barriers between man and God were being reinforced with blind determination.

In the meantime, in November 1905, an Inter-Church Conference on Federation was held in New York. A constitution for a Federal Council of Churches was drawn up. This was just three months after the World Zionist Organization had rejected the option of a Jewish homeland in Uganda and a minority of its delegates had withdrawn to form the Jewish Territorial Association, and while France was legislating to separate the church and state. However it was three years before the council was finally convened, in 1908. Of the five aims set out in its constitution it is the fourth aim which reflects the circumstances and the social pressures of the time most clearly: "To secure a larger combined influence for the Churches of Christ in all matters affecting the moral and social condition of the people, so as to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life." The other aims referred to expressing the fellowship and catholic unity of the Christian Church; bringing the Christian bodies of America into united service for Christ and the world; encouraging devotional fellowship and mutual counsel on spiritual life and religious activity; organizing local branches of the Federal Council.¹⁵⁵

A NEW APPROACH TO ACHIEVE A CHRISTIAN WORLD

Then came the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference in 1910, with Dr. Mott at the helm, and the first tentative steps were taken which led, two world wars and thirty eight years later, to the establishment of the World Council of Churches. The Christian church had reached a turning point. Fragmentation seemed to have run its course. The process of reconciliation and cooperation had been triggered and thereafter the church would talk reunion and not division. But Edinburgh was just the beginning and at that point not many attitudes had really changed.

The church was still European in outlook. It simply involved some extraterritorial Europeans. The Secretary of State for the Imperial German Colonial Office sent a message of goodwill. It probably reflected the remark attributed to Bismarck that "Germany as a Christian State must seek to realize Christian teaching in its collective life." An observer might wonder whether he said that before, during or after his Kulturkampf. Perhaps it was to help justify his Anti-Semitic collaboration with the pope. Former US President Theodore Roosevelt sent a message, together with his apologies for not attending in his capacity as an appointed representative of the Dutch Reformed Church of America. And the British King, George V, also sent a message. He was gratified with the fraternal cooperation of so many churches and societies from Europe, the United States and the British Empire in spreading knowledge and principles of Christianity throughout the world in the cause of peace. He also hoped divine wisdom might guide the conference towards Christian unity and "the beneficent ends which the Conference has in view."¹⁵⁶

Those "beneficent ends" were to plan for the evangelization of all the non-Christian World; to counteract the influence of the contemporary scientific and technological revolution of the West on China, Japan and other areas; to repel the rapid advance of Islam in Africa as well as in China, Turkey and other areas; to eliminate Animism in countries such as China and Japan and both Animism and Fetishism in Africa; to improve the moral and social conditions of the peoples of the non-Christian lands; and to generate a spirit of cooperation among missionary societies so that the main tasks could be completed.

The conference was very concerned at the rapid advance of Islam in Africa and one of its sections recorded fear that Africa could even become a Muslim continent. Most of the missionaries present were also suspicious of Indian Nationalism. Many accepted the view that non-Christian religions were perfect specimens of absolute error and masterly pieces of hell's inventions which Christianity was called upon to oppose, uproot and destroy. They tended to adopt the stance of commandos determined to dislodge the enemy. But there were some, converts from other religions, who challenged the general missionary claims to race and cultural superiority and even demanded autonomy for the churches in their countries.¹⁵⁷

The conference was also concerned with the new Zionism, but it does not seem to have recognized the fundamental challenge to the church, its doctrines and its view of itself which it represented. It clung to the assumption that the Christian revelation was absolute and final. A Scottish delegate who said that evangelism should be extended to even scattered Jewish villages probably spoke for a large number of those present when he said the church required the Jew for the accomplishment of her task. Echoes of Civiltà Cattolica in 1897 and the pope's conversations with Herzl. But perhaps he meant that the church needed the Jews in the sense of helping to bring the Messianic Age to fulfillment rather than in the long-established sense of the Jewish people having been rejected and degraded. Perhaps. However the conference set a note of tolerance and optimism when it adopted the statement of another section which noted that Jews gained a truer perspective of Christianity than that which they have previously known, (or experienced perhaps), when they could be reached through Gospel preaching.¹⁵⁸

To its credit the conference, and the church tagging along behind, hoisted a very bright beacon indeed when it noted the hostility towards Christianity which students from Asia and Africa took home with them after visits to the West. It recognized that they received unchristian treatment; that they saw differences between the creeds and the conduct of Western Christians; and that there were too few people in the churches.¹⁵⁹ Then, in his closing address, Dr. Mott hit the nail on the head. He suggested that the delegates should have been increasingly humbled as they discovered that the greatest hindrance to the expansion of Christianity lay within themselves. The church had not yet seriously attempted to bring the living Christ to all living men, he said.¹⁶⁰ He was awake to the need for rejuvenation of the church through continued reform and reconciliation.

THE VATICAN TOUGHENS ITS APPROACH

As if the anti-modernism oath was not sufficient to manacle the church and restrict human understanding the pope supported the establishment and operation of a secret service, the Sodalitium Pianum, by Catholic Integrist under Monsignor Umberto Benigni in 1911. Its purpose was to ensure that every cultural, social and political activity within the church or undertaken by the clergy was in accord with the oath. It used dubious detective methods to uncover those clerics who, after taking the oath, continued to pursue modernist activities and ideas. Such people were either exposed publicly for the disgrace of a broken oath to provide their punishment, or subjected to personal attacks for indiscretions in no way connected with their modernist views, or reported to Vatican authorities for formal disciplinary action. Although the pope apparently did not initiate the secret service he confirmed his support for it, in writing, in 1913.^{161 162}

The church, having thus anchored itself in the past, and with its infallible head serving a self-imposed prison sentence in the capital city of a nation whose unification it had tried to prevent, then prepared to support its gaoler in an imperial land grab. The Italian Government, struggling to ease a serious recession with widespread unemployment and idle capital and, like Germany, being envious of the Empires of its neighbours, decided the time was ripe for its own bit of empire building. Just a few months after the antimodernism oath had been put into effect Italy invaded Turkey's main Libyan provinces of Tripolitania and Cirenaica which had been left in Turkey's hands by Bismarck's 1884 conference. It succeeded in capturing the coastal towns from Turkish forces but could not penetrate the cordon of tenacious Bedouin nomads to occupy the interior.

Europe's Roman Catholics were about to experience the conflicts of interest and tensions which they had long accused Jews of having, which come from attachment to an institutional church based in another country. For a wide range of self-interest reasons the rest of the world didn't like what it was watching in Libya and other governments put pressure on Italy to drop its Libyan adventure. Not the least important reason was the disruptive effect it was having on negotiations with Turkey for the oil concessions in Iraq, but the public posturing was over the very modern concept of self-determination. However the Italian government couldn't back out. The Bank of Rome, identified with aristocratic "clerical" families, with established commercial and financial operations in Libya and other regions of the Levant, and as owner-operators of a steamship line of five vessels, actively stirred up Catholic support for the war. Bishop Bonomelli at Cremona pushed the line that a Libyan colony would provide a lot of employment for emigrants and of course no one had to remind the government that the expansion of the army, coupled with the industrial war effort, should soak up unemployment at a great rate.¹⁶³

STOP THE ROT WITH A HOLY WAR

Then there was another factor. The Bedouin resistance was being led by Sheikh Sayyid Ahmad, the head of the Sanusi Brotherhood, a Muslim religious organization. As the war continued his small group rapidly gained the support of other groups and communities and became the focal point for a major nationalist armed resistance movement. His efforts were supported by Muslims throughout North Africa and the Middle East, and gifts of money and arms flowed into Libya from unofficial committees in Turkey, Syria, Egypt and the Hejaz (Arabia).^{164 165} To the Catholic hierarchy this represented a golden opportunity to reconcile the Italian State and the Church and its adherents. There was even just a chance that the papacy might regain its lost temporal authority with the re-establishment of a papal state.

From Cardinals of the Curia, such as the former Apostolic Delegate to Constantinople, Cardinal Vannutelli, from poets and from parish priests across the country the message went out that the Libyan enterprise was actually a holy war against Islam. It was therefore not only an act of patriotism to support the war but also a religious responsibility. However the Vatican was equally alert to the complications if there was an open confrontation between itself and the Ottoman Empire, and it was at pains to present a face of neutrality and even to deplore the crusading attitude of the Catholic Trust Press, the clerical staff of which would have been holding to their brand new teaching oath, of course.¹⁶⁶

Italy's recession continued to worsen. For a couple of years church and state had drawn gradually closer together than they had been since before the reunification of the peninsula. But by 1913 the nation had slid into a constitutional crisis with the Catholic community deeply divided within itself. Right and left wing factions sponsored competing political parties and newspapers, and as the whole of Europe slid towards war the Vatican hierarchy, with its claims to sovereignty over Rome still not satisfied, leaned heavily towards the right wing.¹⁶⁷ It alienated the progressive academic elite who linked with the anticlerical "syndicalists" who became determined to replace Christianity with the reign of a proletarian elite. It also alienated the underemployed working class. It seemed determined to force the majority of Italians either into socialist or fascist camps.

IN RUSSIA: MORE ANTI-SEMITISM AND RASPUTIN'S SPELL

Over in Russia the Orthodox Church seemed equally determined to push the majority of Russians into the revolutionary camp. As an official instrument of state it was openly chauvinistic. It was also steeped in anti-Semitic xenophobia, it accepted some extraordinary interpretations of the Incarnation and Christ's divinity, and it widely expected that, as the third and final Rome, Russia would be the scene of an impending ultimate clash between Christian and non-Christian forces.¹⁶⁸ Religious mysticism went from bad to worse with a band of miracle workers, monks and prophets being the main advisers at court. When an epileptic cripple, Mitya Koliabin, whose fitful ravings were regarded by the court monks as inspired prophecies, got involved in foretelling the birth of an heir to the throne in 1905 one of the spin-offs was that a deceased hermit named Seraphim was canonized. That simply contributed another dimension to the national social environment which was charged with moral disintegration, feverish sexual depravity and absolute imperial decadence within which the tsar tried to conduct a war against Japan; to make a bid for control of the Bosphorus; to put down a revolution with his Bloody Sunday; to make a treaty with Britain over Persia's oil resources; and to force all of Russia's Jews either into exile or the grave, more or less all at once.¹⁶⁹

In such circumstances the tsar (and tsarina) also met and fell under the spell of a licentious, hypnotic, superstitious wandering lay Elder named Grigory Rasputin. In 1916 he was assassinated in legendary circumstances by a group of aristocrats in a desperate bid to save the monarchy when World War I was running hard against Russia. But for nine critical years Rasputin was arguably the most influential person in Russia. It is said that no significant decision was taken by the tsar, whether about peasant reforms, Jewish persecution, the sacking of ministers and generals, or the waging of foreign wars, until either he or the tsarina had consulted him. Historians differ in their assessment of Rasputin's importance but they seem to agree on one thing: his overall influence was destructive and helped to drag Russia relentlessly into its revolution.

Rasputin has been widely described as a monk but he had no formal positions in the church hierarchy and the modern church is quick to point out that he was a lay Elder, that he did not represent Russian clericalism, and that the infatuated tsarina took him to be a spokesman for the peasantry. In that context the church is happy to admit that he was a man possessed by lust and dark passions and that his fall dragged down those who had received him as an inspired prophet.¹⁷⁰ However it cannot wash its hands of him. He was introduced at court by members of the tsar's clerical gang; the church hierarchy bathed in his glory and it was happy to use him as a channel for communications with the tsar. He was also a personal confidant of Bishop Hermogen, the moving spirit behind the anti-Semitic Union of True Russians, who was described by Grigory Rasputin's daughter Maria as the most popular man in Russia.¹⁷¹

DAR AL-ISLAM: THE BEGINNINGS OF DYNAMIC REAPPRAISAL

Now: the third partner. While Rome and St. Petersburg were intent on pushing Italy and Russia to the point of social and political revolution through negative and restrictive policies, the various wings of Islam were undergoing a dynamic reappraisal and reformation which was also aimed, in part, at breaking the grip of oppressive systems. It affected Muslim communities in North and East Africa, the Middle East and Indonesia but it showed most forcefully in the formation of the Muslim League in India in 1906. The so-called Islamic revival of the 1980s has its roots in two much earlier streams of thought, or influences.

The first was a puritanical spiritual revival at the same time as, and having much in common with, the Wesleyan revival in the Reformed Christian church. In India it developed from the work of a Sufi philosopher, Shah Wali Allah, who was searching for a social and economic system based on Islamic principles just as the Mughal dynasty was beginning to break up.¹⁷² In Arabia about the same time Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab (died 1787) began a campaign against moral laxity, and practices such as saint worship, Sufi mysticism and superstition, and intercession through the prophet Muhammad which had rubbed off on Muslims from their contact with such Christian practices. The movement which grew around him, bitterly opposed by those whose moral laxity he challenged, rejected all traditions which had cluttered up medieval Islam and relied entirely on the Qur'an and the Sunna.¹⁷³ But although it stimulated a strong revival of puritanical militancy among Muslims, the Wahhabism also proved divisive because it represented the greatest fundamentalist challenge to Shi'ism since the original divide. The excesses of a minority, greatly feared even by other Sunnis, included the ravaging of Shiite shrines such that it aroused lasting passions and led to the Shiites becoming more diligent in guarding their separate identity.¹⁷⁴ The divide between Sunni and Shii Islam was just as deep as the divides within Christianity between the Catholic, Orthodox and Reformed streams.

However, among Muslim theologians who began to build on the Wahhabi movement and to relate Islamic principles to the results of scientific investigations which were flowing out of Europe was Sayyid Ahmed Khan who wrote Essays on the life of Muhammad as a response to Sir William Muir's critical assessment of medieval Islam in his Life of Muhammad. When he returned to India from Cambridge Sayyid Ahmed Khan founded the Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental College. Another reformer of a similar mould was Jamalal Din al Afghani who actively pressed the idea of a cohesive movement in contrast to the fragmented community left in the wake of the medieval decline. Such a movement for reconciliation and reunion was needed just as much within the Muslim community as in the Christian church because fragmentation was continuing in much the same manner as it was within Christianity, and that movement is directly comparable to the Ecumenical Movement within Christianity. Widely known splinter movements which developed from Islam in Persia about that time are Babism, Baha'ism and the Ahmadiya movement.

The influence of the Wahhabi movement was also carried to Indonesia by pilgrims returning from Mecca. This was especially so after 1852 when the Dutch authorities abolished a discriminatory passport fee of 110 florins for Haj pilgrims which had successfully poisoned relations between converts to Christianity and Muslims.¹⁷⁵

ANTI-COLONIAL REACTION

The second revivalist stream developed as a reaction to European colonial policies, and the imposition of Christianity coupled with deliberate denigration of Islam. Europeans, by then accustomed to the separation of church and state, failed to grasp the way in which religious and civic life had remained integrated under a single authority in Muslim communities. Their assumption seems to have been that if the local political ruler had been subjugated then Christianity could simply be substituted for Islam in much the same way that the Church of England had simply replaced the Dutch Reformed Church as the state church in Cape Colony. However some adapted to the facts of life more readily than others, or perhaps they just gave up the struggle more quickly. Thus, in North Africa the French had adapted their system of administration to fit in with existing authority structures¹⁷⁶ while in India the British pressed ahead relentlessly to impose their "superior" system.

During the 1860s and 1870s a number of Turks, educated in the ways of Europe and influenced by the concurrent reunification of Germany under Bismarck and Italy under Garibaldi, began to spread the idea of a re-united Pan Islamic community throughout the Ottoman Empire which was then in the process of being cut up piecemeal. Al-Azhar University in Cairo became (and remained even under British occupation) the focal point for the movement and linked with Muslim communities and movements of a like mind in Africa and Asia as well as the Middle East.¹⁷⁷

Muslim communities in Central and East Africa began to seethe with resentment at their community structures being demolished, at their ambition being stifled and at domination by minority Christian communities which were being treated preferentially in accordance with the great powers' continuing commitment to the principles of the Holy Alliance and the pursuit of patriarchal Christian solidarity in their foreign policies. [See above, chapter 14, p. 1] In India Muslim communities, unwilling to use the new-style English language and government-subsidized Christian schools at which their faith was denigrated, began to lose the race for the available civil and commercial positions to Hindus. Friction increased and, being given preferment by their English overlords, some extremist Hindus developed arrogance and aggressiveness not normally associated with their faith. So friction compounded friction and began to open up the old sores from the days of the first Muslim invasions.

When a Muslim was elected president of the Indian National Congress in 1887, two years after it was founded, Sayyid Ahmad Khan saw dangers in what others saw as a desirable situation. He feared that the keen edge of the new puritanical Pan Islamic movement would be blurred and that all hope of an Islamic Society would be lost as Muslims and Hindus sought to find compromise solutions to their problems under British rule. His fear was quite reasonable because that was clearly one motive behind British support for the Congress. Within a couple of years he publicly proposed political separation as the only way to preserve essential Islamic faith and interests within a Muslim community.¹⁷⁸ The formation of the Muslim League was a result of widespread support for his views.

And in Turkey, where the Pan-Islamic Movement had been initiated, the humiliation of virtual vassalage to the squabbling powers of Christian Europe, with autocratic rule imposed to ensure the privileges of foreigners, led to the development of related movements among students and army officers with heavily political orientation. A Freedom and Progress Committee of army officers was organized in 1891 and a secret society was established in Damascus by Mustafa Kemal (Ataturk) in 1905. With concern growing about the probability of the empire being partitioned, the fate of the 1876 constitution, and troubles in Albania and Arabia, these groups formed the party of Young Turks and in July, 1908, they led an uprising in Macedonia, forced the reintroduction of constitutional government, and sought reconciliation both within Islam and between Islam and Christianity. They also sought to reverse some of the bitterly anti-Christian domestic policies of the sultan and his government, and to introduce equal rights and suffrage for all citizens.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE UNDER STRAIN

But Crete and Greece immediately gave the Greater Greece Movement new momentum by declaring a formal union; Austria-Hungary and Russia had talks in September about how to carve up the Balkans but Ferdinand I got in first and proclaimed himself tsar of an independent Bulgaria; and in October Catholic Austria annexed Turkey's two European provinces, Bosnia and Herzegovina, over which it had gained a form of protectorate at the Congress of Berlin thirty years earlier. Serbia, which had designs on those provinces as a part of Greater Serbia, objected and mobilized its forces. Relations between Britain, Austria and Russia deteriorated. Britain opposed Russian plans to force open the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles until Russia backed Serbia against Austria, then Britain changed, giving its support to Russia, and called for another international conference to resolve the future of Bosnia. Germany supported Austria, and Italy signed a secret treaty to support the Russian position

With each of Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, Germany, France, Britain and the Vatican pursuing their commercial, military or religious interests in the region the Balkans countries were not left to work out their own fate. They staggered from crisis to crisis and Europe gradually slid towards its war with its emperors and tsars making and breaking unworkable (or irreconcilable) treaties on cruise weekends¹⁷⁹, haggling over who would exploit which pieces of Asia, Africa and the once great Muslim Ottoman Empire, and dragging the rest of the world with it. With the European powers treating Turkey with such arrogant disdain, the Young Turks deposed Sultan Abdul Hamid, replacing him in 1909 with Muhammad V under whom they assumed the real power of government, adopted increasingly nationalistic policies and moved to suppress the Greek and Armenian Christian minorities.

In 1910 Serbia saw its ambitions undercut further when Nikita I proclaimed himself king of Montenegro, and in 1911, with Italy at war with Turkey over its annexation of Tripoli, and with unrest in Albania, Colonel Dimitrijevic-Apis established the secret Greater Serbian Association, better known as the Union of Death or the Black Hand. Then in March 1912, in anticipation that the great powers were about to partition Turkey, Serbia and Bulgaria joined forces to prevent Austria's expansion. They were soon joined by Greece and Montenegro and in October the four, in alliance as the Balkan League, declared war on Turkey.

When the Balkan League achieved a swift, decisive victory it suited no one. The thieves of Europe began to fall out very quickly. The can of worms twisted and turned! Serbia demanded access to the Adriatic. It was supported by Russia but opposed by Italy which wanted to annex Albania and the Dodecanese, and sought to invoke the Triple Alliance. Austria opposed both Italy and Serbia but supported Bulgaria which claimed more territory. Germany and Britain convened a conference in May, 1913, and in the so-called Peace of London Turkey was forced to cede more territory in a bid to satisfy everyone else. But Bulgaria, dissatisfied with its share, invaded Serbia in June, leading to intervention by Rumania, Greece, Montenegro and Turkey on the side of Serbia. Austria threatened to intervene to save Bulgaria (and expand its own empire in the act) but Italy and Germany prevented it. Another round of peace talks in Bucharest, in August, saw Bulgaria lose Macedonia and Dobruja, Crete join Greece, and Albania become autonomous. Serbia, its ambitions thwarted, was the most upset.

A 'FORTUITOUS COINCIDENCE'

An uneasy peace prevailed until the Greater Serbia Association engineered the assassination of Austria's Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his duchess on June 28, 1914, during a state visit to Sarajevo. It was the very day that the Grand Vizier announced the government's intention to grant major concessions to the Turkish Petroleum Company and, in doing so, unintentionally raised the stakes in the European competition for resources by two or three notches. Only two weeks before the assassination the British House of Commons had voted overwhelmingly to buy a controlling interest in Anglo-Persian Oil, a partner with German interests in the proposed Turkish Petroleum Co. Clearly, even though the Serbian government was not implicated in the assassination, there was going to be another round of territorial ‘adjustments’ and the great powers each saw the opportunity to further their own ambitions. The coincidence of events was most unfortunate. Some might say ‘fortuitous.’

Britain was a bit hesitant at first but it soon saw an opportunity to strengthen its position in the land bridge to Persia, the Ottoman oil territories which abutted it, and Asia, and to prevent anyone else from blocking its path. It wanted Turkey’s oil – preferably without sharing it with Germany – and it certainly didn’t want Germany in control of the Bosphorus with a railway to Baghdad or Basra separating its Persian and Egyptian interests, including the Suez Canal. Even Russian control of the Bosphorus was preferable to that package.

France saw an alliance with Russia as a means of applying pressure on Germany for concessions. It didn’t mind much who controlled the Bosphorus but it was keen to keep the United States out of the Middle East and its main interest was to recover Alsace-Lorraine from Germany.

On the other hand Germany, regardless of the boat-board treaty between the Kaiser and the Tsar, didn’t want a Pan Slavic Union sitting across its Berlin to Baghdad railway scheme. It didn’t want Russian control of the Bosphorus and it didn’t want to share Turkey’s oil in Iraq with either Britain or the United States, and it saw its alliance with Austria-Hungary as a means of quick subjugation of France.

Austria-Hungary was eager to press on towards its own greater empire which had to include a slice of the Adriatic coast.

Russia’s main interest was to keep the Caucasus and gain Galacia from Poland, Armenia,¹⁸⁰ with the prospect of alternative access from there to the Mediterranean through Cilicia to Mersin; to gain Constantinople and a Pan Slavic Union with all of the Balkans which would give it effective protective custody of Rumania and its oil fields; and secure its other Balkans trade and access through the Straits in order to avoid being trapped in isolation with the threat of a revolution at home.

Italy’s adventure in Libya had been a distraction for Turkey and had therefore assisted the newly independent Balkans provinces to relieve her of the balance of her European territory, and Italy wanted the Trentino plus Austria’s existing Adriatic coastline.

Serbia, like most other landlocked countries, still wanted a length of coastline and a decent port and this meant either a piece of Albania or Macedonia., so Serbia was getting in the way of both Austria and Italy, and they were all in each other’s way.

But Turkey wanted to keep its remaining European territory. It wanted to avoid further incursions into its Asian territory and it wanted the return of the Caucasus complete with its oil, which Russia had grabbed, and bickering over the spoils between the new states had backfired and let Turkey back in to bid for some of her former provinces.

The Vatican’s interest was to see that it was one or more of its concordat holders which came out on top so that it could impose its influence over some of the Orthodox or Muslim populations. It could see some wonderful opportunities. To start with there were the Orthodox Churches in the Balkans with their focal point in Constantinople. If Austria, the strongest remaining Catholic monarchy, were to gain control of the Balkans the re-absorption of those Orthodox churches would be almost a matter of course and Russia would be the odd man out. If Russia, clearly in a weakened state, were to lose a war with Austria and Germany the possibility of a clean sweep was very real. Then somewhere along the line Austria might be persuaded to cede Trentino to Italy and, in recognition for the Vatican's support, Italy might even agree to return Rome to the church.

WHO WILL MOVE FIRST?

What a lovely can of worms! Someone had to miss out but the Kaiser, seeing his opportunity, determined it would not be Germany. Austria-Hungary helped by striking the first blow. On July 23, 1914, as the French president and prime minister departed from St. Petersburg after giving Russia an assurance that France would support Russia and Serbia if hostilities broke out, it issued what amounted to a territorial ultimatum to Serbia. Then, ignoring a conciliatory response from Serbia, it declared war against her on July 28. Next day Russia ordered partial mobilization of its army ready to support Serbia and the concept of a Pan Slavic union or, more to the point, because it could see Constantinople and the Bosphorus slipping through its hands – and it was being egged on by Britain and France in their attempts to encircle Germany. Russia promptly upgraded to general mobilization 24 hours later. That day, July 30, Kaiser Wilhelm was handed a diplomatic telegram from St. Petersburg which, presumably, referred to the Anglo-Russian policy which Britain intended to pursue. Infuriated, he demanded that England have “the mask of the Christian peace-lover publicly torn from her face.” He penned a note that:

our Consuls in Turkey and India, our political agents, etc. must inflame the whole Moslem world to a savage uprising against this hateful, devious, unscrupulous nation of shopkeepers; for if we are to bleed to death, then England shall at least lose India.”¹⁸¹

Next day, July 31, urged on by Germany which advised against mediation because it could let Britain in, Austria-Hungary ordered general mobilization. On August 1, Germany also mobilized and declared war on Russia. It was coming to the defence of Austria, naturally, and its decision had nothing to do with control of the Bosphorus on route to Turkey's oil or with keeping Russia out of Rumania. Anyway, both the German and British governments were happy for the world to believe that. If Germany admitted its greedy motives Britain would have to do likewise and that would be no basis on which to get the dominions to send their sons as cannon fodder in a war they wouldn't want to support. It mobilized the Royal Navy the same day.

Then France's greed for the industry of Alsace-Lorraine, (known to have been greatly increased since it was forced to cede the region to Germany forty years earlier), helped everyone conceal their motives. France did not declare war against anyone but announced that it would act to protect its own interests. As it had a treaty with Russia this was taken to mean, naturally, that it would go to her aid because Germany had declared war and it would pick off Alsace-Lorraine on the way past. Germany clearly had to act first to prevent the powerful French army from intervening in the east and to protect Alsace-Lorraine. Because the French defensive and offensive forces faced Germany in a semicircle Germany had to bypass them to the north, thus driving a coastal wedge between France and Britain at the same time, just in case Britain should ignore her pleas and join the scrap on the side of France, using the Entente Cordiale as an excuse.

Germany announced on August 2 that her troops would march through Belgium on route to Paris and appealed for Belgium to let them pass and for Britain to remain neutral. Being somewhat over optimistic that Britain would remain neutral and that a clash could be avoided, Germany declared war on France next day, after entering into a secret treaty with Turkey to protect it from Russia, and Turkey declared its neutrality. With the big powers now playing for keeps, Rumania thought it best to stay right out of the game. It also declared its neutrality on August 3. Britain needed a rationale which would be acceptable to its people, and its empire, if it wanted their support to join the fray in order to secure its interests. It therefore 'responded' to Germany's moves with an ultimatum on August 4 that Germany should respect Belgium neutrality. It then took advantage of an opportunity to intervene under the banner of a moral war and not a resources or territorial war two days later when trigger happy young German soldiers, seeing action for the first time, turned a bit of local Belgian opposition into a village massacre. Germany's plan to expand to the west and to secure its resources route to the east without competition from Britain was coming badly unstuck to the disadvantage of the whole world and not just herself.

The battle with the bullets and the much more damaging battle for the minds began immediately. Britain sent troops across to France while Germany transferred a couple of battle cruisers to Turkey so that she could close the Bosphorus and have a go for the Caucasus. The Vatican supported Austria and said nothing about atrocities in Belgium¹⁸², which Britain was giving maximum recruiting publicity, while Italy sat on the fence and told the pope to keep quiet.

JAPAN SAYS: EUROPE OUT!

If the great powers thought they could restrict the impact of their squalid greedy squabbles to their European games area, or simply strip each other of their overseas colonies without any other repercussions, they were quickly proven wrong. Japan saw an excellent opportunity to start pushing the European powers out of Asia. It declared war on Germany on August 23 and immediately moved to occupy the German territories in China and to extend its influence further south in doing so. [Germany had used the same technique as the other Holy Alliance signatories to establish its position in China. It had occupied Tsingtao in 1897 in 'retaliation' for the murder of two Christian missionaries, and immediately secured a concession to build the Shantung railway. A 99-year lease of Kiaochow Province followed, the next year, at the same time that Britain negotiated its additional Hong Kong related leases, through the Peking Conventions.]

What had started as a bit of power play in the Balkans land bridge was rapidly getting out of hand and developing into a major war of empires. At a conference in London in September, 1914, the Triple Entente powers (Britain, France and Russia) agreed not to conclude separate peace deals with either of the Central Powers (Germany and Austria-Hungary) in the hope that their resolve would crack under the pressure of a united front. At the same time, German diplomat Max von Oppenheim was preparing his recommendations to satisfy the Kaiser's demands: a Pan-Islamic propaganda campaign and a Holy War to incite Muslims everywhere to rise against their foreign masters – except Germany! ¹⁸³

People all the way along the route from Berlin to Baghdad and well beyond were going to have to pay for the bitter power struggle between four of the great Christian nations as they plumbed the depths of religious manipulation: especially the Armenians who were trapped in the strategic region through which every one of them wanted to pass and over which they were determined to have control. A program of religious subversion which grew to huge proportions was developed. The main targets were England and Russia but the program, with Constantinople as its focus, was aimed at the non-Russian peoples of the Tsarist empire from the gulf of Finland to the Black Sea as well as the Muslims across North Africa and through the Asia Minor to India.

CRUDE RELIGIOUS MANIPULATION

However, mass manipulation or 'scatter gun' programs inevitably trigger responses which might not have been intended, and when people of one faith are goaded into antagonism towards 'oppressors' of another faith, some of the antagonism is bound to be directed against people of that faith within the same community or country – especially if there is evidence that they are being used as a fifth column or being incited to rebellion or to demand independence. So while Germany sought to undermine Russia by offering the mainly Christian population of Georgians independence from the Tsar, and made the Turks do the same, the Armenians naturally expected the same offer of independence, and Britain also targeted the Christian minorities along its chosen routes, including Armenia, as well as trying to prise the Muslim Arabs away from the Turkish Arabs.

On September 24, Lord Kitchener wrote to Ronald Storrs at the British Agency in Egypt, instructing that inquiries be made of Amir Abdullah, son of the Sharif of Mecca, about the attitude of the Arabs to a war between Britain and Turkey.¹⁸⁴ That was in spite of the fact that Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, had written to Enver Pasha on August 14 (not knowing that Turkey had already signed a treaty with Germany) quoting the Foreign Secretary as saying that "if Turkey remains loyal to her neutrality, a solemn agreement to respect the integrity of the Turkish Empire must be a condition of any terms of peace that affect the Near East."¹⁸⁵ Britain was striving to undermine Turkey with one hand at the same time that it sought to keep it 'in camp' with the other, while both Britain and Germany sought to incite selected groups within Turkey's empire to rebellion for their own ends.

In October, the resolve of the German government, its program of religious manipulation and its popular support each received a boost when 93 of the nation's renowned intellectuals signed a declaration endorsing the government's war aims and declaring their solidarity with the military leadership. The 93 included so many university theologians from both sides of the Reformation divide that Karl Barth was later moved to write that he was horrified to discover that the declaration carried the names of almost all of his German teachers. "An entire world of theological exegesis, ethics, dogmatics and preaching which I had until then in principle held to be credible was shaken to the foundations with the manifesto and the other writings of German theologians."¹⁸⁶

Barth's concerns were not shared by most of his contemporaries, but as neither he nor most of those who signed the declaration could have known about the massive program of religious manipulation which was just being put in place, his stand was all the more creditable. Neither would they have known that the German ambassador had provided three hundred thousand pounds in bribes to Turkish naval officers to ensure that their ship sunk a Russian mine layer at Sevastopol, in Russian home waters, on October 27, thus involving their country in the war without the approval of the Grand Vizier, and that reports for the press said the sinking occurred near the Bosphorus.¹⁸⁷

GERMANY: A 'LIVING REVELATION'

The declaration of the 93 actually reflected very well the German Protestant belief that German history was a unique and most significant part of revelation. German self-understanding owed much to Luther and the Reformation and it had been further moulded by the works of Charles Darwin and Leopold von Ranke who is regarded as the founder of the discipline of modern history. According to the prevailing reasoning, the world consisted of cultural and political entities which confronted each other in a struggle for survival and domination which was said to be a key element in God's plan for the universe. A superior culture would triumph until it was challenged by one from a newer, upwardly striving nation of burgeoning moral energy.

That theology of history developed into a theology of imperialism which permeated academic life in greater Germany progressively through the nineteenth century.¹⁸⁸ Its development and acceptance accelerated with the movement for German federation after the round of revolutions in 1848. It became dominant and intimately associated with anti-Semitism during the period of the Kulturkampf as a result of the influence of the philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer (died 1860), the writings and music of Richard Wagner (died 1883), other writers and Chancellor Bismarck. Wagner, who had to flee from Dresden in 1849 because of his role in the abortive revolution there, was greatly influenced by the 'iron will' philosophy of Schopenhauer when he wrote in his anti-Semitic booklet Judaism in Music that human redemption had to be led by a unified Germany. In turn Ludwig II of Bavaria came under Wagner's influence and became his patron in 1864, supporting him during the period that he was completing some of his most anti-Semitic works, including the Master Singers of Nuremberg.

Then, as Europe slid towards 'the Great War' the belief that the mission of Imperial Germany was to exercise world domination as an expression of divine will was taught by a number of influential theologians including Professor Adolf von Harnack.¹⁸⁹ A leading historian of church doctrine, Harnack was still a student when Schopenhauer died but he was already a professor of theology at the time of Wagner's greatest triumph, the first performance of the Ring Cycle at Bayreuth. Harnack later founded the Evangelical Social Congress, was first director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Gessellschaft, and was raised to the nobility in 1914 by the Kaiser.¹⁹⁰ Perhaps that honour was in recognition of his influence in helping to ensure the support of his fellow academics and theologians for the declaration of endorsement. In any case, in prevailing Lutheran thinking Wilhelm's empire was the hammer of God and the sheet anchor of popular Christian faith.¹⁹¹ This meant that Germany and Britain could each continue on their propaganda and recruiting campaigns, and their troops could face each other in their trenches with the same slogan: "For God, King and Country!"

THE DIRTY PROPAGANDA WAR

All of a sudden people began to change. Germans were no longer those Christian colleagues who had come to Edinburgh so recently to share the noble task of "the evangelization of the world in our generation",¹⁹² with graduates from some of the most highly regarded theological colleges in the world. They were nasty vicious HUNS without a decent nerve in their bodies. Neither were Austrians the mainstay of Europe's Roman Catholicism. They were nasty vicious HUNS who were preventing the final re-unification of Italy by hogging the Trentino. And of course the Turks were no longer Britain's dear Muslim brothers. They were back to being bloodthirsty Infidels.

In the forefront of the ghastly new propaganda plan was Father Agostino Gemelli, a Franciscan chaplain and medical psychologist, whose behavioural research had shown that courage of men in combat was largely inspired by illusions which could be produced and exploited scientifically and systematically.¹⁹³ The church had succeeded in adding further dimensions to its larder of racialism.¹⁹⁴ No one seemed concerned that the propaganda process might be more easily set rolling than stopped, reversed or even controlled after the war. No one seemed prepared to just admit that Christians were simply fighting Christians for selfish ends (again) and to recruit on the basis of appeals to national self interest. People might not respond and then those "vital interests" might be lost. Anti-German feelings took on frightening dimensions in all the allied countries and their dominions, with internment and property confiscation widely used against citizens of German heritage.

Actually the German propaganda campaign against the allies carried the same hallmark but that hardly justifies the policy of the Allies. It simply shows that leadership on both sides was equally amoral. The Kaiser had apparently determined on a policy of generating subversion and Muslim Holy Wars against England from the outbreak of the war. He demanded that England should be stripped of its mask of the Christian peacemaker. Germany's consuls in Turkey, Persia and India were to inflame the whole Muslim world to savage uprisings against "this hateful, devious, unscrupulous nation of shopkeepers."¹⁹⁵ Attempts were made to generate a Turkish-based Pan Islamic movement and a Holy War against Britain but neither Arab unity or Anti-British feeling had reached the stage where they could succeed.^{196 197}

In the first week of November, a few days after Turkish naval officers had been bribed into sinking a Russia mine layer, Britain, France and Russia each declared war on Turkey, and Lord Kitchener penned his second letter to the Sharif of Mecca in a calculated bid to offset the German inspired Holy War call. He wrote:

*Till now we have defended and befriended Islam in the person of the Turks. Henceforward it shall be that of the noble Arab. It may be that an Arab of true race will assume the Khalifate of Mecca or Medina, and so good may come by the help of God out of all the evil that is now occurring. It would be well if your Highness could convey to your followers and devotees who are found throughout the world in every country the good tidings of the freedom of the Arabs and the rising of the sun over Arabia.*¹⁹⁸

Germany muddled the waters by offering the Christian Georgians independence in return for rising against the Tsar, and coerced Turkey into supporting the move.¹⁹⁹ Naturally the Armenian Christians pressed their case for the same privilege. They knew that during the Crimean War Russia had demanded a Protectorate over all of the Orthodox Christians in the Ottoman Empire and that this had been resisted by Turkey with Britain's support. Tension therefore increased and when the subsequent Turkish campaign to relieve Russia of some of its positions in the Caucasus failed, the Armenians were accused of being a subversive fifth column and suffered retribution.

ASIAN SPIN-OFF ...

Later that month, China objected to the way Japan had marched into the German territories on Chinese soil and demanded that they be returned to China. Japan's response was to issue a list of 21 demands, to enter into a treaty with Russia under which they each agreed to "protect" China, and to extend its influence throughout northern China. Thus assured of a stable eastern front, Russia then joined its Entente partners, Britain and France, in a declaration of war against Turkey to make it much more difficult for Turkey to reclaim the Armenian portion of the Caucasus. Britain obliged by bombarding Turkey's Red Sea station of Aqaba and, in December, it annexed Cyprus and Egypt which it said it had only been "occupying" in collaboration with Turkey before. The Suez Canal was closed to "unfriendly" shipping.

... AN 'INSPIRED' REVOLUTION

As 1914 gave way to 1915 German strategists, having dabbled with the idea of a Georgian uprising, developed a plan for victory through exploiting a Bolshevik revolution against the Tsar. It involved propaganda, direct support for subversive activities and training for revolutionaries. On March 11, the treasury set aside 2 million gold marks for propaganda, but that was a mere start. From then until January 1918 it allocated a total of 382 million marks for subversive propaganda spread over the Tsarist empire, Persia, Italy, Spain and America.²⁰⁰

... AND A PAPAL EXCLUSION

At the same time the Entente continued in earnest with its territorial deals to gain alliances. Italy, sitting very strategically astride the Mediterranean with some of its forces in Libya, was being wooed by Austria and Germany on one side and Britain and France on the other. But the two Central Powers made political blunders. Austria refused to cede Trentino while Germany's press played up the idea of a renewed papal state after the war and although it may have won their cause a bit of Catholic sympathy at grass roots level it lost them friends in Italy's government.²⁰¹ Britain and France on the other hand promised Trentino, at Austria's expense, a series of other territorial gains, cash loans and other compensations. They also promised not to include the pope in any peace negotiations except with the express agreement of the Italian government.²⁰² It was almost a case of "no contest." A deal was struck in the secret Treaty of London on April 26 and a month later, on May 23, Italy entered the war with the Allies on a restricted basis by declaring war on Austria-Hungary. Its declarations of war against Turkey was made three months later, on August 25.

By then Germany's revolution and subversion enterprise was well established. An 'Institute for the Study of the Social Consequences of War' was set up in Copenhagen as a front for the recruitment and training of revolutionaries. The first of its staff were recruited in Switzerland, but most of its trainees were expatriate Russians. And a trading arm was established as a front for the placement and support of the 'graduate' revolutionaries in Russia.²⁰³ For their part, Britain and France secured Russia's continuing involvement in the war by assuring it of possession of Constantinople and the Straits. Bulgaria found it wise to conclude a treaty with Germany on September 6 with the understanding that it could claim Serbian Macedonia upon entering the war, which it did on October 14. It also laid claim to Macedonia and Dobruja in the event of Greece and Rumania joining the war on the side of the Entente.

The treaty map of Europe looked like a jigsaw puzzle, but it was fraying at the edges and the Middle East had to be drawn in, too. Only ten days after Bulgaria's entry on the side of Germany and Turkey, Britain raised its bid to secure Arab support against Turkey in a letter addressed to the Sharif of Mecca by the British High Commissioner in Cairo, Sir Henry McMahon, and dated October 24, 1915. Building on Lord Kitchener's overtures, this last offer was a virtual guarantee of independence for Arabs in the region from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, which the Arabs interpreted as including Palestine and the Holy Places.²⁰⁴ Being satisfied with that letter, Arab forces, led by the Sharif's son and assisted by British liaison officers, prepared to join battle in rebellion against Turkey. By the end of 1915 Turkey was therefore in deep internal trouble with each of the major European powers exploiting religious division to the full and, with Germany taking advantage of the Pan-Islamic Movement in its Holy War propaganda, the Christians of Armenia were caught in the cross fire. Repression and deportation gave way to terror campaigns and episodes of village slaughter.

Early in the new year, 1916, Russia gained the upper hand in the Caucasus and between January and April it made advances south west well into Armenia, and south east into Persia. Then in June, Arab forces coordinated by Amir Abdullah, rose in rebellion against Turkey. However when the uprising began the Arabs did not know that while they were negotiating with Britain on that basis, Britain had also been negotiating with France and Russia for the partition of Turkey and the Ottoman Empire on quite a different basis. They did not know that Sykes and Picot had visited St Petersburg in March and reached an understanding with the Russians that Turkish Armenia, which they were already occupying anyway, was to be in their "sphere of influence." And they certainly did not know that in an exchange of letters dated May 15 and 16, several weeks before the agreed Arab rebellion began, British and French ministers had formally adopted the Sykes-Picot Agreement which provided for British and French protectorates over most of the region. It even included provision for Italy, the most recent partner in the war against Turkey, to lay claims as well. The Russians, as beneficiaries under the scheme, and the Japanese, as allies, were both advised of the arrangements.²⁰⁵

However the Turks regrouped and by August they had recovered their traditional region of Armenia. The repression, deportation and haphazard village slaughters gave way in turn to organized genocide as the Russians were pushed back. The Turks wanted all Armenians out – or dead. Those who didn't flee or who refused deportation were simply killed. Estimates vary widely, but it is reasonable to accept that between 1915 and 1918 the number deported or who fled reached 1.5 million, and the number killed or who died from hunger or exhaustion was between 600,000 and 800,000. The great powers kept very quiet about it, except to exploit the Armenian massacres in their propaganda. If they talked about how and why it happened the world might start to ask questions. Then they might even suggest that the great powers had to share responsibility with Turkey.

BUYING PARTNERS, TALKING TREATIES

In need of more support, the original Entente partners were eager to have others join them, so Rumania, having been promised three significant territories, (Banat, Transylvania and Bukovina), realigned itself, signed a treaty with the Entente powers, broke its neutrality and declared war against Austria-Hungary on August 27. It had waited for Italy to expand its involvement by declaring war on Germany the day before. Soon Greece was also under pressure from the Entente to break its neutrality too, not with offers of territory but by way of a naval blockade, and the people suffered as the king held firm. The year was closing with Europe in chaos. However on December 12, after it had achieved victory over Rumania, Germany addressed a proposal for a peace settlement to the Allies via the United States. It was rejected. But President Woodrow Wilson took up the matter and asked each of the belligerents to make their conditions for peace public. Germany said it would participate in a peace conference, but the Entente powers made such heavy demands that nothing happened.

On January 22, 1917, Wilson took the initiative and proposed 'Peace without Victory.' Germany responded with its proposals, but the Entente did not. Instead, France entered into a secret agreement with Russia out of fear that it might otherwise break the Entente undertaking and make a separate peace with Germany. The war dragged on. Then in June, unable to retain his neutrality, the Greek king abdicated and a new government entered the war on the side of the Entente, and, with great encouragement to do so, Japan endorsed the Treaty of London. Ever more damaging propaganda was pumped out to ensure that recruits lined up in Britain, the dominions and the colonies to be marched into trenches to face deadly barrages of artillery and gas.

Japan's endorsement of the Treaty of London was necessary for two reasons. Britain's response to Wilson's peace initiative had left the question of Germany's colonies rather vague and caused consternation in both South Africa and Australia which had occupied the German colony of New Guinea. To clarify the situation the Colonial Secretary made a statement on January 31 that the German colonies would never be returned. While that placated Australia it caused equal consternation in China which had sought the return to it of the German territory which Japan had occupied soon after the outbreak of war as the first step in its bid to push the European colonial powers out of Asia. Britain had another balancing act to do. Faced with unrestricted submarine warfare it urgently needed Japan's naval cooperation in the East and an assurance that Japan would not challenge British authority in Asian and Pacific colonies, including former German colonies south of the equator, while it was preoccupied with Germany in Europe. The price for that cooperation was an agreement to support Japan's claims to the Chinese province of Shantung and the German islands north of the equator. To avoid further complications an additional agreement was signed in secret.

THE JEWISH QUESTION

The interlocking crises were so deep that for a short time most people in Europe and the US even lost interest in the Jews again. They could look after themselves. The Zionist Organization was actually in exactly the same bind as the church. There were strong Jewish communities in every country involved in the conflict and they were fighting just as valiantly as any of the Christians with whom they stood shoulder to shoulder – against each other. Interest in the Zionist program floundered. It may have to be put on hold or even scrapped, or so it appeared to many leaders of the Zionist movement. So we must retrace our steps.

Britain's vital interests had been exposed for all to see, if they had their eyes open, when, within a few weeks of declaring war on humanitarian grounds, it occupied the Persian Gulf town of Basra and drove north along the Tigris Valley towards Baghdad and Mosul. In fact few people actually made the connection. Neither did they notice that the occupying troops were from the Indian Army's Sixth Division. They were largely Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs fighting a Christian cause on Muslim territory exactly as the Kaiser had expected.²⁰⁶ They were not there to defend the existing Anglo-Persian oil fields which were already being protected by another unit of the Indian Army. They were there to occupy Turkey's oil provinces before Christian Germany could do so and to establish, by that occupation, a firm claim to a mandate, or possibly even to annexation, whenever the war should end

Those vital interests showed even more clearly in other steps Britain took to gain control of the Turkish provinces. The western front had quickly assumed over-riding importance from the point of view of short term survival and a holding action against Turkey ought to have been adequate. To begin with, from early 1915 Britain took desperate measures to capture Constantinople in order to open the Bosphorus – or to close it to German cross traffic. The world was told that it was vital to get supplies flowing to Russia and to relieve the Turkish pressure against Russia in the Caucasus. The abortive Gallipoli campaign was promoted and fought on that basis and Britain was even prepared to guarantee her arch rival, Russia, future control of Constantinople and the Bosphorus in return for helping to take it – supposedly for her own benefit.^{207 208}

THE SYKES-PICOT AGREEMENT

Then came the Sykes-Picot Agreement between Britain and France in which the two governments agreed to a post-war division of the Arab regions of the Middle East. It provided for everything from water supply and railways to customs and defence arrangements. But the key clauses concerned agreement that no third power should have any territorial rights in the region except for an Arab state which would be established on condition that the Arabs revolted against Turkey and "obtained" the towns of Homs, Hama, Damascus and Aleppo.

As already noted, Britain had been secretly negotiating with the Sharif of Mecca, Husain Ibn Ali, for collaboration against Turkey from the beginning of the war, and it has been suggested that the Sharif had even made the first approaches to Britain, before the war. He is said to have aimed at re-establishing the Caliphate at Mecca as a consequence of the centralist policies being followed by a newly appointed Turkish governor.²⁰⁹ That may well be the case and it is not worth disputing. But neither can it be offered as a justification for Britain's subsequent actions. It simply demonstrates that neither Churchill nor Lord Kitchener, nor the British cabinet as a body, understood the puritanical reformation which was spreading outwards from Mecca or the significance of the Pan Islamic revival which was taking place any better than the church.

Britain had always been very conscious of the strategic importance of Palestine and in 1914, with the struggle for Turkey's oil provinces at fever pitch, the government was more eager than ever to consolidate its position. Sharif Husain's family and the Arab community were divided over Britain's proposal for an uprising against Turkey but the promise of a kingdom over the region bounded by borders with Turkey and Persia, the coasts of the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, plus an adequate level of bribery, swung their decision. Then, sensing that all was not well, fearing a move against its territory by Russia and acknowledging a period of good relations with Germany, Turkey signed its treaty with Germany and announced its 'armed neutrality.' That immediately implied a threat to both Britain's oil interests in Iraq and its control of the Suez Canal.

Because of its "special interests" in Iraq – the word "oil" was discreetly played down throughout the delicate negotiations between Britain and the Arabs. Britain proposed "special administrative arrangements", implying an Anglo-Arab partnership in the provinces of both Basra and Baghdad which included Mosul. Husain would agree to this only if Britain paid a subsidy to the Arab state and provided that its postwar occupation was strictly temporary.²¹⁰ Apart from that qualification Britain recognized and supported "the independence of the Arabs in all the regions within the limits demanded by the Sharif of Mecca." It undertook, "when the situation admits" to give the Arabs "her advice and (to) assist them to establish what may appear to be the most suitable forms of government in those various territories."²¹¹

BRITAIN'S HIDDEN HAND: THE MCMAHON LETTER

But the manipulated German-Turkish bombardment of Russian coastal towns in October, 1915, accelerated the process. Britain was allowed to play two-handed games, but minor players were not expected to see through the plot and do likewise. The agreement between Britain and the Arab community was set out in the form of a letter, noted above, addressed to Sharif Husain by the new High Commissioner in Cairo, Sir Henry McMahon, on October 24, 1915. The McMahon letter predates the Sykes-Picot agreement, of which the Arabs were not advised, by seven months. This means that when the Arab revolt began, under the leadership of a son of Husain named Faisal, Britain had authorized two conflicting agreements for the future of the region and it clearly intended to act on the second one. The revolt was delayed by Britain's preoccupation with Gallipoli and when it was finally launched it was steeped in Turkish /Arab hatred because the Turkish authorities had discovered incriminating documents and began a purge with a round of executions. In fact at that stage the war was going rather badly for the Entente and it began to look as if Britain might have no need for any administrative system in Iraq after the war at all.

But in the meantime, less than two weeks after the presentation of the McMahon letter, between November 2 and 5, Britain, France and Russia each declared war on Turkey. They were doing it to gain independence for the oppressed Arabs, of course. In announcing Britain's decision Prime Minister Asquith implied as much. He reproached the Turks for their 'treachery' and said that having lost their European empire "they would now forfeit their Asiatic possessions."²¹²

While most people in Britain probably took that as just an appropriate “We’ll teach them a lesson” response indicating that their empire was still great and expanding, there were some people who saw it in a different light. Among them were the oil companies in the United States which could see themselves being edged out of the action in the Ottoman Empire. Agitation for US intervention increased, but although there was a general atmosphere of support for the Allies and their cause in the US, because of the nation’s diverse ethnic mix, it was by no means politically overwhelming and President Wilson required a lot more justification before he could take his country into war.

WEIZMANN SEIZES A CHANCE

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, an industrial chemist and a vice president of the Zionist Federation of Britain, also saw it differently. Weizmann realized that Palestine, the Jewish Land of Promise, was strategically important, lying between the Suez Canal and Iraq, and he wanted the Jewish community to be well represented at the peace conference which was bound to follow the war. He told a colleague on the Zionist Executive: “I have no doubt that Palestine will fall within the influence of England. Palestine is the natural continuation of Egypt and the barrier separating the Suez Canal from Constantinople, the Black Sea, and any eventuality that may come from that direction.”²¹³ He formulated his plan: to bring Britain and Zionism together, so that the Jews might develop Palestine as a bulwark protecting the Suez Canal from the north.²¹⁴

Britain was about to gain a new ally – the Zionist Federation – but there was yet a lot of talking to do. As the debates of the previous fifteen years had shown, not all Jews and not all Zionists were in favor of claiming Palestine for a Jewish National Home. And among those who were in favor, many did not wish to align themselves or the movement as a whole with the political or imperial interests of one party to a global conflict. The personal crisis of conflicting support for their own country of birth and for a Jewish National Home was uppermost in their minds, coupled with the real crisis of armed conflict with their coreligionists across national boundaries. Weizmann consulted a number of influential Jewish community and business leaders and sought the help of C.P. Scott of the Manchester Guardian to arrange an appointment with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lloyd George, to present his plan.

To his surprise, Weizmann found that a cabinet colleague, Sir Herbert Samuel, chairman of the Board of Local Government, had already briefed Lloyd George and the Foreign Secretary, Edward Grey, on the basics of Zionism and on his own proposal for the division of ‘Greater Syria.’ Samuel’s proposal was that France, Britain’s “ally across the channel”, could have the north in what he considered to be a “fair trade” and Palestine would develop as a Jewish State under British aegis. In this way, he said, everyone would benefit and in England “the foul word ‘annexation’ need never be uttered.”²¹⁵ Discussions continued, but not at a great pace because there were too many complications, and so did the war.

A VERY DIRTY WAR

Russia had got the better of the campaign in the Caucasus, but Kut and the Sixth Indian Division were in Turkish hands. And after early successes in Poland and Prussia, the Russians had been turned back and their morale was shattered. Germany had got the better of the Western front although the French were challenging her superiority at Verdun. Italy had entered its self-interest war with Austria for Trentino but was not yet at war with Turkey or Germany. On the other hand Ireland was wracked by rebellion as southern Roman Catholic groups, reacting against Britain's deferral of Home Government for Ireland, began to collaborate with Germany. Within weeks of the shock of that domestic rebellion the British Government found it necessary to introduce conscription for military service for all men from 18 to 41 years of age. The vicious recruiting campaign had been insufficient. And to add to its worries, access to and from Rumania had been cut off completely by the fall of Serbia which enabled Germany to link up directly with Constantinople via Bulgaria.

Rumania, which had been officially neutral until then, joined the Allied cause in August 1916 but by November it had also fallen to Germany. Not only was access to its oil fields via the Balkans cut off, but they were in German hands, Standard Oil's fields included. The United States, and that meant Standard Oil, had a tighter stranglehold than ever over Allied oil supplies which were becoming an increasingly critical factor in its war effort. And the United States was still neutral. It was just like the good old days of the American Civil War. The oilmen were out to wring every cent out of the war they could. From February 1915 Germany had applied a naval blockade against British ships and British ports and Britain, in turn, had succeeded in clearing German merchant shipping from the Atlantic, but neither navy attacked merchant shipping under neutral flags and Germany's Baltic ports had remained open.

However in July 1916, after the loss of the Balkans, and with German raiders paying more attention to her Persian Gulf tanker fleet, Britain denounced the open seas policy of the 1908 Declaration of London and proceeded to blockade all merchant supplies, including oil to German ports. The price of oil shot up. During the three year period beginning from the fall of the Balkans the oil export earnings of the United States rose by 158 percent. During the same period its oil exports increased in volume by only about 33 percent. Most of that increased volume was required for the allied war effort during 1916 to 1918 and it accounted for the greater part of the increase of 27 percent in total US production. Britain became more determined than ever to get exclusive control of Turkey's oil provinces.

Everything was pointing to a long drawn out war, the role of oil as a motivating factor in the war gradually came under public scrutiny, but only gradually, and the Allies appealed repeatedly for the United States to join them. But facing a population divided over the issue, President Wilson still stayed out. Whatever decision he took would antagonize one or more of America's major ethnic groups. The Irish Catholic groups, spurred on by the church, were vocal in their attacks on Britain over the brutal suppression of the home rule rebellion. The German groups, equally large but fragmented because there were refugees from both Catholic and

Protestant oppression, tended to say little but they were suffering from the vicious anti-German propaganda with which the allied recruiting effort was being fuelled. Those of French and English descent, although divided over the roles their kinsmen had played in the independence and civil wars, were united against Germany. Then there were the Russians, Poles and Rumanians of Jewish faith. They wanted an end to the war because it was ravaging their homelands and their coreligionists, but the anti-Semitic policies of Russia and Germany were so similar there was probably little to choose between them. However the sympathy of all but one of America's Yiddish newspapers was with Germany, reflecting its anti-tsarist position and the development of socialism there.²¹⁶

AMERICA'S DIVERSE INTERESTS

Such an ethnic mix should have provided a strong incentive for the United States to bring the belligerents together in peace negotiations and in fact President Wilson had advised Britain via his confidential agent, Colonel House, in February 1916, that he was prepared to convene a peace conference. Furthermore, if Germany refused to accept reasonable terms the US would probably enter the war on the side of the Allies. It is very probable, on the basis of public opinion at the time, that if he had made peace initiatives backed by force an issue in the 1916 US Presidential elections he would have won a strong mandate. But if public opinion were to be tampered with through the mass media there was no certainty at all.²¹⁷ That appears to have been the basis of his decision to fight the election on domestic issues. It would have been expecting too much of a "sacrifice" by those who were gaining most and who stood to gain even more from that sacrosanct free enterprise system as the war raged on for them to keep their fingers out of the campaign.²¹⁸

Industrialists supplying the Allied war effort, the merchant banking houses and the oil men were all doing very nicely. The United States must not intervene in other people's wars. But even more important was the territorial question, even though it was consistently played down in diplomatic discussions.²¹⁹ President Wilson's suggested terms for a settlement involved the restoration of Belgium and Serbia; the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France; Constantinople for Russia; independence for Poland; the Trentino for Italy and compensation for Germany outside of Europe.²²⁰ That was the punch line and the implications were enormous.

Firstly it perpetuated, both in the Old World of Europe and the New World of Monroe Doctrine America, the colonial and racist attitudes that non-European people and their territory and resources belonged to white European Christians to have, to hold, to fight over or to give away as they wished. Secondly there was no direct mention of Turkey. But the Allies and the USA were all agreed it could be cut up.²²¹ Britain said a lot about the restoration of Belgium and this was to be taken to mean that she valued sovereignty for Belgium but, in reality, it meant she didn't want German control of ports immediately across the Channel. However even that was probably a negotiating posture and Britain would have been prepared to "sacrifice" Belgium to keep Germany out of Turkey.

A proposal was floated that the United States should accept a mandate over Turkey and supervise the Bosphorus on the assumption that Britain and France got Iraq and Syria, but that was not the area which US commercial interests wanted and the president was not keen to become a policeman in Europe. In fact none of the powers were being completely open and honest with their allies. When Colonel House suggested Russia be given Constantinople the four British cabinet ministers present debated it just as if it were simply another strategic question. House was not told that Britain and France had already promised it to Russia almost a year earlier on condition that Russia stayed in the war. Neither was he told of the Sykes-Picot agreement. But France had not told Britain of its frontier deal with Russia and Britain had not told France of its deal with the Sharif of Mecca. Each was as bad as the next. Honesty and openness was no more a trait of government then than it had been before, or since. Britain had reservations about the frankness of the US approach and President Wilson's offer of mediation. So did Germany.²²² It must have been obvious to each of the parties that Standard Oil's chances of getting its hands on Iraq's oil region were better either if the United States was chairing a peace conference or if Germany and Turkey finished the war in a stronger position than Britain and France.

By then the situation had become grave. Russia's war effort had disintegrated. Munitions and food had been in short supply. Poor leadership had dragged morale down further and further so that front line troops were close to mutiny, and in September 1916 the tsar had closed the Duma and had taken personal control of the war. He had left Rasputin with almost undisputed power in the capital and in between blessing icons and raping petitioners who came to see the tsarina he had sent the tsar military operational orders based on his drunken dreams and intrigues.²²³

Rasputin's icy end came on November 29, 1916, and for a few weeks there was a calm before the storm. But that was the end of that phase of President Wilson's peace initiative. When Lloyd George took office as British Prime Minister in December 1916 his aim was to annex Palestine but within two months he realized that was not achievable. In fact all parties to the war were suffering so badly that they all wanted to cut their losses and achieve the most favourable settlement they could. Lloyd George opted for a British trusteeship and the complex web of negotiations and intrigue proceeded on that basis. On January 3, 1917, Wilson reactivated his peace initiative, offering a channel for secret negotiations, but there were mixed reactions and the German ambassador in Washington finally received instructions that Wilson's mediation at a peace conference was "thoroughly undesirable."²²⁴

PEACE ... OR THE OTHER OPTIONS?

However, being in need of a more effective strategy or more allies, Germany decided on three important steps. On January 9 it decided on unrestricted submarine warfare to cut Britain's naval supply system (especially for oil and munitions from the US), coupled with efforts to keep the US neutral, with a fall-back position of inducing Mexico to enter the war. On January 16, British intelligence intercepted a telegram from the German government to its minister in Mexico advising him of the strategy. If the US failed to remain neutral, at the moment it joined the war Mexico was to be offered an alliance on the basis of joint conduct of the war, joint conclusion of peace, ample financial support and “an agreement on our part that Mexico shall gain back by conquest the territory lost by her at a prior period in Texas, New Mexico and Arizona,” plus an invitation to mediate a settlement between Germany and Japan.²²⁵

Britain relayed the telegram to Washington and Wilson received it on January 24. It was Wilson’s turn to be infuriated. Only two days before he had delivered an “epoch-making address” to Congress in which he put the emphasis on the benefits of peace rather than the divisions between the countries of Europe or criticism of their governments, and offered broad guidelines for a peace settlement. It earned him praise from most observers including the pope and the Russian foreign minister.²²⁶ Wilson was inclined to publish the telegram immediately, but was advised to delay doing so. Germany’s ambassador in Washington tried to persuade his government to reverse the submarine warfare decision, but it was too late. Not realizing that it had already been exposed, the German government confirmed the submarine warfare strategy and the US was advised on February 1.

Coming straight after his peace address and advice of Germany’s proposed Mexican adventure it was a major rebuff. It proved to be the trigger that Wilson required to overcome ethnic divisions and to pull public opinion into line to support a decision to enter the war. Wilson broke off diplomatic relations with Germany on February 3, but decided to wait and see whether Germany would carry out its decision.

From the point of view of shortening the war Wilson’s announcement was a promising move but the British Government still wanted the US in the war and, not wanting to be dependent on the outcome of the war on the Continent, it was eager to break the deadlock with a push against Turkey from the desert. Jewish cooperation in such a plan was important, with or without a Jewish desert army which some Zionist leaders hoped to raise.

Sir Mark Sykes, the government’s principal adviser on the Middle East and joint author of the Sykes-Picot Agreement, agreed to meet and brief a group of top ranking Zionist leaders at the home of Chief Rabbi Moses Gaster on February 7. Those present were Sir Herbert Samuel, Nahum Sokolow, Joseph Cowen, Norman Bentwich, Harry Sacher, Lord Rothschild, Baron James de Rothschild and Chaim Weizmann. In return for a Jewish nation to be established in Palestine under exclusive British suzerainty the government was assured of maximum Zionist cooperation.²²⁷ Weizmann was confident that a British pronouncement to that effect could achieve a double purpose for his adopted country. It could bring American-Jewish influence to bear on Washington for a declaration of war against Turkey, and it could keep a crumbling Russia, where the Jews were a factor both in the Kerensky party and the newly formed Soviets of the Bolsheviks, within the Entente.²²⁸ But Sykes told the group that British protection would apply only to a Zionist chartered company operating within limits which would exclude Galilee, the Hauran region, and the Jerusalem enclave connected to Jaffa by a corridor. That devastating news set the Zionist leadership working to achieve a better outcome, but it also displeased the French who aimed for a French Protectorate within which they were prepared to allow Belgian supervision of the Holy Places.

BRIBERY AND COERCION WIDEN THE WAR ...

Lloyd George continued to manoeuvre very carefully to entice the US into the war. He told the US ambassador on February 10 that Britain wanted Wilson to come into the war “not so much for help in the war as for help in the peace.” He said he would be grateful for American military and economic pressure on Germany, but he had “a loftier reason (and) American participation is necessary for the complete expression of the moral judgement of the world on the most important subject ever presented to the civilized nations.” He then very carefully exploited flattery, America’s self-understanding and Wilson’s reputation at home as the epitome of Christian leadership, saying: “The President’s presence at the peace conference is necessary for the proper organization of the world which must follow peace. I mean that he himself must be there in person. If he sits in the conference that makes peace he will exert the greatest influence that any man has ever exerted in expressing the moral value of free government.” ²²⁹

During February, while Germany was trying to torpedo Britain to a halt, Petrograd ground to a halt from shortages, a general strike, the mutiny of the Guards Regiments and the recognized start of the Russian Revolution on February 23, and a Provisional Committee set up by the Duma arrested the tsar’s ministers in a desperate bid to forestall a revolution. Then international relations became even more tense a week later when Wilson released the German telegram with its Mexico alliance plan for publication on March 1, and the tsar’s abdication on March 2, enabled the Provisional Committee of the Duma to form a government. One of its first acts was to declare an amnesty for all political prisoners as it struggled to bring stability both at home and on the front line. The amnesty was, however, the signal for Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov Lenin and other Bolsheviks in exile to return to Russia.

The Allies then got their best chance to make a favourable peace settlement when Austria’s Emperor Karl made overtures to France, by secret letter, for an armistice with the allies at the end of March. A secret meeting was arranged between the British and French Prime Ministers and an Italian diplomat for April 17, two days before both governments were to determine their demands, and peace should have been in sight, but the chance was dropped. Events overtook them because the British and French kept the Emperor’s letter so secret they didn’t even tell the Italian diplomat, let alone the Russians, who they were trying desperately to keep in the war, or the Americans who they were desperately trying to drag into the war.²³⁰

On April 2, just eight weeks after Sykes met with the Zionist group, in spite of the fact that American Zionists were not wholeheartedly in favor of the scheme of British-Zionist cooperation,²³¹ President Wilson sent a message to Congress saying that ‘present German warfare against commerce is warfare against mankind’ and that America could no longer confine itself to a policy of armed neutrality. He asked for an immediate declaration that the recent course of the Imperial German Government was “nothing less than war against the government and the people of the United States” and that Congress “formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon us.” The Senate adopted the resolution on April 4 and the House of Representatives on April 6. The US was at war with Germany, but not with Austria-Hungary, and it was not a member of the Alliance, it was simply fighting in association with the Allies.²³²

Humanitarian considerations highlighted by his country’s ethnic mix hadn’t been strong enough to prompt Wilson’s intervention. National indignation over the sinking of the Lusitania, with the loss of over one thousand civilian lives in May, 1915, hadn’t been strong enough either. But the stimulus of the loss of trade and the sinking of merchant shipping, coupled with the fall of the Russian monarchy coming on top of the possibility that negotiations over Turkey’s oil could go against it was quite strong enough.²³³ The first US destroyer flotilla reached British waters within weeks. The US was happy to contribute fire power to secure its own interests, but no US troops were despatched. That was a different matter.

While Congress was debating its declaration of war Lenin, who had been vigorously attacking Socialists who supported “the Imperialist War” from exile in Switzerland, arrived in Russia on April 3 and announced proposals for immediate peace and the transfer of power to the soviets. He was promptly forced to go into hiding. Then both the British and French governments finally determined their preferred positions on Palestine, independently but on the same day, April 19, and facing intense diplomatic competition, Britain “began to press its demand for British rule over Palestine, frequently exploiting Zionist ambitions to advance its own aims.” When Lloyd George appointed General Allenby to command the forces in Egypt he told him he could have anything he wanted, and new aeroplane squadrons were despatched to Palestine, but in return Lloyd George said he wanted Jerusalem “as a Christmas present for the British people.”²³⁴

... AND THE VATICAN CAN PLAY, TOO

On May 1, Pope Benedict XV, being determined that the Vatican would play a major role in deciding the future of Palestine, announced the formation of The Congregation for the Eastern Churches, with himself as head. Three days later, May 4, when he received Nahum Sokolow in audience he adopted an approach considerably different to that which his predecessor, Pius X, had taken towards Zionism when he met Theodor Herzl in January 1904. Pius had told Herzl that while the Jewish religion was the foundation of Christianity it had been superseded by the teachings of Christ “and we cannot concede it any further validity.” He also said that although the church had to put up with the Turks being in charge of its holy places it could not support the Jews acquiring them.

In sharp contrast, after commenting on the change in circumstances since Rome destroyed Palestine nineteen hundred years earlier, Benedict told Sokolow that it was Providential and in accordance with Divine Will that the Jews should return to the country from which they had been expelled. Concerning Zionism, Benedict said that the Zionist idea had “great significance”, that the rebuilding of Judea by the Jewish people would be an “historical turnabout” which is also “... providential. God has willed it.” He even believed that satisfactory agreement could be reached on the question of the Holy Places and that the church and the Jews would be good neighbours.²³⁵ He appeared to support Britain’s claim to Palestine and the concept of a Jewish National Home under British protection, describing Britain as “the greatest and most experienced colonizing power in the world” which would provide a “good school for settlement.” But he did say that the problem of the holy places is “of utmost importance (and) the sacred rights must be preserved.” He concluded the 45-minute audience saying repeatedly: “Yes, yes, I think we shall be good neighbours.”

Sokolow took the pope’s welcoming and sympathetic attitude to indicate a substantial change of heart and a new stage in Vatican-Jewish relations but he and the Zionist Movement were soon to be bitterly disappointed. It appears that the pope was aware of the British Government’s position as expressed in Syke’s February briefings and his reference to being ‘good neighbours’ carried an assumption that the Vatican or one of its allies would control central Palestine, including Jerusalem, while the Jews were restricted to the adjoining or ‘neighbouring’ territories. It also appears that he was laying the groundwork to gain Zionist support for the Vatican in several matters: its bid to participate in the Peace Conference; its effort to undermine the Orthodox Church in Eastern Europe and to secure Poland’s ‘independence’; and its demonstration of goodwill towards Britain.

Also on May 4, Leon Trotsky, a Jew, arrived home in Russia from the United States, just a month after it had joined the war. A republican coalition government, formed immediately, included both Bolsheviks and the aristocracy. It attempted, with initial success, to take the offensive against Germany, and the Allies breathed a sigh of relief which was soon stifled when Germany broke through again and Petrograd came under direct threat. Within a matter of weeks it was obvious that Russia would sue for a separate peace and Germany’s full might would be thrown against the Western front unless Russia could somehow be kept in the war until a general armistice could be negotiated. Desperate politicking continued.

Weizmann’s aim was to take advantage of Britain’s position of weakness as he worked tirelessly through some two thousand interviews with politicians, religious leaders and public opinion makers, pressing his view that Zionist aims corresponded to British political and strategic interests.²³⁶ But not everyone either agreed with him or wanted to rush into a commitment. On August 17 General Clayton telegraphed Sykes from Cairo to advise that any announcement should be delayed. He said: “I am not sure that it is not as well to refrain from any public announcement just at present. It will not help matters if the Arabs ... are given yet another bone of contention in the shape of Zionism in Palestine as against the interests of the Moslems resident there.”²³⁷ And before the British War Cabinet met on October 4 to consider the Zionist question and had before it a formula similar to that which was eventually adopted, the Secretary for India, Edwin Montagu, also voiced concerns while Lord Curzon continued to oppose the concept. Although he was a committed British Imperialist Montagu said he found it impossible to agree with the Zionists and “their plans threatened to undermine the position of the British Jews.”²³⁸ Three days later Weizmann argued that cabinet had “attached too much importance to the opinion of British Jewry.”²³⁹ And his influence was quite apparent when the pope took another step to demonstrate the Vatican’s interest in the Near East and its churches in announcing the formation of the Eastern Papal Institute on October 15.

As time dragged on the need for cabinet to make a decision became more urgent because the Russian people had scented freedom with the monarchy gone and they had no will to continue a war which they had never wanted and from which they could expect no tangible benefits. If the coalition government wouldn’t make peace they didn’t want a coalition government. On October 20 (October 7 by the calendar then in use in Russia) the Bolsheviks withdrew from the Council of the Republic and prepared for revolution under the leadership of Lenin and Trotsky. Britain and France faced a desperate situation.

The Italian army was being rolled backwards around the Adriatic like a carpet and if the rout continued Italy could be out of the war very quickly.^{240 241} It was deeply divided across both religious and economic or social lines and, after the Treaty of London which put it at such a severe disadvantage, the papacy was barely disguising its friendship with Germany and its antagonism towards the allies.²⁴² If Italy were knocked out of the war and the papacy got its state back as a gift from Germany, the allies could expect Roman Catholics around the world to be treated to some very definite advice on where to put their war effort. Such a situation would be catastrophic. Certainly the United States had entered the war and had sent destroyers, mine layers, mine sweepers, submarines and submarine chasers to help with the protection of supply convoys but, at that stage, it had not sent either capital ships or troops.

Britain and France knew that if the coalition government fell Russia would be out of the war immediately. They would not only face the whole German army in the West, they would also have to contend with Europe’s first Socialist government led by very determined Marxists. Perhaps there was just one last chance to divide the revolutionary camp and thereby keep the Provisional Government in power long enough to conclude a peace treaty. They could issue a statement of intent to facilitate a national home for Jews in Palestine. Perhaps in doing that they might even kill two birds with one stone. They might also encourage greater support from the United States even though, in September, the president still considered the times to be “inauspicious for a public announcement from the White House”, and Justice Brandeis, who had a hand in the editing of a draft statement, was uncertain.²⁴³ Weizmann had told them so and he was held in very high regard. The Allies’ one strong card was Palestine. It was the only front with much to boast about. The Arab rebellion was underway and had provided vital support and distraction which had enabled the British to break out of the Sinai at last. Beersheba was captured on October 31. Gaza would be next, then Jaffa and then Jerusalem lay ahead.

On the day that Beersheba was captured the British cabinet met again to review the situation and to consider a revised draft statement. They knew that after some hesitation Wilson had agreed to it on the basis that it had merit as a propaganda move directed at the Russian and American Jews,²⁴⁴ and they had before them a persuasive memorandum from the head of the Foreign Office Eastern Department, Sir Ronald Graham, dated October 24. Graham argued that almost every Jew in Russia was a Zionist and pro-German, and if they could be convinced that the fulfilment of their ambitions depended on Allied support, an important section of the Russian people would swing behind the Allies.²⁴⁵ Subversive inter-faith manipulation at its worst. But no worse than other belligerents had been involved in for so long, so what did it matter? Cabinet made its decision. The Balfour Declaration was approved.

BRITAIN'S TRUMP CARD: THE BALFOUR DECLARATION

On November 2 1917, a letter from Mr. Balfour, the Foreign Secretary, was delivered to Lord Rothschild. It declared the government's sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations and advised that as the government viewed with favour the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people it would use its best endeavours to facilitate it. Naturally it had to be understood that "nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country." Lord Rothschild was asked to bring the government's intention to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.²⁴⁶

So maybe the theologians were right after all. Maybe the Jews could serve some useful purpose other than as an example of the rejection and degradation which awaited those outside the church. Maybe they did have a role to play in Salvation after all at least in saving the diverse Christian mob of Britain, France, Italy and Russia from the equally diverse Christian mob of Germany and Austria. No one was in a better position to know than the man who had signed the letter, Arthur James Balfour.

Balfour was held up as a classic example of a fine Christian Conservative M.P. He was elevated to an earldom in 1922. He had an extensive background in interfaith relations. He had been accused of ruthlessly suppressing Catholic nationalism during his term as Secretary for Ireland; he was First Lord of the Treasury and Leader of the Commons during both the Boer War and the Boxer Rebellion; and he was Prime Minister while Britain and France reached their accord on the division of Muslim North Africa. On top of that he had written three books on religion and philosophy²⁴⁷ and he was still leader of the Conservative Party in Opposition when, just seven years earlier, he chaired the commission which dealt with relations between Christian Missions and foreign governments at the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference.²⁴⁸ ²⁴⁹ It is reported that the British War Cabinet was deeply divided over the issue of support for the Zionist cause and that Mr. Balfour was personally against the proposal which was to carry his name. So also was Edwin Montagu, (Secretary of State for India and the only Jewish member of the cabinet), and even the Prime Minister, Lloyd George, who had been a legal adviser to the Zionist Organization before the war. Mr. Winston Churchill is also said to have had some misgivings.²⁵⁰

But the allies knew that they had to gain the generous support of influential Jews in their own and neutral territories and also shake the loyalty of those in the opposing camp. Extensive discussions took place on both sides of the Atlantic with politicians, with the Vatican and with both Zionist and non Zionist Jewish leaders, and Mr. Balfour made a special visit to the United States for the purpose. The wording of the statement to be issued was checked and rechecked. The Zionist Organization of America was consulted and Rabbi Stephen Wise, Supreme Court Judge Louis Brandeis and lawyer (later Judge) Felix Frankfurter were credited with influencing both the formulation of the text and the acceptance of the declaration by US leaders.²⁵¹ President Wilson is said to have shown ‘hesitating benevolence’ towards the plan in the early stages, September 1917, after being urged by his most important aide, Colonel Edward House, to show restraint.²⁵² But, according to some sources, by October, with competing interests swirling around him, he was giving it his “unequivocal support” when the allies knew that time was running out,²⁵³ while another contends that he “acquiesced with the proviso that American backing not be made public” when a specific proposed document was referred to him and he bypassed the State Department in reaching his decision.²⁵⁴ The British knew that Germany had wanted to exploit the anti-tsarist feelings of neutral Jews with a similar statement but that the sultan had so far held to his decision that a formal Jewish occupation of Palestine was not acceptable. The Zionist Organization had kept up steady diplomatic pressure on both Britain²⁵⁵ and the US president, while Protestant missionary and educational leaders had sought to protect their involvement in the Middle East by promoting Arab Nationalism.²⁵⁶

NOT A MATTER OF IGNORANCE

In view of all these circumstances it can hardly be claimed that the British Government issued the Balfour Declaration either in ignorance of the long term implications, or solely out of its much publicized gratitude for the enlistment of nonresident Jews in its armed forces and the development of synthetic cordite by Dr. Chaim Weizmann.²⁵⁷ The government highlighted the financial appeal aspect of its declaration by addressing it to Lord Rothschild rather than to Dr. Weizmann who had become the chief spokesman and negotiator for the Zionist Organization in Britain. Chaim Weizmann was born in a Russian ghetto in 1874. He was attracted to the Zionist Organization by Herzl’s writing; became active in it while still a student; gained a Ph.D. degree in Switzerland in 1897 with a thesis on chemical dyestuffs; moved to England in 1904; married, and first met Mr. Balfour for Zionist discussions two years later, and took a research and teaching post at Manchester. When the First World War broke, knowing Britain’s interests in the Middle East, he set himself the personal goals of gaining a place at the inevitable peace conference table for “a Jewish voice” and a firm commitment to a National Home for the Jewish people in Palestine after the war. He joined the Admiralty in 1915 and this gained him ready access to several cabinet ministers. His development of a process to obtain acetone by maize fermentation, from which explosives could be produced locally, helped to avoid an import crisis when Germany imposed its naval blockade. He gained a seat on policy making bodies of the Zionist Organization and soon dominated the movement in England. Dr. Weizmann actually waited outside the Cabinet room for the final draft to be approved on October 31.²⁵⁸

A few years before the war (1909), the prime minister, Lloyd George (then Chancellor of the Exchequer) had clashed bitterly over the financing of social reforms with Lord Rothschild who had led an attack in the House of Lords with the result that the budget was rejected. Lloyd George then launched a public attack on Lord Rothschild's domination of government policy with such venom that many observers believed it had influenced his attitude towards financing Britain's war effort.²⁵⁹ They believed he had to be placated. Rightly or wrongly the British government and its advisers had reacted to the power of Rothschild wealth in much the same way as Bismarck and the German government two generations earlier.

However the declaration could well have been addressed to Lord Rothschild in an attempt to conceal the leaking of it to Jews in Russia and intervention in the Bolshevik camp. According to Joseph Stalin the Central Committee first set October 15 (October 28 by the British calendar) for the uprising but then delayed it until October 25 (November 7). Leon Trotsky later went to great pains to show that the delay was for purely organizational reasons. However during those critical days there was a hardening of attitude against revolution among Jews who had been admitted to the army's key Junker schools by the Provisional Government after the February Revolution. As it would have been quite consistent with the known actions of the British government at the time, the probability of intervention must be recognized.²⁶⁰

The British government was well aware that the highest level of support for Zionism was in Russia and eastern Europe as a result of the more intense anti-Semitism there at the time. It certainly would have known that between one quarter and one third of the people at organizer level in the revolutionary movements were Jews.²⁶¹ Similarly it knew that even if those revolutionary organizers supported the Zionist movement, many Zionist leaders, including Dr. Weizmann did not reciprocate by supporting their revolutionary aims or Communist objectives.^{262 263} However, if either the British Government or Zionist leaders in Britain thought that the Russian Revolutionaries could be persuaded or manoeuvred to go on fighting to maintain essentially the system which had driven them to desperation, simply by the promise of a possible means of escape for a few of them through the establishment of a Jewish national homeland, then it badly misjudged them.^{264 265} It ought to have understood that people prefer to stay where their family ties are; that they do not willingly become refugees in another land; and that one of the main planks of the Bolshevik platform was equality for all, even Jews, with the dismantling of all social and religious barriers. It must certainly have known that proposals were circulating among the Bolsheviks for the establishment of regions of Jewish semi-autonomy within Russia and that, with revolution so close at hand, those proposals would be a lot more attractive than a new home in a foreign land.²⁶⁶

Jewish Bolsheviks were, in the main, the same as any other Bolsheviks. They wanted peace and they wanted it under a revolutionary government. They got their revolution just two days before most of them learned of the Balfour Declaration. The general uprising had finally been set in motion at 2.00 a.m. on October 25 (November 7). Twenty four hours later the Provisional Government was behind bars and by 5.00 a.m. on October 27 (November 9) a new government had been installed and had been instructed by the All Russian Soviet Congress to negotiate for peace immediately.²⁶⁷ The chief negotiators were to be Premier Lenin and the Jewish-born Foreign Minister Trotsky. It was then that the Balfour Declaration was made public, eleven days after it had been approved and seven days after it had been delivered to Lord Rothschild in letter form. If the British government had already steered it into selected Bolshevik quarters then it was having a second bite of the Russian toffee in an effort to stall the peace negotiations. In any case the negotiations went ahead as planned when the declaration had failed to keep Russia in the war, and the Allies were rather upset when, on December 3, the Soviet Commissariat of the Nationalities described the Great Powers as “rapacious European plunderers,” singled out British rule in India as the ideal target for revolution, and appealed to the peoples of Asia to overthrow “these robbers and enslavers.”²⁶⁸

However the declaration did have important effects in other countries and it is generally thought that the British government was looking for benefits from those countries to offset the loss of Russia’s war effort, rather than seriously expecting to prevent the Bolshevik revolution and Russia’s separate peace settlement.

THE VATICAN: ANOTHER CHANGE OF HEART

Then, quite dramatically, after the occupation of Jerusalem on December 9, the Vatican reverted to the stand taken by Pius X. On December 12 the Vatican Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, discussed Britain’s likely intentions for Palestine with Belgium’s envoy and began working towards a plan for an international condominium for the holy places with a Belgian as governor. And about the same time the Vatican had made its feelings on future control of Palestine and on its relations with its colleagues and its competitors in the troubled triangle perfectly clear. All the church bells of Rome were rung over and over to celebrate the Christian conquest of Jerusalem – except for St Peter’s which remained silent. Two reasons have been suggested for the silence at St. Peter’s. Kock said the pope regarded bell ringing as “inappropriate to Vatican neutrality” – a sentiment which is hardly creditable in the circumstances. Loiseau’s reporting of a conversation with Cardinal Gasparri appears far more creditable: it was an indication of concern that while the Muslim Turks had treated the holy places with utmost respect, Christian Britain was about to hand them over to the Zionists.

In much the same vein the semi-official Vatican newspaper Osservatore Romano also did a volte-face. On December 15 it referred to the capture of Jerusalem as “a victory for Christian civilization”, but followed it a week later with a report with a different emphasis. It noted that in 1854 a coalition of Englishmen, Frenchmen and Italians had rescued Christian civilization from the threat of the Russian Orthodox, then said that now, in 1917, it had been God’s wish that the same coalition capture the Holy City, remove it from the hands of infidels, and perhaps eliminate that same danger once and for all.

Within a month Gasparri had varied his plan for the administration of Palestine in a bid to weaken Britain’s grip and to strengthen the Vatican’s position in discussions prior to the peace conference. He proposed that northern Palestine and Syria be linked to France; that southern Palestine be linked to Britain “to create a defensive disposition for Egypt”; and that the major populated area in the centre, from Lake Tiberias to Hebron and including all of the Holy Places of Jerusalem, Acre, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Jericho and Bethsaida, “would be delivered to a governor.” He said that “all the great Christian powers should participate” (thus diluting Britain’s pro-Zionist influence and ensuring a majority of Roman Catholic representatives) and that the important post of governor should not be rotated but should go to a Belgian. He said: “Politically, Belgium is unable to overshadow anybody. Its Christian vitality is expressed religiously in a thousand flourishing institutions.”

While the Vatican went about repositioning itself, Britain and France did likewise, having other practical matters to consider following the rejection of their friendly gesture. They replaced Germany as the financier of revolutions, determining a policy for the allocation of funds to the anti-Bolsheviks. The British cabinet decided on December 14 that: “Any sum of money required for the purpose of maintaining alive in South East Russia the resistance to the Central Powers, considered necessary by the War Office in consultation with the Foreign Office, should be furnished, the money to be paid in installments so long as the recipients continue the struggle.”²⁶⁹ The anticipated benefits must have been substantial for the government to authorize ‘blank cheques’ in a manner which would never be acceptable for domestic purposes. Then on December 23, the French agreed to a British plan for the division of military labour in support of the anti-Bolsheviks. The French area of responsibility was to be the territory north of the Black Sea, Bessarabia, the Ukraine and the Crimea. Britain was responsible for the Caucasus, Armenia, Georgia, Kurdistan and the Cossack territories.²⁷⁰

AMERICA’S NEW ENTHUSIASM FOR WAR

In the United States Zionism suddenly became acceptable and even attractive to many Jews who had regarded it as an aberration of Judaism.²⁷¹ Pressure on the government to play a full role in the war and to dispatch troops increased. Jews flocked to the recruiting desks. The first US troops sailed in March 1918 and by the end of September there were forty two divisions with 1,567,000 men in Europe.²⁷² Of that number approximately 250,000, or sixteen percent, were Jewish, although Jews made up less than four percent of the US population and no more than eight percent of immigration during the preceding generation. Under the impact of that force, which Germany had not anticipated a year before, the war lurched in favour of the Allies and victory was soon in sight. But it is interesting to reflect that if Britain and France had not bungled Austria’s earlier peace overture such force might not have been necessary, the war may have been over many months before and Lord Balfour may never have written his letter.

In Germany the effects were intended to be somewhat different. As part of a major allied propaganda offensive to generate resistance, subversion and even mutiny^{273 274} the British government prepared leaflets explaining the Balfour Declaration and they were dropped from the air on German and Austrian towns and distributed widely from Poland to the Black Sea.²⁷⁵ It locked the Jewish community, especially in Germany, into the role of a fifth column whether or not it acted the role. The British government had plumbed new depths in the business of manipulating religious communities.

In the Turkish provinces, where Sharif Husain had assumed the title King of the Hejas, the reaction was one of shock and dismay but the Arabs were prepared to accept Britain's assurances of good faith, to accept that the agreement with them stood, and to accept that a Jewish state would not be forced on them. Husain was even prepared to accept and welcome Jews as settlers in Arab lands.²⁷⁶ A little later, when the Sykes-Picot agreement was published by the Bolsheviks, Turkey was able to further discredit Britain. She offered an olive branch to her provinces, but by then events had carried them too far and it was too late for a counter-rebellion against Britain. The Arabs just had to wait until the war ended to start to sort out the jigsaw puzzle. But for Britain there could be no dallying. With all the tricks in its hand exposed, and with Turkey firmly against a Jewish state, it had to throw every possible effort both military and diplomatic into the Palestine and Iraq campaigns to make sure it had occupied the vital ground before the war ended. The government knew that under the circumstances Turkey would press very hard to keep Britain out of Iraq when it came to the inevitable peace conference. Thus the post armistice push for Mosul.

The so-called "Great War" ground slowly to its destructive, divisive end. It had been trumpeted around the world by the eventual "victors" as a war for humanitarian justice in response to Hunnish atrocities, greed and ambition. It was actually a simple extension of the long-running saga of territorial and resources grabs by the Christian Western powers. It just happened to be the last of its kind because the saga had run its course. There were no other such uncolonized regions left to grab. It would also prove to have been the most important of the whole series because of the strategic importance of both the region and the resources to be exploited.

THE FINAL PHASE OF CHRISTIAN RECONSTRUCTION ...

The great powers could now press on with the saga of Christian reconstruction for this region too. They had long cherished the idea and had made several attempts at it with a sense of the imperative which was not present in India, China or Africa. However this one was different. As with the resources saga it was the last of a series of events and it also had the greatest strategic importance because it was the region where the whole saga had started and which was believed to be the seat of the Messianic Age.

There was another difference between this and all the previous Christian reconstructions, too. The politics of it had taken on quite a new look. The church had ridden in on political bandwagons before, certainly, but this time the relationships had several new twists.

Firstly, the politics hinged around competition between Old World powers and the New World's United States of America in an "old" area.²⁷⁷ Previously competition between them in this sense had been restricted to the "new" areas of East Asia and Latin America. This marked the effective end of the much vaunted US policy of nonintervention which was epitomized by the Monroe Doctrine but which had already taken a severe mauling when the US annexed the Philippines during its Cuban war with Spain. The Monroe flag would still be waved with patriotic fervour for political purposes from time to time but it was a dead issue. The US had twice served notice to the world that it was just as colonial in its attitudes and intentions as the Old World powers from which it had sprung.

Secondly, the competition was for a resource which was only then becoming generally recognized as vital for the industrial and military capacity of countries which chose the course of rapid mechanical and industrial expansion. Petroleum. The United States already had overwhelming control over known reserves and supplies but, not satisfied with that, it wanted to tighten its grip. Its nonmilitary confrontation with Britain and Germany for the oil reserves of the Middle East had been one of the vital, but seldom discussed, causes of the First World War. It had then sat back, happy to watch Europe tearing itself apart, to exploit its position to the full.

Thirdly, Christian political powers, with the very prestigious Great Britain leading by a long neck in the Middle East oil stakes at that stage, were going in with positive help from political powers of both of the other partners in the triangle of faiths. Both of its collaborators, the Zionist Organization and the Sharif of Mecca, had usurped authority from the recognized authorities of their respective faiths, Judaism and Islam. Both had been set up as a consequence of complex coercion and intimidation by Christian powers. Both had resorted to using a carrot in one hand and a big stick in the other as they bargained with Britain, from positions of unaccustomed strength, to achieve both religious and political goals. It is quite arguable that the victorious Christian powers were able to go in only because of their two unlikely collaborators.

... OR A DYNAMIC CHALLENGE TO THE CHURCH?

The situation is fascinating from another point of view also. The British government had made conflicting deals of convenience on behalf of "The Defender of the Faith",²⁷⁸ to whom it was responsible, with powers of the very faiths which the defender certainly was not supposed to be defending. At the same time the official propagator of "the faith"²⁷⁹ was pressing on with its efforts to denigrate and counter those other faiths. About the only common thread running through the three conflicting agreements which Britain had entered into was that the Holy Places of all three faiths would be held inviolable and guaranteed against all external aggression. The church was therefore going to be in the Holy Land only as one of three partners in the salvation business and it could no longer go around building churches on top of mosques and synagogues.

With the Balfour Declaration the ultimate challenge to the church, to its view of itself, its conduct and the doctrines with which it strung the lot together, had been initiated. It was not worded to read "we the downtrodden, abused, exploited people of the world, suffering mental and physical distress because of the policies and self-assessment which you, the church, have held to for a very long time, challenge you either to justify all you have been saying and doing in the name of the Messiah or to mend your ways." That sort of challenge shouldn't have been necessary. But it was necessary and something of the kind was eventually thrown down in 1973, about two generations later.

In the meantime, in spite of Mr. Balfour's intimate involvement in the ecumenical movement, the British government did not seem to be fully aware of the challenge it had issued to the church, and the level of understanding of the challenge within the church varied widely. To most churchmen it was little more than "be kind to a Jew year", although some realized that Christian attitudes towards Jews would have to change if, as now appeared very likely, Judaism gained more tangible institutional permanence which the church could not dispute: respectability and direct political power through a Jewish national homeland. However Pope Benedict XV was one who did – temporarily – see it in a different light.

In January 1904 (as already noted), Benedict's predecessor, Pius X, had told Herzl that the church could not prevent the Jews from going to Jerusalem but neither could it sanction it. The soil of Jerusalem, he said, had been sanctified by the life of Jesus Christ even if it had not always been sacred. Because the Jews had not recognized the Lord, the church could not recognize the Jewish people. Then he dropped Judaism to the bottom of the triangle with a thud. It was not pleasant to see the Turks in possession of the Holy Places, he said. The church just had to put up with it, but it could not support the Jews in acquiring them and if they went to Palestine to settle, the church and its priests would be ready to baptize them all.²⁸⁰ He thus confirmed the line the Vatican had pushed steadily since 1870, and Jesuit sponsored anti-Semitism continued, rising and falling in intensity from time to time, as Jewish settlement in Palestine also continued.

Then in May 1917, just thirteen years later, when Nahum Sokolow called to brief Benedict XV on the progress of Zionist negotiations with the Allies and, in all probability, that Britain was about to announce a new Palestine policy which could lead to a change in the fortunes of war he received a very different welcome, as already noted. But then, when his political fortunes changed and the Allies wouldn't let him play at their peace table, the pope's attitude changed. He reverted to the position which Pius X had taken, or became even more antagonistic. There was no place for a Jewish State.

Muslim leaders saw the Balfour Declaration on two levels. Firstly it was a definite challenge to "be kind to a Jew." Their colleagues in Palestine were having to make sacrifices to relieve the pressure on the Jews which the Christian world had been applying, not the Muslim world. Secondly they were conscious that Zionists wanted to claim and to administer Jerusalem as their capital and to represent that as the culmination of their self help Messianic Age. However they, the Muslims, were not conscious of any overpowering Messianic urge to turn back from Mecca to Jerusalem in the sense which Muhammad had led them to expect. They believed, with fervour, that until that time came, Jerusalem should be open without restraints to the people of all faiths and that if they did not have the custody of it, it should be in joint custody.

But back to the immediate causes of the challenge. During three generations or so, pressure had been applied to the Jewish community on such a scale that it weakened the long established basis of its faith to the extent that it was prepared to work for and to fight for a national home on an ethnic basis. At the same time, the second phase of European colonialism, the Christian reconstruction phase, had reached its greatest extent. Those two developments had run concurrently with the evolution of new relationships, firstly between the church (or its many fragments) and the western political powers and, secondly, between the church and western economic and scientific developments.

All three major wings of the church, (Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Reformed), were steadfastly trying to prop up the exploitative capitalist system in their own ways. But while the first wing was trying to deny and to prevent scientific developments the third wing was trying to stimulate it and take advantage of it. (In this sense the second wing was in limbo, floundering around in medieval mysticism.) Both positions involved a reaction against, and a misunderstanding of, the concept of biological, human, material and communal evolution. This was a direct consequence of the church's confused doctrinal stance. There was a mental-block belief in the fixed and final state of man in many quarters because of rigid insistence on either Biblical inerrancy or papal infallibility. But in others there had taken hold an equally rigid insistence on ever-accelerating perpetual development.

The consequence of this confusion was that every competing Western colonial "presence" became an amorphous gel of militant capitalism, materialism, evangelical Christianity, racism and exploitation. This resulted in the destruction of existing civilizations and systems of ethics and reconstruction towards a shabby form of European "culture." There were plenty of churches but Salvation and the Messianic Age were seldom to be found. In countries which were being totally subjugated and occupied rather than simply colonized, notably the United States, Southern Africa and Australia, the church's doctrines were coupled with a misrepresentation of Darwin's theories to justify forcing remnants of the indigenous populations onto arid nonproductive reserves which the European Christian newcomers didn't want. That was supposed to dispose of the problem of inferior, half-evolved neohuman beings who could remain as living museums for the white man as long as they didn't get in his way again. But in a remarkably high proportion of those cases the arid soil and harsh environment concealed resources which the white man would later discover and would want to come back to collect in the twentieth century: aluminium, copper, coal and uranium for example.

THE NEED FOR VISION

Fortunately there were a few people with different kinds of visions. Herzl, Weizmann and company were pressing ahead to bring relief for their own people. Quite clearly that relief was deserved, but it was, unfortunately, preferential. Mott, Boegner and company were trying to bring cohesion, cooperation and understanding into the church's approach to the world at large. Muhammad Abduh and Sayyid Ahmad Khan were inspiring a reforming and organizing zeal in the Pan Islamic community. And Mahatma Gandhi was working on an idea to draw them all together as brothers. Gandhi had a very long way to go because several generations of such confusion had done a lot of damage but he was well prepared. He had the benefit of personal experience of Britain's divide-and-rule policies in India; of the use of warped theology to justify exploitation and denigration of nonwhites in Africa; of the way Britain had buried its racial equality policies down the gold and diamond mines in order to regain control of Southern Africa; and of lip-service Christianity in Britain and Europe or, as he put it, the message of Jesus, an Asiatic, which had become the distorted imperialist faith of Orthodox Christianity when it gained the backing of a Roman emperor.²⁸¹

Western economic growth was already becoming linked to labour and resource exploitation in nonwestern countries. Through the American version of the Protestant Ethic, (uninhibited exploitation of everything a capitalist could get his hands on), Western countries were becoming accustomed to exponential growth in corporate profits. The system thrived with mass immigration and the never-ending push west across the prairies to the Rockies, to the Pacific, to Asia, to People's senses were being dulled to corruption which was easily camouflaged by the pace of activity and the rule of operations such as Standard Oil.

The rapid expansion of secular schools and universities had boosted people's expectations of life, their receptiveness to new ideas and their capacity to contribute to the community around them. This ought to have improved the church's ability to spread the Gospel. In fact its inability or reluctance to carry out a review of its doctrines, coupled with astounding clerical attitudes towards science and philosophy, made people more cynical rather than more receptive. In contrast the manipulators of commerce and politics were quick to recognize and to seize the opportunities offered. The use and abuse of the new weaponry of psychology increased rapidly and the manipulators – whether in government or in commerce – managed to stay a step or two ahead of the public educators. If the church recognized the problem it still did nothing not even when religious and racial bigotry were trotted out to stimulate wartime recruiting campaigns. Perhaps the church was too busy looking after its own lines to worry much about what others were saying.

Hypocritical contrasts in attitudes to world events highlighted the absurdity of the church's view of itself and Western attitudes towards the nonwestern world which were tightly intertwined. For example, when Britain incited the Arabs to rebellion against their Turkish overlords it was a normal wartime diplomatic contact. But when Irish Nationalists rebelled against their British overlords in collaboration with Germany it was treason.

When Chinese peasants, provoked by missionaries and Western merchants, rebelled against the Ch'ing Dynasty it was a normal and proper response to the modernizing influence of Christianity in an antiquated social system. But when Russian peasants dared to listen to Lenin and Trotsky and to bring down the oppressive and tyrannical Romanovs, the fall of a Christian monarchy was a catastrophe.

Few people seem to have noticed anything contradictory when Britain used Indian troops in an abortive invasion of Afghanistan to keep Russia at bay and then, somewhat later, happily made a treaty with her to divide up Persia's oil fields in order to prevent a German "intrusion" and a change in the balance of power. Neither did they think it inappropriate to use Muslim Indian troops again to keep Christian Germany at bay in Muslim living space.

And of course it was still quite acceptable for Christians to apply repressive measures against the clergy and religious leaders of other faiths, and to requisition or destroy their property. Admittedly a few objections were raised when the church supported Italy's designs on Libya as a Holy War, but they were motivated by economic concerns and not religious tolerance. On the other hand if a nasty non-Christian Japanese, Chinese or Vietnamese citizen dared to strike down a priest it was a wonderful excuse for a protecting power such as Britain, France or the United States to step in, demand retribution on behalf of the church and wage a war for a treaty or a land and resources grab based on a trumped-up sense of injustice and offended dignity.

Yes, the powers were finding that the church had some very definite uses in the national interest. Most of them still had some sort of formal links with it and it was therefore politically wise to prop it up financially but, being so fragmented, they didn't have to take much notice of it anymore, except when there was a danger of it rocking the boat because the pope's interests were affected. Even the Jewish community had developed into a usable asset – some would say more useful than the church – and it therefore had to be fostered and protected.

Strangely enough, by pushing for and accepting Britain's reluctant support for its claims to Palestine the Zionist Organization had linked Judaism and the Jewish community firmly to the amorphous gel of the Western Christian presence. Through the investment and political policies which a few key Jewish families had adopted in managing their immense fortunes they were already heavily implicated in the errors and the brawls of the Christian West. Their financing of the Crimean War efforts of Britain and France; of Confederate interests during the American Civil War; and the financing of Cecil Rhodes' repressive diamond and gold empires in Southern Africa are sufficient to establish that. However their policies were nonexclusive, as shown by their response to Herzl's proposal for financial collaboration with the Ottoman Sultan.

Now the chips were down and loans and investment capital began to flow more freely into those countries which were favourable to the establishment of a state of Israel. Mr. Balfour had not idly addressed his letter to Lord Rothschild. The consequences were far-reaching but they took some time to become apparent and for the moment the overriding feeling was of jubilation and gratitude.

The Church, clinging to its spurious self-assessment, had not grasped the changing relationships at all. As the First World War broke around it, it had a finger in the affairs of practically every country in the world through the powers linked with it. It was either present as the established religion; as the basis on which the country was founded (in the case of the USA); through missions in European dominions; or through missions in countries which had treaties imposed on them by military force. There was virtually no other sort of country.²⁸² The world, its people and its resources belonged to the Western Christian powers and that was the way the bulk of the church believed it should be. It looked back with pride at "The Great Century" of achievement during which Christianity had penetrated even the darkest corners of the world.²⁸³ All that remained was to convert and baptize those people who hadn't yet been 'done' and the task of saving mankind would have been more or less completed. After that it would only be necessary to keep the water flowing on each new generation. That shouldn't be very difficult at all.

Obviously that was not the real situation but it was yet another spin-off of the church's doctrines and its self understanding that it was blind to reality and the effects of the policies which it and the Western powers were jointly pushing. A lot of people would be crushed in the rush unless there was a safety valve to relieve the pressure. The West didn't know it, but it was providing for a safety valve in its Christian reconstruction of the Middle East. It was to be called the State of Israel.

The church didn't know it either. When General Allenby walked through the Jaffa Gate to take formal possession of the Old City of Jerusalem on behalf of Christian Britain on December 11, 1917, (two days after it had been occupied), it had reason to believe that in the overall region of the Middle East it was involved in the last of the great regional Christian reconstruction programmes. At that stage of 1917 there were plenty of Christians prepared to celebrate the culmination of the Messianic Age. There was very little else for them to celebrate. The setting up of a Christian administration in the somewhat derelict town of 55,000 people was surely the event everyone had been waiting for. It was to be the symbolic light set upon the hill to guide humanity. Jerusalem had at last been relieved from the Infidel whose empire was finally disintegrating.

But there was something hollow about it. The atmosphere at the time was certainly not euphoric. It could hardly even be called tranquil and the circumstances in which the Holy City had passed into Christian hands were highly suspect. Instead of plans for a Christian temple on the site where the legendary Oriental despot, King Solomon, had used forced labour to build his grand temple there were plans to let the Jews have it. And by the terms of the agreement with the Muslims a Christian church couldn't be built on the sacred Temple Mount anyway. The symbolic light upon the hill would have to be set in the valley instead. Well it probably didn't matter anyway. It wasn't vital to the Salvation process. That was complete through Christian baptism. And it wasn't vital to the Messianic Age either. That had been ushered in just about 1900 years before and it was being managed quite satisfactorily by the Messiah's agents, thank you very much.

Few people stopped to think that possibly General Allenby's arrival looked a bit like that of his predecessor, Pompey. It had been Pompey's lot to capture Jerusalem in the push which carried the Roman Empire to its greatest extent at a time when it and the world were in desperate need of the Messiah's message. Now Allenby had captured it in the push which carried the British Empire to its greatest extent at a time when the world had even greater need for the Messiah's message than when Pompey arrived. Britain's was the most prestigious and influential empire the world had ever known. It was the greatest in extent and it was arguably the most pretentious in its Christianity. It had played its part in carrying the story of the Messiah all over the world. It had sent its missionaries everywhere it went hunting for resources, for markets, for slaves and for somewhere to dump its reject Christians. And when those missionaries were murdered because they represented the imposition and abuses of alien power, or for what ever reason, it had seized the opportunity to send in a few more gun boats to annex some more territory: to protect the church and to spread the word of God, of course.

As Allenby's men marched into Jerusalem they may have been singing good old rabble-rousing stuff like "Rule Britannia: Britannia rules the waves: Britons never, never, ne—ver shall be slaves." Or perhaps "Onward Christian Soldiers, marching as to war", or even "O God our help in ages past." Certainly people throughout the whole world knew of Jesus Christ. They didn't have much option. But they hadn't received His message. Certainly some of them had received the church's sacraments, but that was not the same thing. Whatever Allenby's men were singing was really a bit hollow. But maybe they were not singing. Some reports suggest their entry was a rather sombre occasion. Perhaps they were afflicted by a sense of misgiving, or guilt.

There were, however, a lot of people waiting for the chance to sing a different sort of tune. There were people like Gandhi keenly watching every move Britain and her allies made, and there were a lot of people who thought the words of Karl Marx made a lot more sense than those their clergy mouthed. In fact just as the world's Jews were beginning to believe that they might receive a response to their prayer "Next year in Jerusalem", because Britain had given them the nearest thing to a promise to make it so, the Bolsheviks of Russia were planning their version of a regional Christian reconstruction.

CAN ANYONE READ THE PLANS?

IT'S TIME TO DESIGN THE PERFECT SOCIETY

Europe's efforts to reconstruct the rest of the world in its own Christian image looked rather ridiculous when everyone had a chance to pause and look around after the dust settled and the poison gas dissipated on November 11, 1918. The First World War had left the Continent in a sorry state. The poison gas might have dissipated, but the poison propaganda certainly had not. The war had also left Europe's colonies and dominions mourning the loss of hundreds of thousands of their young men and women who had forfeited their lives – so they were told, and many believed to the point of a personal obligation – to uphold Christian honour and glory and (by their sacrifice) to end barbarity and inhumanity for all time. It had been the war to end all war. It had been the war to secure the world for Christian principle. Or at least that was what the propagandists were saying on behalf of governments who were not prepared to admit that it had been simply another war to back a scramble for resources and land. But although the motives or aims of the conflicting powers may have been simple, the complex web of international interests, conflicts and intrigue which they had generated and the great powers' stated justification for intervention certainly was not and we must now examine some aspects of the web further.

When the United States finally entered the war on the side of the Allies, but not formally as one of them, the situation had already been complicated by the intrigues of both the British government and the Vatican over interfaith issues and non-European alliances. But once the United States was involved it proved no more willing to debate its motives and war aims than the Allies had been. The US had gone in for its own purposes and not as one of a gang with a common cause nor, necessarily, to speed up the peacemaking process, and the degree of cohesion between the Allies and the United States was little more than was required to defeat the Central Powers. As a result, politics, commercial interests and leadership attitudes in the United States, Russia and Germany had become further confused and intertwined.¹ Consequently, as the complex of wars dragged on the whole world was gradually drawn further into the confusion as if a giant vacuum cleaner was sucking in the entangled webs.

The unwillingness of Allied governments to debate their motives or war aims also had other effects. The Vatican had the Allies caught in a bind. They either had to satisfy the pope's demands for the return of a papal state so that he could have his temporal rule, or they had to neutralize his potentially catastrophic subversive influence. They couldn't satisfy his temporal power demands even if they wanted to (which they didn't) because to get Italy into the war they had undertaken, in the Treaty of London, not to. However, they couldn't offset the Vatican factor by promoting national interest unless they were prepared to debate their war aims or their motives in waging war. This they could not do because they were well aware that they could not gain public support on that basis either at home or in their colonies.² Similarly, without such a debate they could not rely on claims of overall community benefit and this was confirmed by widespread resistance to conscription. Neither could they simply say "we are ignoring the pope's demands because" The struggle for the reunification of Italy had not ended with Garibaldi's victories and if it was to be resolved to the disadvantage of the church then clearly the whole world would pay for it under pressure of one kind or another applied by courtesy of the papacy. The grip of the clergy, especially after the oath of absolute conformity that they had just taken, was so tight that an open public debate was unwinnable. The gates had closed behind the Allies one by one.

Other methods had to be found to secure the allegiance of the Roman Catholic population. The Allies were left with appeals to racist nationalism, which could only be whipped up through revulsion at barbaric conduct, fear of being overrun, or hatred of the enemy who had to be portrayed as different and having warped, sadistic or sub-human standards. This could not possibly be done without relying on, and without aggravating, existing tendencies to racism and sectarianism. Truth was apparently of little consequence to governments, many politicians and their mind-manipulators, especially in the Western Alliance, in describing the conduct of the opposing side.

When Germany violated Belgian neutrality in August 1914 its troops were reported to have ravished women and young children, impaled and crucified men, cut off tongues and breasts, gouged eyes and burned whole villages. Such reports were not only carried by the more sensationalist press but they were endorsed by leading writers such as John Buchan, Arthur Conan Doyle and Arnold Toynbee. It has subsequently been confirmed that some large scale atrocities of the kind which were later categorized as 'war crimes', including the massacre of civilians in certain villages in Belgium, did occur but the level of exaggeration and distortion had been such that by the time the facts had been established after the war the allies were not in a position to take any action. It was not until the 1990s that the families of those massacred were able to arrange official recognition and commemoration for the victims.

In the initial phases of the war, such sectarian propaganda and recruiting campaigns based on virulent nationalism and fear and revulsion at barbaric conduct had been sufficient to mobilize patriotic populations in support of the war effort. But as the casualties mounted and the futility of fighting became evident, Pacifist and Communist arguments that characterized the war as a fight for imperial spoils that benefited only the rich gained increasing sympathy. As a result, by 1916 governments on both sides of the conflict had to find new ways of inducing their people to fight.³

Thus, although sectarian propaganda had continued throughout 1914 and 1915, and even decreased somewhat for a few months, it reached a new peak in April 1916 when the British press began to publish news and comments about the use of the corpses of fallen soldiers by the Germans for the production of lubricants such as glycerine, and soap. It was added as an afterthought, presumably for the benefit of Muslim countries and China, that the corpses were also being used in the production of pig food. The Financial Times reported that the Kaiser had personally ordered the torture of three children and specified the nature of the torture. And the Daily Telegraph reported in March 1916 that 700,000 Serbs had been killed by Austrians and Bulgarians using asphyxiating gas.⁴

FIRST TASK: FIND A TARGET ...

The Vatican could not expose such policies because of its own position, and the Orthodox and Reformed Churches were so linked in to either the national structures or the socio-economic philosophy of their community that, overall, they swallowed the role of national prop, hook, line and sinker. It was therefore some time before the general public became aware that such reports were fabricated and by that time lasting damage had been done. The reports of gas deaths and bodies for pig feed dreamt up by some sick-minded propagandist set a precedent that would soon haunt the whole world. The whole issue of war crimes became tainted by the odor of propaganda, greatly reducing in the public mind the credibility of any future claims concerning war-time atrocities.

Yet again the Roman Catholic Church's self-understanding and the papacy's demand for territorial sovereignty (to support its claim for temporal authority and, in turn, its claim to have divine spiritual authority) had contributed to, and prolonged, international conflict, death and destruction on a frightening scale. And alongside the eventual suspicion which would fall on war-time atrocity claims, it had also stimulated the development and use of completely new techniques in an armoury for manipulation of one's own and other people as well as for psychological warfare against one's declared enemy.

The Allies had a wide range of targets in the ensuing psychological war, and this had complicated their task. They had an alliance of Christians and Muslims to aim at plus a large target population of oppressed Jews in Germany and Austria. On the other hand, however, the Jewish populations outside of Europe were more antagonistic towards one of the Allies, tsarist Russia, than they were towards Germany. They had good reason to be. Tsarist Russia was not only pursuing its ruthless anti-Semitic policy at the domestic level, it was using anti-Semitic propaganda to incite mutiny among Polish troops of the Austro-Hungarian army. Leaflets were dropped among them describing the Germans and the Jews as their murderers, contemptible oppressors and executioners of their children in Posen. They posed the question of why the Poles, being Russia's unfortunate brothers, should waste their blood as slaves for the Prussians and Austrians who had delivered them as hostages to the Jews in Galicia. In the wake of the leaflet drop Russia swept into Galicia very quickly, but before their armies counter attacked, the German and Austrian emperors jointly issued a manifesto, on November 5, 1916, promising the Poles an independent state with an hereditary monarchy. It put a completely new complexion on the Polish question, closing the door to future annexation by either Russia or the Central Powers and therefore preventing Catholicization by papal negotiation or manipulation.^{5 6} But in addition Britain was wide open to attack over its religious and racial policies in the dominions from which it was drawing armies of mixed faiths and races to fight its war. The absolute hypocrisy of its position was eventually exposed for all to see through its conflicting agreements with both Muslims and Jews for help in the same vital campaign area at the same time.

... OR A CAUSE

The Russian Revolution erupted on February 23, 1917, Lenin returned to Russia on March 3, and the US declared war against Germany on April 6 under the leadership of the man who has been described as “the prime embodiment, the apogee, of the Calvinist tradition,” and who it was impossible to understand apart from his religious faith.⁷ That man, President Woodrow Wilson, wrote that “the finger of God moves upon the face of the nations (and) is against every man that plots the nation’s downfall or the people’s deceit (and who is) simply groping and staggering in their ignorance to a fearful day of judgement.”⁸ The United States did not have an ‘established’ or state religion. It had complete freedom of religion and it had pursued a policy of complete separation of state and religion – up to the point which suited its politicians, anyway. It had no reason to be beholden to any particular religious community. Its history demonstrated that repeatedly. However its politicians and the churches recognized that religious adherence and religious teaching always invoked a sense of discipline and personal responsibility, and these were vital characteristics for an army in wartime. Therefore when the United States became involved in World War I chaplains were appointed to the armed forces from each of the Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish faith communities. They were given commissioned officer status and all the perks of office. The recruitment line was that the Allies were fighting a war to make the world safe for democracy, and, with a slight twist of emphasis, that could be made to read for the survival of Christianity.

Then a key phrase in the pledge of allegiance to the flag was changed by the addition of two words. The expression “one nation, indivisible” became “one nation, under God, indivisible.” It has been said that this was partly due to antagonism towards Communism as it was evolving in Russia “with little of intellectual depth or ... the kind of conviction that could be called Christian” but it has also been said that it was “evidence of a widespread superficial religiosity which was probably identified with the American way of life.”⁹ Britain was certainly not the only nation which was playing the religion game in the age of Lloyd George and Balfour, and the United States was doing so under the presidency of a man of equally impressive credentials.

Wilson, son of a Presbyterian clergyman, a lawyer by profession who turned to teaching became, in turn, author of an authoritative reference, Congressional Government, Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy at Princeton University and president of that institution. He was a religious man whose speeches were often marked by such moral fervour that they were described as 'political sermons' and it was said that he "claimed an intimacy with the designs of Providence that could scarcely be justified." It may therefore seem somewhat surprising that he saw the function of a university as to train the intellect rather than the character or the body and that, with reforming liberal zeal, he paraded the message 'Live and let live.' He resigned from the university post in 1910 to seek election as Governor of New Jersey, and after only two years in that office he was elected President of the United States. He served from 1913 right through the war and the 'peace making' processes which followed, to 1921.¹⁰

BRITAIN'S TRUMP CARD

The biblical overtones of the Balfour Declaration were certainly not lost on Wilson and he is reported to have said to one Jewish leader: "To think that I, the son of the manse, should be able to restore the Holy Land to its people ..." ¹¹ He was a man who has been credited with having a vision of a welfare state in which governments would restrain exploiters, uplift the downtrodden, protect children and defend the helpless and weak.¹² He was fascinated by the idea that "a democratic Zionism might replace Ottoman despotism and create a haven for oppressed Jews in Palestine." ¹³ He was opposed to European imperialism and suspicious of secret Franco-British treaties covering the Ottoman Empire. He was soon to chair the meeting of Allied leaders at the opening of the Versailles Peace Conference, to play a dominant role in it, especially as prime mover behind the reconstruction of Germany from parliamentary monarchy to republic, and at the same time to be a key figure in the Western bid to prevent the reconstruction of Russia from despotic monarchy to republic, and he was also soon to be 'the father of the League of Nations.'

It was seven months after the US declaration of war that the British Government played its trump card – the ace of hearts – the Balfour Declaration. It was very fortunate for Britain, from both short term tactical and strategic points of view, that it had been possible to withhold publication of the declaration until after Turkey had evacuated Jerusalem. It is a very reasonable assumption that if the declaration had been published on October 31, when it was approved, or on November 2, when it was handed to Lord Rothschild, the Sharif of Mecca might well have withdrawn his support from Britain. Certainly the Turkish resistance would have been stiffened, the city would very likely not have been evacuated, and if that had happened there would have been two alternatives. Either Britain would have been involved in a Crusader-style blood bath for Jerusalem and every other city on its way through Palestine and Syria or it would have had to forfeit its strategic objective of Iraq's oil region. The British Government would have found that quite unacceptable. The declaration was actually made public in London very quietly on November 9, immediately after the Bolsheviks had seized power and installed a Council of People's Commissars, and the day that the Muslim mayor surrendered Jerusalem to two of General Allenby's soldiers he had found out looking for water – after the Turkish evacuation.

When General Allenby formally accepted the surrender and occupied the city on behalf of Christian Britain two days later he made no mention in his proclamation speech of the declaration or the government's intentions. This was presumably on instructions from London

If the declaration had been aimed only at Jewish financiers the timing of its release would not have been critical. In fact it need not have been released publicly until after peace had been achieved and in that atmosphere territorial negotiations could have been much more harmonious. Similarly, if it were aimed only at gaining public support in America for the war effort, and if its probable consequences in Palestine did not have to be considered, it could have either been released immediately it was approved or it could have been withheld until a respectable period had elapsed after the surrender of Jerusalem. However if the declaration was to have any influence in the Allied bid to swing public opinion in Western Russia towards staying in the war then it could not be withheld any longer after a Bolshevik government had been formed and a decision had been taken to sue for peace. Balfour had argued his case for it on its merits as a propaganda tool directed at both Russian and American Jews and had used the Graham memorandum to support it.¹⁴ Furthermore if Britain's proposal that Russia should have a hand in the administration of a zone of Holy Places under the Sykes-Picot Agreement, (justified by the involvement of the Orthodox Church), had not been for the same purpose it is most unlikely that Russia would have been told of the Anglo-French agreement at all. In that case the Bolsheviks would not have been able to hold it up to ridicule by Turkey after they came to power. After all, they had not been told of Emperor Karl's peace overture several months earlier.

BRITAIN'S HAND EXPOSED

When the declaration was finally published, Britain had to accept the exposure of her sheer hypocrisy in the matter of religious faith. Previously her Christianity had been so sacrosanct, and the affairs of the church so vital, that it had been her excuse for several naval and military excursions against less powerful nations in other parts of Asia. Now she had to drop her mask and not only accept, but also promote, the interests of the two faiths she had most consistently denigrated. It was part of the price of a much more vital material interest in West Asia. Oil.

The Russian Constituent Assembly was formally dissolved in January, 1918, a peace settlement was finalized with Germany in the first week of March and then, while Jewish cheers were still echoing around Europe and Jewish volunteers were still queuing up in the United States in response to Britain's new found religious tolerance, the Allies were teaming up with the Vatican for another round of psychological warfare. Anti-Communist propaganda in Britain and the US was targeted at Russia's new Bolshevik regime. The campaign ran hand in hand with their military misadventures which were intended to restore either a proper Christian monarchy or a republic, or anything except a Communist system.

According to Rome, the Romanovs and the Russian Orthodox Church were decadent and had run off the proper sacramental track. If the Russian people and their church would return to Rome all would be well again. The opportunity to achieve what it had not been able to in all the strung-out manoeuvring over Poland and the Balkans was too good to miss. But according to the Allies who had plenty of friends to keep in Orthodox countries it was not all the church's fault. It was mainly that man Rasputin (whom the church was very quick to disown) and the atheistic Bolsheviks who had forsaken the church altogether. In their view it didn't really matter what church the Russians followed, as long as they followed the Christian ethic or, more correctly, as long as they kept their fingers away from Russia's resources – especially those Baku oil fields which Shell had bought from the Rothschilds in 1911. If the Marxist Bolsheviks were allowed to take public control of Russia's privately controlled resources in the name of the people the rot might set in just as it did when Peter's land grab from the church was taken as an example in Austria, France, Prussia and elsewhere.

The church-in-general shared the Western powers' concern that Marxism, no longer an idle philosophy but made respectable and powerful by having been adopted by a national government, might prove attractive in other parts of Europe. There was also concern about China as well. The ethnic links between Russia and China were strong in places in spite of conflicts in the past. With intense jockeying for power by regional interests since the fall of the Ch'ing Dynasty, aggravated by Japan's "gentlemanly and civilized" seizure of Germany's plot of Chinese ground, Marxism could prove very attractive to large sections of the Chinese people. If it took hold the church's missions could be closed again. The thought of so many people missing out on their sacramental salvation was dreadful!

The barrier which had been built between Russia and the rest of Europe over the question of church-state relations when Christianity was adopted by the princes, and which had only been broken down for a few generations by the Partition of Poland, was firmly back in place again by courtesy of a different set of church-state relationships. The church's want for people's minds and the capitalists' want for their resources brought the two together again and the Western anticommunist alliance became stronger than it had been during Marx's lifetime.

Within Russia itself the situation was no different. The shock of the Bolshevik seizure of power was a perfect opportunity for the Russian Orthodox Church to stop in its tracks, rethink its role in society and renew its relationship to the Russian people. Rather than opening itself to that historic opportunity, however, it decided immediately upon a course of opposition and reaction. There was no time to waste. The challenge to the traditional role of the Church as sole spiritual guide to the Russian people had to be put down.

There had been a brief period after the 1905 revolution when it looked as if the church might take on a new role, aided by decrees of religious freedom and reform of its structures which had been forced on Nicholas. But within two years the vision had been shattered completely. Concessions and clerical independence were withdrawn ¹⁵ and the whole church joined Tsar Nicholas II and his "...Orthodox Hessian (Tsarina Alexandra) with (her) Windsor upbringing and a Byzantine crown on her head ..." in their growing dependence on their "Man of God" the drunken, horse-stealing, insolent rake Rasputin.¹⁶

By the beginning of the Great War that dependence had reached the point at which, according to Trotsky, the Procurators of the Holy Synod, (first Sabler and later Raev), the Metropolitan Pitirim of Petrograd, the near-illiterate Archbishop Varnava, the president of the Council of Ministers and the Minister of the Interior all owed their positions to, or were sustained by, the institutionalized rogue. He was also credited with the dismissal of Premier Kokovstev. When War Minister Polivanov was asked about the situation at the front on August 4, 1915, he replied that he “placed (his) trust in the impenetrable spaces, impassable mud, and the mercy of Saint Nicholas Mirlikisky, Protector of Holy Russia.”¹⁷ And when the tsar visited the front his train carried a chapel full of large and small images, shingles and fetishes which were invoked against the German artillery.¹⁸

When Rasputin was murdered and the monarchy fell only a matter of weeks later, with foreign troops occupying a large part of Western Russia, the Russian church shook to the foundations. Then when Bolsheviks were brought into the Provisional Government the situation was even more grave. Professor Anton Kartashev was appointed Minister of Religion in June 1917 with the task of putting the church's house in order and of introducing real religious liberty. He refused to couple his office with that of Procurator of the Holy Synod, tried to cut the links between the church and the state, and helped assemble a 564-member elected Council of the Russian Church with about half clergy and half laymen in Moscow on August 15.¹⁹

By that time the country was at fever pitch with talk of the coming second revolution to install a Bolshevik government and the church recognized a challenge from Marxism very clearly. But the challenge it saw was not for a rethink of its theology. It couldn't shake off a fixation that its theology was perfect. The challenge it saw was a confrontation between atheism and Christianity. It saw the answer in a reorganized and reactivated church geared to fight the new menace. And yet it could see a paradox. It knew that Marx had been driven by a hatred of oppression and that in an ultimate victory of the proletariat he saw something of the nineteenth century Jewish concept of the collective Messiahship of the future even though he rejected each of the revealed faiths of the triangle. It knew that his talk of social justice through new economic policies had to be taken seriously but it rejected the whole package because Marx denied its concept of God. It took the stand that the ultimate victory of righteousness, (Salvation), would come to those who acknowledged God through the forms of the Orthodox Church and that a struggle to gain material benefits by overturning the God fearing Russian system was contrary to God's will. It could see that Western Europe was ripe for revolution because although its people did not have the courage to deny God's existence they had lost the ardour of true belief. It saw the Allies' apparent unwillingness to mount a full scale operation to maintain a Christian government in Russia as a symptom of that loss of faith.²⁰

The Council of the church met less than three weeks after the Sixth Congress of the Bolshevik Party and only three days after a meeting of the conservative State Conference and it was clearly influenced by them both. The Bolshevik Congress had elected a Central Committee to organize the seizure of government. The conservative State Conference had issued a call for Marshall Kornilov to lead a counter revolution and it had thereby provoked a general strike in Moscow.^{21 22} In its turn the Council heatedly debated ways of restoring full autonomy to the church and whether it should have a patriarch or group leadership and it often divided along class lines. But it showed no such division or vigour in matters of doctrine and worship, nor, it seems, in the issue of the “Social Gospel” which was fueling the new Protestant effort in many countries and which Rome was about to emulate.²³ It was too preoccupied with stopping the “Social Gospel” of Communism to be able to do anything constructive about an alternative.

It seems as if the Russian Church was determined to demonstrate that in spite of its recent history, its views of itself and its role were just as deeply entrenched as those of its counterpart in Rome – except that it could not resolve the leadership issue until its arch enemies brought matters to a head. When the Bolsheviks seized power on October 26–27 (November 9 by the revised calendar)²⁴ the church hierarchy realized it needed decisive leadership if it was going to mount effective opposition against them. The issue was resolved nine days later (November 18) with the election of Metropolitan Tikhon of Moscow as Patriarch. As the church saw the situation, the people of Russia then split into two opposite camps to fight the battle for and against God till the finish.²⁵ The church was gearing up for that battle at just the right time to link into the Allies’ subversive activities while Lenin’s negotiators were trying for the best peace deal they could get from Germany. But by then it had become clear that the newly-born marxist state had more than a little subversive ammunition of its own with which to take the fight up to its Christian Capitalist opponents.

PEACE ON WHOSE TERMS?

When the Balfour Declaration failed to keep Bolshevik Russia in the war Lenin kept his promise and after a few days in power, and against strong opposition from reactionaries in the Foreign Ministry, he published all the secret treaties in which tsarist Russia had been involved.²⁶ It soon became patently clear that aristocratic and commercial interests, and not peace and security for the ordinary population, had been the Allied governments’ prime concerns. Labour organizations began to press for proper consideration of their interests in foreign affairs.²⁷ Sympathy for the Bolshevik cause increased in each of Germany, Britain and France where strikes and even an army mutiny had already been mounted to force a negotiated peace.^{28 29} The Allies and the US each received conflicting diplomatic, military, political and commercial advice and could barely agree on a common approach to the new regime. In response, censorship was tightened and massive propaganda smoke screens were thrown up to show that the Bolshevik government was about to fall and efforts were made to stir up the civil war in Russia.

Even before he published the secret deals (in fact on the night that he seized power) Lenin appealed to the Allies to make peace jointly and immediately. He added that his government considered it the greatest crime against humanity that the powerful and wealthy nations should continue the war for the sake of dividing the weaker nations between them. When they had not responded within two weeks Lenin instructed his Commander-in-Chief to begin armistice negotiations at the front immediately but, with the support of the Allies, he refused. The Allied governments then ignored Lenin and began dealing directly with other reactionary commanders as well, in an effort to keep them in the war against the orders of the new government. Six days later, on November 27, the British Ambassador advised his government to change course, to recognize and to be reconciled with the Bolshevik government. That was still three days before a delegation left Petrograd for Brest Litovsk with orders from Lenin and Trotsky for the peace negotiations which the Commander in Chief had refused to begin. There was some support for the ambassador's views but the French Government insisted that Russia must honour its 1914 Tsarist treaty and stay in the war until it suited all the Allies to stop.³⁰

Apart from direct encouragement to military advisers and financial grants the reactionaries were spurred on by veiled threats of a Western-supported Japanese attack on Russia from the east if they laid down their arms. On December 1 Britain and France formally agreed on areas of responsibility for these subversive activities following a meeting of Allied prime ministers in Paris. Britain, which drew up the plan, took care of the Caucasus and Georgia (with the Shell and Nobel oil fields) and Armenia plus the key region of Kurdistan which straddled the borders of Turkey, Iraq and Iran, controlled the land routes to India and included the much sought after Mosul/Kirkuk oil concession. France accepted responsibility in Rumania, Bessarabia, the Ukraine and the Crimea to the north and west of the Black Sea.³¹

The strain on the new Bolshevik government as it faced Russia's hostile former allies and struggled for an armistice with Germany would have been great enough to exhaust the tolerance of any government but it also had to contend with a clutch of hostile elements fighting a civil war behind its back. It is therefore hardly surprising that it continued the harsh police-state tactics to suppress its opponents which the nation had become accustomed to under the tsar. The only thing that differed was the target. It was the wealthy aristocracy and reactionary groups, especially in the civil service, which had benefited under the old regime. The anti-Communist propagandists in the West were not left without material to work on. The church in Russia, as despised as it was, was going to come in handy at last.

Many Orthodox churchmen were prominent in the new government's target groups. As a result many of them, both clergy and laity, lost their lives in the continuing suppression of anti-government groups even though there was no systematic persecution of the church.³² The Russian church had degenerated into little more than a "spiritual servant" or a psychological prop for the aristocracy³³ and a propaganda arm of the monarchy. It was useful in the tsar's battles to suppress revolution and in his scape-goating of the Jewish community and, as Marx had put it, it had become an opiate of the masses. The people still clung to a pathetic hope that through its mystical rites they might gain some sort of relief from earthly distress in whatever lay beyond the grave.

On December 6 Trotsky announced that peace negotiations were suspended for a week, thereby keeping Germany guessing with its armies still facing the Allied-supported Russian reactionaries while he pressed the Allies to rethink their positions. They had not given any response when negotiations recommenced on December 12 and an armistice was promptly agreed. It took effect on December 17 and was to be maintained for a month while a peace treaty was negotiated. Progress was slow and delegates took another break from December 28 to January 9, so that all of the warring governments could reassess their demands. Of course a few thousand more soldiers were killed or maimed on all sides while prime ministers and presidents argued with their diplomats over whether their demands were being met, but that didn't matter much because their industrialists were keeping other people employed making bombs, bullets and mustard gas – and counting the growing piles of tax payers' money pouring into their merchant bankers' vaults.

On the day the talks were suspended Trotsky issued another impassioned appeal for the Allies to join the peace negotiations. They could no longer claim to be fighting to liberate occupied France, Belgium, Serbia, Montenegro, Rumania, Poland, Lithuania or Kurland because Germany had already agreed to a Russian demand for no annexations and for self-determination for people in disputed territories. He demanded to know what they were continuing the war for, left them to ponder the greater fighting power Germany would have on the western front after Russia made a separate peace, and incited the working classes of the Allies to bring the matter to a head by revolution against governments which refused to join the peace negotiations.³⁴ The Allies were unaccustomed to such belligerent open diplomacy. They became even more antagonistic towards the Bolsheviks but they were forced by public reaction to respond to Trotsky's demand for a statement of intentions.

On January 5, 1918, Lloyd George stated the British government's position in a speech to trade union leaders. His tone was much more conciliatory than that of previous government statements and his attitude towards people of other countries carried none of the sectarian and racial bitterness which had been the hallmark of government propaganda from the beginning of the war. He said quite specifically that Britain did not aim at the break up of the German people, the disintegration of their state or country, the destruction of "the Imperial Constitution of Germany", nor the destruction of Austria-Hungary.³⁵ But on the question of imperial interests he was very vague in wording Britain's position; he did not spell out what Britain expected to gain from the war; and he was clearly determined to hold his winning cards until the eventual peace conference. Just eight weeks after the Balfour Declaration about all he could say on Turkey's empire in the Middle East was that Arabia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine were entitled to emerge as separate states. It was a glib attempt to avoid discussing Britain's three conflicting agreements over Palestine and the issue of Jewish, Muslim and Christian relations and rights in the region. In addition he stated that, though the Bosphorus would have to be kept open under international treaty, Turkey would keep its capital, Constantinople. Britain had made such a botch of its relations in the Middle East that it needed a basis for future negotiations with Turkey and, besides that, if the Bolsheviks were seen to make a separate peace with Germany they could hardly hold Britain and France to a treaty gift of Constantinople. But, in contrast, the implication was clear that Germany would lose its empire.³⁶

President Wilson announced his stand on behalf of the United States in a message to Congress three days later, January 8, just the day before negotiations recommenced at Brest Litovsk with Trotsky personally leading the Russian delegation. Like Lloyd George, the President said little about what he expected for the US, except freedom of trade and navigation, but in his fourteen points he was in some respects somewhat more open about whose people and territory he would give to whom. Italy for example, was to get Trentino, which put the US in step with the Allies' commitment. The "Turkish portions" of the Ottoman Empire should be assured of a secure sovereignty, he said, but the "other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule" should be assured of an "undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development." That was suitably vague on each of the issues of Constantinople-in-Europe, (was it a "Turkish portion of the Ottoman Empire" or was it not?), and the growing Jewish settlements alongside the Arabs as nationalities in Palestine.

On the question of Germany's empire the American president wanted a bob each way. He said that a free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims should be based on a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.³⁷ He was much less vague in a piece of advice to Britain, which had to understand that it was not going to have an open run in the Middle East.

DIVINE RIGHTS MUST GO

On the question of Germany itself, however, Wilson was positively mischievous. Referring to "liberal majorities in parliaments" formulating principles while "militarist minorities" in Berlin and Vienna dictated their practical application, he said there could be no lasting peace without the "democratization" of Germany.³⁸ Lloyd George had already talked of "genuine self government on true democratic principles", so the two statements could be read to mean the same thing. But while Lloyd George had made it quite clear that Britain anticipated constitutional monarchies his American counterpart did not, at that point, make it clear that he anticipated something different. In his letter to Benedict XV on August 30, 1917, in response to the papal peace note, Wilson had written that the Kaiser should abdicate before any negotiations took place with Berlin, but abdication is normally followed by the succession of a new monarch and Wilson did not say that this should mean the end of the monarchy.³⁹

However, it soon became apparent that republican America didn't see the picture from the same angle as its Allies. America wanted republics in both Germany and Austria and it reckoned the world could stay at war until they were agreed to. The people of Europe could have their self determination provided that it coincided with America's determination. The world was stuck with Jefferson's Declaration of Independence complete with its attack on the Divine Right of Kings, constitutional or otherwise. It was, according to America's self-understanding, its turn to reconstruct the world in its image.

There is ample evidence that after the papal peace notes, as 1917 gave way to 1918 and the bloody western war continued, Wilson was prepared to help the republican cause along. With the backing of Russia's new government, anti-monarchist radicals in Germany calling themselves "Spartacists" were openly demanding an elected government to negotiate a peace treaty. Wilson apparently took the view that if he had to back the Spartacists for a while to topple the monarchy it didn't really matter. After all, Brest Litovsk had taken Russia out of war with Germany but into conflict with the Allies, and the Allies were confident that while the Bolshevik Government could be removed it was unlikely that the Spartacists could form a government in Germany. Europe would therefore have two brand new, elected, republican governments. That would take some of the steam out of working class revolutionary fervour and both countries would remain Capitalist with wonderful opportunities for US investors. If a couple more of Europe's antiquated monarchies were also to fall in the rush, so much the better.⁴⁰ So the public posturing and the most un-public diplomatic activity continued while each country's sons, husbands and fathers slogged it out with gas and guns in the trenches so that governments – not necessarily their own – could get into the strongest possible position before calling for an armistice.

RUSSIA'S MOMENT OF RECKONING

Meanwhile negotiations continued at Brest Litovsk with only Russia, Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey involved. The Bolsheviks still saw themselves as the Saviours of the exploited masses of Europe and that self-understanding was naturally reinforced by their Allied-enforced isolation. They were determined to get a peace without annexations by any of the major powers and with self-determination, through plebiscites, for peoples with either an ethnic or regional community of interest. They used various strategies to drag out the talks so that the Allies would have to become involved either by free and logical decision or by the force of internal revolution. But they underestimated the determination of the Allies' capitalists not to sit at a common table with the Bolsheviks and they over estimated their own capacity to either inspire or generate revolution by the working classes of the Allies. Russia had, after all, sought peace as the underdog from a position of national distress. Unless the Bolshevik government was prepared to break off the armistice and carry on the war, which would play into the hands of the capitalists and achieve nothing except the slaughter of a lot more of their loved ones for the people of Russia, there was a limit to its bargaining power.

By January 20 Lenin had concluded that it would be a mistake to base the tactics of the Russian Socialist Government at the peace talks on attempts to determine whether the European Socialist revolution, especially that in Germany, would take place within six months.⁴¹ He and his colleagues knew quite well that unless they could disentangle Russia from the Great War and concentrate on the civil war and Allied supported dissent at home their government would fall and there would be no power base from which the movement towards peoples' socialist government could progress in other countries. Even so, the negotiations dragged on, complicated by dissent over the future of the Ukraine, until the Central Powers lost patience, broke the armistice, and sent their armies rolling into Estonia on February 17. The move was designed to weaken the Bolshevik grip on the Ukraine as much as to knock out its Baltic army which included British-backed reactionaries.⁴²

The Allies continued their double talk. They had refused to sit down at a peace table with the Bolsheviks and they continued to stir up the civil war, but they continued their commercial dealings with them. On the basis that they were keeping the door open towards eventual normal relations with Russia, but mainly to encourage the Bolsheviks to keep Germany occupied on its eastern front, they set up a trading company to buy Russian commodities which might be useful to the Central Powers in the event of a separate peace. France also offered direct military and financial assistance to the Bolsheviks if they would continue the war – at the same time that it was financing and assisting reactionary interests in an effort to unseat them. The offer was refused.⁴³

The time of reckoning for the Bolsheviks had finally come. It was to be peace on Germany's terms at the point of a bayonet, with the loss of a lot of territory to Germany and with the principle of self determination ground into the dirt. The only alternative was a bloody war in which the peoples' revolution might not even survive to fight another day. Lenin was faced with deep division and swamped by great bitterness between factions within both the Russian Government and the Bolshevik Central Committee, and great bitterness towards the former Allies who were seen as largely responsible for Russia being in such a position. After a drawn out struggle to swing the party behind him he approved the harsh new German demands on March 3 and a peace treaty was ratified on March 8 1918.

ALLIED INTERVENTION ...

The Allies were not at all happy. Trotsky had warned them that if they forced Russia to make a separate peace they would have Germany's eastern armies turned against them in the west. Now it was free to move. Its former Allies promptly walked slipshod over Russia's neutrality, seized the port of Murmansk (well north of the Arctic Circle) in March, developed it as a base and forced a new eastern front on Russian soil from behind Petrograd where it could serve equally well for an assault against the Bolshevik government as for a front against Germany.

In addition to their military problem, the Allies saw that the Bolshevik government would be free from that point to begin reforms in Russia. It would, they expected, expropriate deposits of resources such as minerals, coal and oil and heavy industries to operate them in the name of the state. It would be able to offset personal income tax and finance welfare services through direct state income. The Socialist era would have arrived. But much more important was the threat to the profits of Western European industrialists who had rushed to prop up the monarchy and cash in on the tsar's open-door policies of the previous generation or two. If such policies were allowed to take root the whole system of merchant banking to finance capital investment would be disrupted as well. What a ghastly thought!

By the end of May Allied intervention had grown to include landings at Archangel and support for anti-Bolshevik forces in Siberia, and Mr. Balfour made an oblique reference in a memo to President Wilson of the "vital importance" of holding Murmansk "if we desire any possibility at all of entering Russia."⁴⁴ It appears that his commitment to the overthrow of the Bolshevik government was already formed but the American government did not accept the need or the justification for it. However some of its diplomatic staff had already let their enthusiasm get the better of them. The head of the American publicity office for Russia had already published forged documents in an effort to show that the Bolsheviks were German agents, to discredit them, and to justify a direct attack on the regime.

In President Wilson's view the French wanted "intervention" to salvage the heavy investment of some of its nationals; the Japanese wanted it to establish a foothold in Eastern Russia; and the British wanted it to extend their influence into the Middle East ahead of the German thrust via the Ukraine and Southern Russia.⁴⁵ However in June he bowed to Anglo-French pressure and accepted the principle of intervention, while Japan, at the invitation of the Allies, agreed to send a force via Vladivostok.⁴⁶ The effort to destroy the Bolshevik regime before it became properly established then snowballed. An Allied supported Czechoslovakian force occupied Vladivostok in June and within weeks it had been joined by British, US and Japanese units. Additional French and US forces landed at Murmansk in July.

... HAND IN HAND WITH THE CHURCH

The Allies should have been delighted with the support they were getting from the newly reorganized Russian Orthodox Church. Patriarch Tikhon issued a writ of excommunication against all who profaned the church's buildings or attacked Christians. However his thinly-disguised attack against the Bolsheviks backfired. Anyone who was likely to take either action was hardly likely to recognize his divine authority or to be concerned with the consequences of excommunication. On the other hand it demonstrated clearly that the church had little concern for the welfare and social development of its people. In that way it effectively alienated the mass of people to whom the church meant little but for whom Bolshevism spelt relief from oppression by the aristocracy, and it alienated those active Christians who associated the Gospel with the sort of programme the Bolsheviks were committed to. It therefore encouraged rather than curbed attacks on the church and it also provided the justification for the confiscation of all church property by the Bolshevik government. And its political intervention was, in all probability, pointless because those of its reactionary members who were determined to undermine the new government would have taken much the same action whether or not the excommunication decree had been issued.

With the Allies' intervention in Russia well under way, armistice talks between them and the Central Powers could be considered. By mid August the combined Allied "final offensive" was battering the German Western Front from one retreat to the next. The Austrian and German emperors met, agreed that the war could not be won and that (in view of the US capacity to put up to five million men into the field within a year or so) peace negotiations should be opened.⁴⁷ Three weeks later, on September 10, with massive carefully planned and coordinated propaganda and subversion programmes aimed at ethnic minorities and national groups⁴⁸ unleashed by the Allies on all fronts, Germany's Chief of Staff, Marshal Hindenberg advised Emperor Karl to make the best terms he could.⁴⁹ The Austrian emperor sent a peace note to the US president five days later, September 15, just as 4,500 US troops under British command landed at Archangel⁵⁰ and the Allies began their offensive against Bulgaria, using Greece as a springboard, which brought King Ferdinand's unconditional surrender on September 29 and his abdication five days later. Another one down!

Notes had been passing between Berlin, Vienna and Washington at a furious rate. The Johnny-come-lately who had piously stood aloof from Europe and its war, wanting nothing to do with it (except invest in it and sell munitions and oil to keep it going) was calling the tune. It would only make peace with a German government which represented the people. Therefore, on the day that Ferdinand surrendered and the Allies were left almost without opposition on the Eastern front, the German government, being left with no alternative, appointed Prince Max of Baden as the minister responsible to arrange a parliamentary regime to make peace. But the Allied forces could almost walk through the Balkans to Austria and only two days later the German army chiefs told Prince Max the parliamentary process would be far too slow. The morale of the troops had been destroyed and the army could not hold out much longer. It was imperative that he make peace without his parliamentary backing.⁵¹

Three days later, on October 4, the day that Ferdinand abdicated, both Germany and Austria asked for peace on the basis of Wilson's "Fourteen Points" which he had said a few months earlier were all that was required for peace. But gone were all his grand speeches about "peace without victory"; about peace without "a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished"; about peace without victory which would have to be "accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and (which) would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand."⁵² ⁵³ He had either changed his approach under the pressures brought to bear on him or he had based his earlier speeches on the philosophy of Lloyd George that "nobody was bound by a speech."⁵⁴ Whatever the reasons may have been he was going to stick to his "principles." The fate of the people in the trenches didn't matter. Neither did the suffering of the German and Austrian civilian populations. Their monarchies had to go whether the "Fourteen Points" said so or not. He wanted a spectacular morale boosting "final victory" which would establish the superiority of the Allies in their own eyes as well as everyone else's.

From that point the Allies threw everything they could lay their hands on at the German Western front, including vast quantities of mustard gas. At the same time a carefully orchestrated revolt against the Hapsburg monarchy was “set in motion” in Austria.⁵⁵ In the Turkish theatre the Allies, supported by the Arabs, achieved a breakthrough in Palestine in September and the Turkish cabinet formally addressed a request for an armistice to Wilson on October 14. While the Allies haggled over the details, the US and Prince Max’s German Government agreed, on October 23, to the “Fourteen Points” plus the Kaiser’s abdication, but Britain, Italy and France were not satisfied. Italy expected the Treaty of London to be recognized. France wanted better assurances of compensation from Germany. Britain feared the “freedom of the seas” clause and, it is reasonable to assume, felt threatened by the enforced dismantling of the German monarchy.⁵⁶

Then it became a battle of wills between Wilson and Wilhelm. On October 27 Wilhelm dismissed Ludendorff⁵⁷ and directed the German army to keep fighting, so Austria announced it would agree a separate peace. The Allies very promptly signed an armistice with the Hapsburg regime on October 31,⁵⁸ much to the annoyance of national groups which had been led to believe that their subversive support had earned them the right to represent Austria.⁵⁹ Turkey’s requests had actually been agreed to and an armistice signed the previous day, October 30, when the British forces were quite some distance south of Mosul, but Britain ignored the armistice and fought on for the treasure at Mosul which they occupied on November 3. By doing so they demonstrated that they were not there to defend the existing Anglo-Persian oil fields which were already being protected by another unit of the Indian Army. They were there to occupy Turkey’s oil provinces before Christian Germany could do so and to establish, by that occupation, a firm claim to a mandate, or possibly even to annexation, whenever the war should end.

The German navy mutinied at Kiel when the Kaiser ordered it to sea three days later and the army chiefs simply ignored him and went to their opposite number, General Foch, for an armistice after another three days.⁶¹

The end was very close. Next day, November 7, Munich was swept by an insurrection led by an elderly Jew named Kurt Eisner who had spent nine months in gaol for wartime strike activities. Bavaria woke next morning to find that it was a republic with Eisner firmly in command. In the next forty eight hours Reds appeared from behind every bush and from under every bed – or so it seemed to the establishment. Revolution swept the country and forty eight years of effort to unify peoples of German language, and most of their provincial governments, were swept away. Pre-arranged workers’ and soldiers’ councils took control everywhere.⁶² In the middle of it all the German High Command, acting on instructions issued by Woodrow Wilson, crossed the French lines for armistice talks and agreed to unconditional surrender. Next day, November 9, the moderate socialist and former saddle maker Friedrich Ebert was named as Chancellor, the Kaiser abdicated (taking refuge in Holland) and a republic was proclaimed.

Wilson had got his way. Two days later, November 11, the armistice was signed. But it was not only Germany which had been forced by such relentless pressure to accept Wilson's Fourteen Points and the establishment of a German republic. Britain, France and Italy also had to swallow the Wilson package, together with their pride, and it was neither American diplomacy nor concern for the people in the trenches which finally forced their hands. It was fear of a flow on of the workers' revolution.

But on that point the armistice brought complications of its own. Until then the Allies had publicly justified their activities in Russia and the extra slaughter which went with it on the grounds that they had to keep up the eastern front against Germany and encourage Russia to stay in the war. But when the campaign and the carnage continued after the German armistice their mask was stripped completely. They had to admit that it was a campaign to destroy the Bolshevik regime and the new propaganda flowed easily as an extension of the wartime campaign which everyone was accustomed to. The Allies had a responsibility to expose and destroy international Communism before it destroyed Christianity and, of course, the good Christian ethic on which every decent society was built. So even though Britain and its Allies had called on Judaism and Islam to help in their time of desperation, Christianity was still useful as well.

"Intervention" continued but it took on an atmosphere of unreality. One general staff officer described it in terms of an exercise in sanitation to stop the flood of infection from reaching Western Europe.⁶⁴ The New York Times carried reports of 'the Red Peril', 'the Bolshevik assault on civilization' and the Red menace to the world. But many people found the sudden change from ally to enemy with only a change of government rather hard to understand, especially as both Wilson and Lloyd George had picked up Lenin's call for self determination for national groups as if it had been their own. Even so, Rumanian, Greek and Estonian forces were thrown into the fray together with extra British and French. The world looked on bewildered as Russia's former allies continued to try to tear it apart while they sat around a table at Versailles to make a peace treaty with Germany or, according to the attitudes of some of the delegates, to exact vengeance. They were determined to pin responsibility for the war on Germany and to make Germany an international scapegoat for all that had happened.

FORGING THE PEACE – FOR SOME

The Peace Conference was supposedly between the Central Powers, the remaining Allies and the United States which was aligned with them but not formally one of them. When it formally opened on January 18, 1919, there was disappointment, amazement and anger in Germany, Austria, Turkey and Russia because the vanquished didn't get invitations to the party at which the victors were cutting up their territory. Russia, one of the original Entente partners, having made peace with Germany against its Allies' wishes, and now being under Bolshevik rule, was treated as worse than one of the ordinary vanquished. It was a pariah. There was not to be one single peace treaty to which all of the belligerents were signatories, but separate treaties relating to Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey. The first to be dealt with was Germany which the Allies had determined was to carry the blame for the entire war, and that treaty, to be known as The Treaty of Versailles, was to be linked to a Covenant to establish an international consultative and regulatory body known as The League of Nations.

An Anglo-American draft for the treaty was tabled on February 3.

It is an indication of naivety and wishful thinking on the part of the great power leaders that they thought a victors' club of 14 countries could draw up the constitution and method of operation for an international body which was to police their own actions as well as the actions of others who were not represented. They were, after all, the only ones who ever caused major wars. Minor players had theirs wars, but only between themselves – until major players saw an opportunity and intervened. There were some who looked to the proposal for a League of Nations as little more than a refinement of the pathetic, failed Concert of Europe, involving some nations in regions beyond Europe. Not all, but at least a few. But they, and notably Britain, still saw it as some sort of “European directorate responsible for maintaining the political system they had themselves dictated” giving the great powers “the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of the European states whenever attempts might be discerned to destroy or reform” their established system.⁶⁵ Others saw it as the start of a system of international justice in which every nation could be involved and through which the aspirations of people of all cultures, economic and legal systems could be recognized and accommodated, with means of settling disputes, ensuring security and enabling economic and social development in an environment of stability. With such a wide divergence of attitudes and expectations, getting an acceptable and workable constitution was going to be difficult right from the beginning of negotiations.

It was going to be especially difficult to rationalize two contradictory concepts of international and national organization. One was Wilson's American dream of freedom, self determination and no annexations with wanton greed camouflaged behind a screen of Utopian (or at least laissez-faire) free trade. The other was the Allies' want to perpetuate imperial prerogative, to take over the German colonies and to carve up between them the remaining areas of the Ottoman Empire, as they had schemed in secret to do before and during the war,⁶⁶ camouflaging the same wanton greed behind a screen of preferential trade areas, divine rights and sacred duties to civilize and to Christianize the rest of the world in the manner of the Holy Alliance (chapters 14 and 16). A compromise was found in the establishment of a system of mandates which has been described as “a stroke of genius, a solution that satisfied the demands both of Wilson (in principle) and the Allies (in reality).”⁶⁷ To give effect to the sacred duty of civilization to take care of the colonies and territories inhabited by peoples ‘not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world’ and who now had no ‘sovereign masters’ as a result of the war, such peoples (and their resources) were entrusted to the tutelage of “advanced nations who, by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it.”⁶⁸

In practice a mandate to govern became little more than authority to exploit, but the drafters sought to avoid that interpretation by saying: "The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions, and other similar circumstances." Then with a barely concealed reference to the areas of Asia Minor and the Middle East which were of such strategic and resource importance that the great powers had schemed and gone to war over them, they said: "Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory." In practice that condition attracted only lip service.

These communities were contrasted with two other classes. One was: "other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, (who) are at such a stage that the Mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals ... (and a host of other things) ... and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League." The other was: "territories such as South West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards ... in the interests of the indigenous people." (Emphasis added.) In these classes there was little difference between a mandate and annexation, and both provided virtually uninhibited opportunity for exploitation.⁶⁹

There were a number of other provisions in the covenant, bold and enlightened, such as control and reduction in armaments; an attempt to discourage "the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war (as they are) open to grave objections"; arbitration of disputes between countries; a permanent Court of International Justice; the organization of multinational forces if military intervention was required; the prohibition of secret treaties and the publication of all treaties, existing or new; international conventions to ensure fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children; prevention and control of disease; encouragement of voluntary national Red Cross organizations; and mandatory trade, financial and military sanctions against countries breaking the covenant.⁷⁰

And there were two other important provisions. One was an obligation to "respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all Members of the League." It was another case of 'power for those who have it and others need not try to achieve it.' Especially non-member countries.⁷¹ The other provided that: "The first meeting of the Assembly and the first meeting of the Council shall be summoned by the President of the United States of America."⁷² The trouble was about to start.

In parallel with the peace conference, but having no formal connection with it, subcommittee hearings were held by the US Senate Judiciary Committee, during February and March. They were clearly intended by America's power brokers to influence proceedings at the conference and their principal aim appears to have been to "picture Soviet Russia as a kind of bedlam inhabited by abject slaves completely at the mercy of an organization of homicidal maniacs whose purpose was to destroy all traces of civilization and carry the nation back to barbarism." In doing so, the hearings tended to distract attention from the proceedings involving Germany and the disclosure of all of the murky secret deals which had been done by the Allies and the US either for their own direct benefit or to disadvantage other countries, many of which were contradictory and certainly could never be honored. On February 12, during the early stages of the hearings, the New York Times carried a headline which read:

DESCRIBE HORRORS UNDER RED RULE. R.E. SIMONS AND W.W. WELSH TELL SENATORS OF BRUTALITIES OF BOLSHEVIKI – STRIP WOMEN IN STREETS – PEOPLE OF EVERY CLASS EXCEPT THE SCUM SUBJECTED TO VIOLENCE BY THE MOBS.

Apparently no story was too contrived, too bizarre, too grotesque, or too perverted to be printed and widely believed. They equaled stories in the British press of the Kaiser ordering the murder of babies in Belgium. Women were said to be 'nationalized' and babies were said to be eaten. It made little difference that the State Department denounced those stories as fraud. The perpetrators of the stories clearly intended the American public to believe that Russian Communists were criminal perverts.⁷³

Wilson knew that there was considerable resistance in the US to the country being tied to a system which required it to accept any responsibility for the course of events in Europe. Therefore after the proposed covenant, showing his heavy influence, was adopted as the first 26 articles of the Treaty of Versailles on February 14, he returned to America to press for its adoption by Congress. He spoke of "the union of wills in a common purpose" that there should be a world free of aggression and that "no nation will run the risk of attempting to resist." He justified the proposed structure, including provision for consultation, arbitration and authority for direct intervention by the League, indicating that its members represented two thirds of the world's people – 1.2 billion out of 1.8 billion – and he said there was a universal feeling that "the world cannot rest satisfied with merely official guidance" even though in the covenant "we are depending primarily and chiefly upon one great force, and this is the moral force of the public opinion of the world."

Wilson's punch line was: "(The League Covenant) is a definite guarantee against the things which have just come near to bringing the whole structure of civilization into ruin." He was wrong. Totally wrong. It could not possibly be such a guarantee. The covenant did not contain any provisions which recognized the basic causes of the Great War: national and corporate greed, and the want to exploit resources by resorting to claims of individual, corporate and national superiority in matters religious and racial. Sheer religious bigotry. In particular, the assumption of the superiority of all people and things Christian over all people and things non-

Christian. Some of those involved in the drafting process may have recognized those factors. They probably did. But it was a victors' club and a victors' covenant, so there was no way they could be written in. If they were not at least recognized and written into the covenant, how could it possibly be structured to expose, to outlaw or to prevent them? It could not. Those issues remained legitimate tools of adventure, at least in the victors' frame of reference, and therefore they were bound to be used again. It was inevitable. The world would just have to wait for the trouble in the triangle to be resolved.

Unfortunately, although Wilson knew more about the causes of the war than most people, and he was certainly trying to offset all colonial oppression, he had America's relationship with the other victors to consider and he aped the Allies, placing all the blame for the war on Germany. He said: "... the great power which has just been, happily, defeated put intolerable burdens and injustices upon the helpless people of some of the colonies which it annexed to itself; that its interest was rather their extermination than their development; that the desire was to possess their land for European purposes, and not to enjoy their confidence in order that mankind might be lifted in these places to the next higher level." In that sense his attitude mirrored the condescending and paternalistic 'sacred Christian obligation to civilize' the unbaptized.⁷⁴ Perhaps he was trying to corner the Allies into a change of heart. Perhaps he knew that corporate America wanted to keep pace with them or outstrip them. In either case he showed the same disregard for the history of his own country as the Allies showed for their conduct in their remaining colonies.

Facing mounting opposition to the proposal for a League of Nations, on March 4, Wilson declared the Covenant and the establishment of the League to be inseparable from the peace treaty, and returned to Paris to continue negotiations.

RUSSIAN REACTION: THE COMINTERN

What, then, was the American public to believe when the Bolshevik Government announced the establishment of the Comintern on the same day, March 4? The task of the new body (the Third Communist International) was not only to offset the Capitalist propaganda but to link and support radical Socialist groups and labour unions in every capitalist-controlled country in Europe with the declared aim of replacing their governments through revolution.

The Allied reaction was a mixture of shock and indignation. How dare they! It was completely acceptable and good Christian conduct – the Vatican said so – for Western European and US governments to incite civil war in Russia through subversive diplomatic activity; to finance a counter revolution; and then to "intervene" with their own armies. But for those atheistic Communists to declare a war of subversion and rebellion against all those good Christian countries was very nasty and had to be stopped. In fact it was enough to turn the champagne sour in a diplomat's mouth and the atmosphere at the peace conference turned distinctly sombre. Every country in Europe was already in severe difficulties. There were food shortages. There was chronic inflation aggravated by the war years; there had been strong pacifist resistance to the war in spite of everything the propagandists had produced; and there were heavy war debts which had to be repaid to the bankers – out of the ordinary working man's pay packet of course because they had received the benefit of being “saved” from those nasty subhuman beasts by their dear benevolent governments. As already noted, Germany had barely avoided a radical Socialist takeover at the time of the armistice negotiations.

So the Peace Conference dragged on. The Brest Litovsk negotiations between Russia and the Central Powers, which had only dragged on at all because of the Allied intervention, had run for 71 days. Versailles would stagger on with a very rough passage for a total of 161 days. This was due in part to the victors' treatment of the issue of war crimes. Already poisoned by the propaganda spewed forth during the war, the debate over war crimes at Versailles turned the whole issue into little more than a farce.

The possibility of prosecution of war criminals under international law was in fact only relatively new. Though the 1864 Geneva Convention setting up the Red Cross had regulated some aspects of warfare, it was not until the Convention was revised in 1906, and the related Hague Conventions were signed in 1899 and 1907, that reasonably specific agreement was reached on what constituted a war crime. The agreements sought to set standards for military conduct, making war a ‘professional’ matter conducted between regular armies and navies fighting according to mutually accepted rules of engagement. Much of the thinking behind the treaties was far from humanitarian, however. A prime motive in setting them up was to restrict the continental arms race, which was already beginning to bankrupt the Imperial powers. The agreements also sought to directly bolster imperial control. In setting out the rules of military engagement the Hague convention formally banned fighting by guerrilla groups, revolutionaries and other ‘unauthorized’ armies, thus removing any obligation by ‘regular’ troops to extend to them the same courtesies due to their ‘authorized’ counterparts. Savagery was legal, as long as it was directed at someone who wanted to change the established order. Not satisfied with measures directed at ‘unofficial’ forces, however, the United States in addition exempted anything it might choose to do in Central and South America and the Philippines.⁷⁵ The anti-colonial rhetoric of the Monroe Doctrine notwithstanding, US attitudes to countries in its neighbourhood were outdoing those of the European imperialists.

In ‘civilized’ Europe, however, such things were now ruled out of bounds, on paper, at least, and the steady stream of government propaganda during the war had inevitably made prosecuting war criminals into a public issue of the highest order. Amid loud popular demands to ‘hang the Kaiser’, the trial of the German Kaiser and his high command became key election issues in both Britain and the US. Adding weight to the demands was the fact that the issue of responsibility for war crimes was mixed up with the widespread conviction that the defeated Central Powers should be forced to pay heavy reparations. By 1919, millions of people had been killed or maimed by poison gas, attacks on civilian shipping, or mistreatment of prisoners. In addition, despite the diabolical wartime propaganda, a large number of genuine atrocities had also occurred – though, of course, only those committed by the Central Powers were admitted.

Defining and allocating responsibility for such acts was a prerequisite to determining how reparations should be handled.

WAR CRIMES, COVENANTS AND CONTRAVENTION

In response to the public outcry, national leaders at Versailles had made punishment of the defeated powers for war crimes and atrocities the top item on the Conference agenda. Its first formal act was to create a 'Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and the Enforcement of Penalties.' US Secretary of State Robert Lansing was named its Chairman. Far from supporting the idea of bringing war criminals to justice, however, Lansing was appalled by the notion. In Lansing's view, despite the exemptions the US had already claimed in the Americas and the Philippines, agreements such as the Hague and Geneva Conventions were already infringements of US sovereignty, and any new precedent set at Versailles could put the US national interest further at risk if it threatened to curtail its freedom of action in times of crisis. Any act in war was justified, he argued, if it was necessary to protect the national interest. More importantly, he also argued that punishing German leaders was undesirable for political reasons. Germany's political and economic system was already strained to the breaking point, and any further breakdown in authority had to be avoided to prevent the spread of Bolshevism. "We have seen the hideous consequences of Bolshevik rule in Russia," he wrote, "and we know that that it is spreading westward. The possibility of proletarian despotism over Central Europe is terrible to contemplate...We must look to the future even though we forget the immediate demands of justice."

Lansing faced strong opposition from European and other delegates on the War Crimes Commission. "Abundant evidence" had been collected, their resolution stated, of "outrages of every description committed at land, at sea and in the air, against the laws and customs of war and the laws of humanity" by the Central Powers. Thirty two specific crimes were cited. The fact that the Associated Powers had committed many similar crimes did not seem to matter to the Commission delegates, however. Germany and the Central powers, they contended, were solely responsible for initiation of the war and the criminal activities which flowed from it. The majority called for the Kaiser and other German leaders to be tried.

Germany, having been excluded from the Conference, publicly presented its own proposals in response. Stating its support for an independent commission to study the question of war guilt, it offered to submit cases of accused German criminals to an international court of neutral jurists if the Associated Powers would do the same. However, Germany also wanted to retain the power to retry Germans found guilty, and scepticism about the German proposals effectively squashed consideration of a similar French plan.

Despite Lansing's opposition, the Commission eventually resolved to press for trials. Its finding required that specific clauses be included in any peace treaty to force the defeated powers to turn over war crimes suspects and evidence to the courts of the victors. More significantly, however, in a remarkable innovation in international law, it also condemned enemy violations of what it called “laws of humanity” – actions so vile that, though they had not been specifically banned by the Hague and Geneva Conventions, they should be considered criminal under the most basic norms of human behaviour. In proposing such crimes the Commission had been motivated in particular by Turkish massacres and deportations of hundreds of thousands of Armenian civilians during what later became known as the Armenian genocide, in which the ruling Turkish junta had attempted the extermination of the country’s largest minority group (chapter 16).

Lansing totally opposed the resolution and with President Wilson’s support pushed for the removal of any reference to war crimes in the final treaty provisions. After protracted haggling, the leaders of the Big Four nations (the US, Britain, France and Italy) eventually agreed to a compromise. The final treaty retained the Commission’s proposals on trials by the victors’ courts but left out any reference to ‘crimes against humanity.’ It was the worst result possible, with serious consequences for the future of Europe. In the event, the Kaiser fled to Holland and gained asylum with the tacit cooperation of the British Foreign Office. Germany refused to hand over to the Associated Powers any of 901 Germans subsequently accused of war crimes and held their own farcical trials instead. Only 13 convictions were recorded, and none served their sentences. As a consequence, any serious consideration of the issue of war crimes and atrocities was effectively removed from the international agenda.⁷⁶ Self-interest had once again triumphed over morality. It was a lesson that did not go unnoticed in Germany.

But as the peace conference proceeded with the cloud of the War Crimes Commission hanging over it there was a movement towards international cooperation focused on one of the “fourteen points” which President Wilson had made in response to the appeal which Lenin made in January a year earlier. Wilson had proposed the formation of an association of nations to provide “mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.”⁷⁷ He had previously raised the idea informally through Colonel House in 1916 and several governments had expressed general support for it, provided they were not left at a disadvantage and provided that it was linked with German disarmament.⁷⁸

However the proposal looked rather pathetic to the non-Western world when, within a few months of publicly announcing it, Wilson had sent US troops to join the Allies in abusing the political independence and territorial integrity of a country which he had entered the war to support. No doubt that provided another stimulus for the massive anti-Bolshevik propaganda campaign. In any case the American people were probably too close to the proposal to see the contradiction in their actions, and when the peace conference opened the plan received good initial support in the US. A commission of the conference, with Wilson presiding, was set up to draft a covenant for a League of Nations which was to form an integral part of the total peace package. However very soon, when all the secret treaties and Allied wheeling and dealing behind America’s back were aired in public, the level of support for the proposal fell in the US. To some extent support for the plan was encouraged in the US, and in Europe as well, when the activities of the Comintern and the threat of subversive intervention by international revolutionaries received vigorous press publicity. Thus, after much soul searching by the world's senior statesmen, some of whom had serious misgivings about the nature of the document and its restrictive provisions, the covenant was eventually adopted by the peace conference on April 28 and became part of the treaty which was to be presented to Germany's representatives, fait accompli, within days.

Germany was obliged to accept the Covenant and the decisions of the League of Nations which would be set up under it but, along with Austria, Russia and Turkey, it was to be excluded from membership. The League was to be a winners' club. And a Christian winners' club at that. Of the thirty three countries which were to be founding members, all but four, (India, China, Japan and the Arab Hedjas which Britain had set up under its deal with the Sharif of Mecca), were Christian by linkage of one sort or another. Even India was ruled by a Christian monarch and China was still virtually a vassal of its four Christian Treaty Powers plus Japan in place of Germany. Of the additional thirteen neutral powers which were invited to join the club all but one, Persia, was Christian making an overall ratio of eight to one, (forty-one Christian powers to five non-Christian). Few people in the West gave that any thought at all. It was, according to the church's teaching, the natural order of things that Christians should dominate world affairs. All the rest didn't count. They had either been excluded or ignored, many because they were "minor" members of European Empires, or they had spurned the concept of the club. At least the League of Nations plan was a start, even if it was ill-considered.

However the conference didn't end there. Germany refused to sign and although only minor changes were made, debate continued over the consequences of key aspects of the effects of the victors' demands for massive reparations, the War Crimes Commission and the League of Nations, plus the implications of the establishment of the Comintern.

Quite quietly, as a result of a key meeting in Paris on May 19 a Council on Foreign Relations (C.F.R.) was set up in the US and branches of a Royal Institute of International Affairs were formed in the British dominions to link with a powerful but shadowy organization known as the Round Table. Subsequently the role and influence of the highly secretive C.F.R. (with regular high-level interchange of executive personnel between it and US government authorities), have been the centre of much speculation and in None Dare Call it Conspiracy Gary Allen set out to show that it was thereafter central to US political posturing and relations with Soviet Russia and international Communism.

Whether Allen's case holds or not, the collusion between Western governments and financiers at that time in response to the establishment of the Comintern was to have far-reaching consequences. Above all else it ran counter to the evolving new emphasis in the role of government, but the first visible effect came from scurrilous propaganda campaigns which added new dimensions to the complicated hate complexes of the West. It wasn't only ethnic groups and religious ideas which people had to hate but socio-economic ideas as well, and all three wings of the church – Roman, Orthodox and Reformed – were equally committed to the new hates, but for different reasons. Next the Western collusion involved military withdrawal from Russia, and the powers soon had to explain to their publics whether, if the West had not been defeated militarily (which was only partly true) it had decided that Communism wasn't such a menace after all. Was the continuation of another war, which people were even more reluctant to fight, feeding revolution at home? Or were there other benefits from coexistence with the iniquitous system? There was another run of face-saving propaganda concoctions which further complicated the mess. Why, then, this sudden development at a critical stage in the Versailles Peace Conference?

Wilson and his contemporaries were neither the first nor the last politicians to realize the hard truth about the relationship between warring governments and those who dominated the private loan markets from which wars and other major ventures had to be financed until the tax money flowed in. Napoleon, Bismarck, Disraeli, the popes and the tsars of the nineteenth century had all been very conscious of it, but the scale of the Great War had drawn in far more people and some complex relationships and it enabled a little known group to develop quite disturbing behind-the-scenes influence. It grew out of a vision of peace through benevolent financial dictatorship which is illustrated by an incident from the second period of religious wars in Germany. We are told that on one occasion when war between two German states appeared imminent the widow of the founder of the greatest of the financial dynasties, Gutle Rothschild, commented to a neighbour that the possibility of war was nonsense because her boys would not give them the money.⁷⁹

Another figure who visualized peace imposed through financial dictatorship was the protégé of Gutle's sons, Cecil John Rhodes, but his vision was of peace of the British colonial variety and, if his ruthless actions are any guide, his dictatorship would not have been very benevolent at all. In his first will, prepared in 1877 when he was 24 and before he had even achieved absolute control of South Africa's diamond industry or entered the Cape Parliament, Rhodes proposed the extension of British rule throughout the world by means of a Secret Society modeled on the Roman Catholic Jesuit order. Eleven years later, in a third will, he left everything to Lord Rothschild with instructions for the establishment of the Society. However Rhodes lived on in spite of the heart ailment which had prompted him to go to South Africa and in 1891 he financed the setting up of the core of his Secret Society, later known as "The Round Table", with Lord Alfred Milner in command. In his final will, prepared in 1899 when he was 46, Rhodes appointed Lord Rothschild's son-in-law, Lord Rosebury, as a trustee of his society in place of the head of the dynasty.⁸⁰

The Great War made it quite apparent that the style and thrust of the scheme which Rhodes had conceived would have to be modified but it seems that no decisive action had been taken up to the time of the Versailles Peace Conference. By virtue of its nature, a number of people involved in the Round Table were included in British and European negotiating teams at the conference and it was to them that President Wilson sent Colonel House to gain support for his League of Nations and his scheme of international cooperation. Little was said at the time, but it later became apparent that the decision to establish the Council on Foreign Relations influenced the way in which the conference closed and its consequences began to take effect within a few months.

GERMANY'S MEDICINE: THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES

After months of argument and opposition in Germany the German government still refused to sign the final treaty while the war crimes provisions remained in place. It was issued with an ultimatum on June 16 and acquiesced only after a threat on June 22 by M. Clemenceau, the French Prime Minister and president of the conference, that if it did not sign the treaty within seven days the Allies would do as they had done against Russia and set the armies rolling again. They were, of course, still rolling against Russia. Together with the Allies and the US as an Associated Power, Germany therefore signed the Treaty of Versailles, with the Covenant for a League of Nations in place, under duress, on June 28 and proceedings against it closed.

Germany was greatly humiliated by the treaty with its 440 articles, the Covenant of the League of Nations which it could not join but which it had to recognize, and the enforced renunciation of its monarchy. Its former colonies were to be administered under League mandates by the 'developed countries.' Those in China, the Pacific, and Africa were allocated to either Britain, France, or other Allied nations. There was no suggestion that they should have independence. The philosophy of the European Great Powers had not really changed since Pope Nicholas V issued Rominus Pontifex in 1454, giving his blessing to what ever land and people grabs the Christian powers cared to make – anywhere – in return for help with a crusade, and Alexander VI followed with another bull which provided the basis for Spain and Portugal to cut up Latin America under the Treaty of Tordesillas in 1494. The world simply existed for the Christian powers of Europe to divide up and enjoy as they wished.

On that basis, being the vanquished nation, Germany naturally had to forfeit significant homeland territory to its neighbours and the new national boundaries were to be determined at the whim of the conference. The population and territory of homeland Germany was reduced by about 10 percent. Of its western territories, Alsace and Lorraine were returned to France. The Saar Basin was placed under the supervision of the League of Nations until 1935 with its resource production to be shared between the victorious countries – except for all its coal which was allocated directly to France. Further north, three small areas were allocated to Belgium. Subject to a territory in the whole of the province, the northern section of Schleswig was to be returned to Denmark. In the east, Poland was re-constituted and given most of the former German West Prussia and Poznań (Posen). It was also given a "corridor" to the Baltic Sea which then separated East Prussia from the rest of Germany. Poland was also to get Upper Silesia, subject to a plebiscite. Danzig (Gdansk) was declared a free city. Although some of the adjustments were logical, in terms of reversion to earlier ethnic, communal and political alignments others were not, and the entire package carried the hallmarks of punitive action and retribution. In addition to the territorial 'concessions' which were imposed on it, Germany surrendered all rights in other foreign countries; faced virtual disarmament; massive reparations, the surrender of most of its merchant fleet, and the surrender of part of its fishing fleet. It had to accept the direction of its financial management and debt repayment at a level which was to be fixed at a conference a year later, and no consideration was given to the stability of world trade and currencies.

The treaty, overall, was an absolute shocker, but the Allies and the US gave little thought to the consequences. Self elevation at Germany's expense was their driving motive. The Treaty and the Covenant had already been ratified by Germany before Wilson arrived back in the US on July 8 to steer its ratification through Congress. But American opposition mounted. Influential politicians would not accept the obligation to prop up existing colonial powers and their boundaries. Neither would they agree to Japan replacing Germany as a colonial power in China; any decisions the US made under its Monroe Doctrine being subject to international arbitration; nor to any empire having more than one vote along side one vote for the US. If that objection was to be accepted by Britain, France and the other colonial powers it would have meant that if they wanted to retain their imperial authority, their dominions and colonies would have been deprived of votes in the League Assembly.⁸¹

On August 19, Wilson had a three hour luncheon meeting with the entire Senate Foreign Relations Committee and agreed to a series of their 'interpretative reservations.' He then undertook a massive personal campaign to swing the nation behind him. In 22 days from September 4 he made 40 major speeches in 29 cities before he collapsed from the strain while he was in Colorado and returned to Washington. He suffered a stroke a few days later and was ill for seven months. ⁸²While he was in the early stages of his campaign, on September 10 it came Austria's turn to sign its treaty. Although much less harsh than Germany's, it required the recognition of the independence of each of the countries which it had sought to embrace in its empire, and it was prohibited from entering into any national merger with Germany. On November 19, the US Senate rejected the Treaty of Versailles, but Wilson insisted that further efforts be made to find a compromise. A few days later, on November 27, Bulgaria signed its treaty.

A LEAGUE WITHOUT ITS LEADER

The Covenant of the League of Nations came into force on January 10, 1920, with 42 signatories, but on March 19, 'the Father of the League of Nations', President Woodrow Wilson, was forced to accept humiliating defeat when the Senate rejected a modified version of the Treaty of Versailles. The League would have to struggle on without America. It therefore convened a year later without the country whose president had launched the concept. Wilson had lobbied very hard to get a number of Europe's governments to accept the concept. Eventually 63 governments joined the League but due to withdrawals and expulsions its membership never passed its 1934 peak of 58 countries. Wilson also lobbied equally hard to get the support of major financiers and industrialists. He knew that any scheme for cooperation between governments was of little value unless there was an assurance of cooperation from, and between, the financiers and industrialists of the Western World. Their interests knew no international boundaries and it was they who had effective control of the world's exploitable resources. And it seems that changes to the Treaty of Versailles were not the only matters discussed when he lunched with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

During September, 1919, while Wilson was campaigning in favor of the League Covenant, the footprints of the Council on Foreign Relations began to appear as the forces of the Western Allies were withdrawn from Russia progressively, beginning with the British and French forces at Archangel. The propagandists of the Western powers walked a tightrope as those powers prepared to buy off, or counter, Bolshevik subversion in the west with a series of trade treaties.⁸³ They were helped in their hollow bid to show a humanitarian front by a severe drought across much of Russia in 1921 which encouraged Lenin to adopt both a more accommodating attitude towards the West and a revised economic policy which was promoted in the West as the sudden end of Marxist economic theory.

The Capitalist press was loath to admit that the problems which the Bolshevik government had inherited in Russia were far more acute than anything the Western European governments had helped to set up for themselves. The tsar's regime had conscripted eight million men from the work force into the army. The depressing effect on farm production in a country in which nearly 90 percent of the population worked on farms was serious. The drain on public funds to pay such an army which could not be clothed, fed, equipped or deployed effectively was even more serious. In the months before the revolution huge bodies of the supposed army were left to roam, often without supervision by commissioned officers, to commandeer accommodation and food as best they could. They added wanton destruction of the property of the aristocracy and general social disruption to the woes of the oppressed and dispirited population. To rehabilitate the war-torn country and to introduce a completely new economic philosophy at the same time (with an openly hostile civil service in league with an equally hostile national church) was a task of daunting proportions even if the government did not have to fight a foreign-backed civil war at the same time. It was a remarkable achievement that the new government had reached a position from which it could even negotiate with the West, let alone call the tune to some extent.

So on one hand the Central Powers, as subhuman as they had been for four years or more, suddenly became thorough gentlemen alongside Marxist Bolsheviks. A veritable flood of propaganda fantasies and evil suggestions painted the Moscow adventurers as not just doctrinaire, incapable and dictatorial but as a vile, contemptible abomination, unparalleled in world history and worthy only of a crusade.⁸⁴ If the capitalists and their friends in the church and the press had set out to design a campaign to bring cohesion to the Russian people and determination to its isolated government, they could hardly have done a better job. But on the other hand there were other important spin-offs from Capitalist fear of the Comintern.

During the next few years progress was made in a number of countries with the introduction of enlightened social and economic policies. The framework was designed for communities in which people cared and shared; in which the initiative of the eager beavers could be rewarded while the welfare of the weak or disadvantaged was assured; and in which the aspirations of everyone were recognized. The framework was also designed for systems of industrial negotiation and arbitration. Policies and reforms which had first been promoted by thinkers of the early years of the mechanical and industrial age were at last being introduced in some countries as a response to the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. Such policies had been fought for by Marx and his colleagues in the round of revolutions in 1848 but they had been consistently denied and vigorously opposed by political and industrial leaders. Clearly it was not necessary for the whole world to adopt Bolshevism for people worldwide to benefit from the challenge of Karl Marx. Bolshevism in Russia had generated enough fear of the loss of privilege among the Capitalists of the West for some benefits to flow immediately. They began to act on the policy of "give them a bit and they will stop barking for more."

Naturally, the progress was not uniform and such reforms had long been denied and opposed by the dominant wings of the church. While one aspect of Karl Marx' challenge was at last bearing fruit another one – the challenge to the doctrinal basis of the churches' views of themselves and their practices – was still lying on shell-shattered stony ground. The churches' responses to the Bolshevik Revolution were remarkably similar to their responses to the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars, but the Marxist challenge to both the church and the prevailing political and economic system had become much stronger and more direct, and so was the reaction.

The responsibility to determine the pattern of "community" had been thrust more firmly than ever before into the laps of national governments, and that responsibility involved the pattern of social structures and relationships; welfare arrangements; industrial relations, and the continuity of the supply of goods and services. At the same time the influence of the church in these matters had been proportionately reduced, except in those countries where the Vatican had scored concordats. There were virtually no limits to the directions in which governments could move. The age of "big government" had arrived, and with it organized demands and competition for the decisions and favours of government from community interest groups (or classes) on a scale which had not previously been possible. Those demands led very quickly to a reaction from the controllers of capital, financial services, production and commerce, and within a few years it became apparent that there was an alternative policy to feeding them 'if the dogs didn't stop barking.' Fascist dictatorship. As will be noted, Western Capitalists and the Vatican both soon found the systems of Pilsudski and Mussolini very attractive, and there were other people waiting in the wings to offer their services as well.

In the United States there was widespread irritation and frustration that the country had become entangled in the affairs of Europe and this was exploited by 'isolationists' who promoted a "fortress America" attitude in the hope that the country could withdraw politically, if not economically, from international affairs. The rejection of the League of Nations Covenant therefore marks the beginning of a phase of American foreign policy which has been characterized as "unilateral internationalism" and the rest of the world was left to flounder around as best it could. On the other hand, even if the United States would not participate in it when the chips were down, the League of Nations represented a starting point which future generations could build on or adapt to the world's needs – if they had the will and could develop the necessary cohesion.

The American self-understanding as the New Israel and successor to Christian Europe was compounded by a self-righteous conviction of their country's ability to treat all other nations justly and objectively, and a certainty that they could handle any and all problems alone. Generally content to "act like their Puritan forebears and lead by distant example instead of active commitment" the United States had the status of an observer at the League of Nations and toyed with disarmament.⁸⁵

But in contrast to the isolationists, and in common with the British government and the financiers themselves, President Wilson knew that the financiers were in a much more powerful position in relation to each of the European governments which had been involved in the war than ever before. Domestic national war debts were at unprecedented levels and in addition Britain had acted as something like a central banker to its allies. It had made loans totaling 586 million pounds Sterling to the Russian tsarist government; 434 million to France; 412 million to Italy; and other smaller loans taking the total to 1,825 million pounds Sterling.^{86 87 88} Of that, some 920 million pounds (a little more than half) had been raised in the United States with government backing. It was hardly surprising that when the time of reckoning came most of the countries which had accumulated such war debts, including Britain, were unable to meet their commitments and defaulted on the terms of their loans.

However: a step back for a moment. Hungary's wait for a treaty ended on June 4, 1920 but Turkey's humiliation was not formalized until the Treaty of Sevres was finalized on August 10, 1920, even though it was the first of the major Central Powers to sign an armistice, and the waterways and resources of its territory were some of the key trophies for which the other powers had engineered the war. It was not until July 2, 1921, that the US Congress finally officially ended its war by a joint house resolution and proceeded to ratify separate treaties with each of Germany, Austria and Hungary on October 18 that year.

When the peace conferences had been completed, when peace was supposed to have settled over the earth because the Great War had been 'the war to end all war', and before the footprints of the Council on Foreign Relations began to show, there were two major tasks ahead: completion of the redrawing of the map of Europe and West Asia, and the establishment of the League of Nations.

The mapping exercise took some time to complete after the formal peace conferences closed although the framework had been set at Versailles. While the redrawing can hardly be compared with that at the Berlin Conferences of 1884–85 which formalized the carving up of Africa, it was determined by the greed of the victors and it was almost as arbitrary and devastating as that at the Congress of Vienna after the Napoleonic Wars. Much lip service was given to the principles of self determination, common language and community of interest, but the political interests of the major players often ruled as arbitrary physical boundaries were fixed.

Turkey fared worst, as was to be expected, because the Christian European powers had long aimed to dismember the Muslim Ottoman Empire. The straits through the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles were internationalized; Eastern Thrace, (including the bitterly contested Gallipoli), the Aegean Islands (except for Rhodes), and Smyrna were ceded to Greece; Syria and Cilicia were allocated to France; Iraq to Britain; Palestine as a mandate and Arabia as a protectorate also went to Britain; Rhodes and the Dodecanese, to Italy; the coastal region from Adramyttium to Adalia became a 'sphere of influence' of Italy; the status of Cyprus and Egypt which Britain had annexed during the war, was amended and they were designated only as British 'spheres of influence'; a wedge of Eastern Anatolia, with a coastline along the Black Sea and borders with Russia and Iran, was declared to be an autonomous republic of Armenia, and a second autonomous area was nominated to its south, bordering Syria on the eastern banks of the Euphrates River, for the Kurds. The Sultan had no option. He had to accept the 'umpire's' decision. But a revolutionary Great National Assembly which had been established in Ankara four months earlier, rejected it and the scene was set for widespread chaos.

However in addition to the dismembering of what remained of the Turkish Ottoman Empire, further changes were made to territories which had been part of that empire until the Balkan wars which preceded the Great War. Without waiting for the Great Power victors to have their conference, and not wanting Serbian ambitions for a Greater Serbia to be thwarted by Austria again, immediately the Central Powers collapsed in November 1918 the Serbian monarchy moved to 'unite' Serbia, Montenegro and the territories of Slovenia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina and Vojvodina. The Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes was proclaimed on December 1, 1918. It was to be expected that tensions would be generated, or would surface again, with such a complex ethnic and religious mix. They did, and even before the US had signed its separate peace treaties with Austria, Germany and Hungary, a new constitution was introduced to provide for democratic government in a bid to offset deepening rivalry between the Serbs and the Croats.

The ordinary people of Europe had no reason to think that the fate of the Ottoman Empire was anything other than fair and reasonable. After all, their forebears had fought and died over some seven hundred years for such a result and the pope, Benedict XV, had said quite recently that that was as it should be. But those same people had other problems on their minds. They no longer accepted the word of governments as Gospel and they were restlessly demanding a better deal for having accepted enormous disruption and sacrifices.^{89 90} Britain had its Irish problem and Lloyd George's Reconstruction Ministry was regarded as a hollow political sham. In addition unemployment was set to rocket with the completion of demobilization of armed forces immediately the peace treaty was finalized, and the housing shortage would then become even more acute.^{91 92} The last thing Western Governments could afford was organized political subversion. Even conservative politicians were concerned at the trends in private enterprise towards speculation, resource and market manipulation, and production of high profit luxury goods as soon as controls were lifted. They were certainly not policies designed to avoid conflict with militant socialists.

‘SURVIVAL’: LOANS, REPARATIONS OR TRADE

Just as the Roman Catholic and Russian Orthodox Churches had seen the challenge of Communism as a battle for survival rather than as a call for a reassessment of their theology and practices, so Western capitalists saw it as a battle for continued supremacy rather than as a call to change their economic and social philosophies and practices. The governments of Europe were therefore caught in cross fire between a large number of workers holding very little guns on their left, and a small number of industrialists and financiers holding very big guns on their right. Unless they could silence both sides of the firing by juggling a negotiated peace, or unless they could silence one side or the other by direct action they were certain to be shot to ribbons. They couldn't juggle very well and they couldn't silence the guns on the right because they were dependent on them. They naturally turned their attention to the guns on the left.

The basic options open to Europe's governments were to satisfy the demands of the left or to suppress them. Such demands could not be fully met without provoking a massive barrage from the right, but absolute suppression could only be maintained for a short time. Less direct means were called for. In essence this meant accepting just so many of the demands of the left that would not provoke a barrage while introducing industrial legislation which would reduce the disruptive capacity of the left to below the point of revolution. And while the barrage of propaganda helped to conceal the fact, international trading policies were adapted to the new circumstances.

Britain and Italy both signed trade treaties with Russia in 1921 and trade delegations were exchanged between Russia and several countries of the Capitalist block.⁹³ In quick succession several Western bankers provided loans for the Bolshevik government. Standard Oil bought a fifty percent interest in the Nobel oil fields in the Caucasus, and the Chase National Bank (also dominated by Rockefeller interests) was instrumental in the formation of the American/Russia Chambers of Commerce.⁹⁴ Of all the justifications offered for the sudden change of heart by the West, two stand out. One was the need to reduce the probability of revolutions in Western Europe by buying a less belligerent attitude from the Russian-backed Comintern. The other was to help the Allies cut their losses from the fiasco of war loans and reparations which they were then trying to finalize.

After the tsarist regime had been toppled the Bolshevik government refused to recognize any war loan commitments the tsar had made. It insisted that reparations were an anachronism, that every government should bear its own costs and that financial arrangements should, in any case, be the subject of a conference of all parties. It also insisted that private individuals who had incurred losses as a result of the war should be compensated from a special fund raised by levies on each belligerent according to an agreed formula.⁹⁵ France, which had suffered the heaviest losses, consistently rejected the Russian stand which had no doubt helped to drive all the Allies away from a common table at Brest Litovsk and then fueled the “intervention” machine.

Then at Versailles the Allies had forced Germany to accept a clause under which reparations would be fixed by a Commission. It finally published its figure in April 1921: 6,600 million pounds Sterling.⁹⁶ The men of the Round Table had done their homework very thoroughly and the Allied governments became largely dependent on them to produce the money for Germany and then to recover it for the Allies. Germany's new government dug its toes in and said it simply couldn't pay so the Allies promptly occupied the industrial cities of Duisburg and Dusseldorf. That must have been their roundtable version of Lenin's all-parties conference. It encouraged Germany to find fifty million pounds Sterling plus a few years' supply of coal for France, which very successfully dislocated Britain's export coal industry.⁹⁷ However that little package was hardly enough to keep the banking wolves away from the doors of Europe's governments and so they were all very happy to trade with anyone – even Bolshevik Russia.

While those trade negotiations were proceeding so were Britain's efforts to talk its way out of its loan commitments and to persuade France, which had dug its toes in, to stop rattling more sabres in Germany's direction. In August 1922, being unable to recover either its loans from Russia or its share of reparations from Germany, the British government offered to waive, proportionately, all loans and reparations due to it except for the Stg. 920 million pounds which it had raised in America. It expected everyone else to make a similar remission. Having belatedly recognized the impact which the requirements of the peace treaty were having around the world, especially in Britain and Germany, it had finally come very close to Lenin's logic of four years earlier. But the rest couldn't see it, least of all France and the United States. The proposal lapsed and in a desperate bid to bring sanity back into European affairs Britain reluctantly accepted an enormous long-term burden through a refinancing scheme with the United States in December 1922.⁹⁸

The US was being driven by a passionate desire to develop unassailable political and economic superiority over Europe in line with its view of itself as the second chosen race. The attitudes and historic factors which had so far shaped the United States' view of itself and the world had come into sharp focus with the infamous eugenics debate.⁹⁹ France on the other hand was being driven by much the same reasoning and reactions which had embittered Bismarck against her when their roles in reparations negotiations had been reversed forty years earlier, but they were even more exaggerated. Prime Minister Poincare was determined to exact revenge even if it ruined Germany in the process.¹⁰⁰

In January 1923, within a few weeks of Britain's deal with the US and in defiance of her intense diplomatic efforts, France and Belgium occupied the balance of Germany's industrial Ruhr basin and proclaimed they were there to stay until every mark had been paid. By expelling 150,000 people and substituting French workers in industries they did not know; by imprisoning mine managers; by dismissing state and municipal officials; and by sheer mismanagement France rapidly ran down 80 percent of Germany's coal and steel industry and in consequence played a major part in the ruin of the balance of the nation's industry. The economy collapsed; reparations payments were temporarily resumed in valueless currency; old and new passions and hatreds were roused to unprecedented pitch. Political chaos reigned.

In August there was an abortive monarchist uprising in Bavaria. In October a French-supported separatist movement resulted in the proclamation of a Rhineland Republic which collapsed after only four months.¹⁰¹ Then in November all Germany learned a new household name. A former soldier and self-styled political agitator by the name of Adolf Hitler had taken advantage of the chaos to launch his version of the monarchist uprising in Bavaria. He almost took first prize, but he landed in gaol instead with plenty of time to write a book. Mein Kampf. Reason began to prevail in the international negotiations at last and France and Belgium began to withdraw their troops. However the die had been cast and that German household name was about to become a world household name.

THE CHURCH'S CHALLENGE: RENEWAL

Such was the background against which some of the people who had been at the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference, four years before the war, began to pick up the threads of Christian renewal and unity which had been ripped apart by the war and the deliberate, mischievous manipulation of interfaith relations to suit the needs of the warring powers.

Just how difficult it would be is best illustrated by the situation of the church in Germany. Germany was the seat of the Reformation. As such it had been torn asunder by wars associated with firstly the Reformation and secondly the Counter Reformation but it had come through it all with a very strong system of state-related churches. Each state church or Landeskirchen was controlled by the state and financed by it through a system of church taxes. Most of the states were ruled by a secular prince who was also the administrative head of his church. Because funds were no real problem each church had a system of foreign missions with missionaries placed widely around the world, but especially in its own colonies and those of Britain. The overall effect was to give the Lutheran Church a very dynamic presence around the world. In contrast to the highly competitive and usually very abrasive relationships between Roman Catholic and Protestant missions, relations between Germany's Lutheran missions and the Protestant missions of other European powers were generally very cordial.

Unfortunately the situation changed dramatically when World War I and the politicians intervened. German missionaries were immediately expelled from Britain's territories, many German nationals and even long term settlers were interned in countries such as Australia, and then its missionaries were expelled from the former German territories as well when these were forfeited to or occupied by the victors. When British missions sought to take advantage of the deportation of German missionaries relations between the churches deteriorated. Dr. John Mott was accused of being un-neutral in dealing with disputes between the churches in his position as Chairman of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh World Missionary Conference and in the allocation of funds gathered in Britain and the United States to maintain the mission fields.

Mott was indeed struggling with conflicts of interest. Prior to the US entering the war he was helping to raise funds for service to prisoners of war, but when the US entered the war he took the lead in organizing and raising millions of dollars for the War Work Council of American YMCAs which recruited hundreds of men and women to serve the Allied forces. At the request of President Woodrow Wilson he also headed a campaign which raised over two hundred million dollars for voluntary organizations engaged in war-connected work.¹⁰² However Bishop Oldham did much to restore some balance and used his influence to persuade the victorious Allies to exempt German mission properties from confiscation and to restore them to the German societies. Even so, it was ten years before reconciliation could be said to be effective.¹⁰³

In their home territories the German Protestant churches faced almost equal hurdles. When the Weimar Republic was established at the insistence of the Americans the princes who headed and controlled the churches were replaced by governments of republics and there was a partial separation of Church and State. The churches gained the right to determine their structures, to make appointments and to determine their creeds and doctrines as they wished, and the state still funded university theological faculties, but the people were equally freed of constraints. Some states continued to collect the taxes for the support of the churches, but the right for people to declare themselves not associated with a church was made more accessible and on doing so they were no longer required to pay the tax. There was a four or five year rush to dissociate, but then the situation stabilized. Chaplains were still provided for the army and religious education was retained in state schools, but no student was obliged to attend it and no teacher was obliged to teach it.

Each of the Landeskirchen found their own ways of adapting to the new circumstances and in 1922 more than twenty formed a federation, the German Evangelical Church Federation, through which they coordinated many functions while retaining their independence. However, a steady drift from the churches became apparent in several ways.

The first was the rush to dissociate, as comparison with the figure of about 12,000 in 1910 shows. In the years 1919–1922 it averaged about 260,000 persons per year, fell to 110,000 in 1923 and levelled out to 28,000 in 1925, rising again under the impact of the Depression to 59,000 in 1930. Another was the number of people who took communion. It fell by 11% between 1920 and 1930. [As a proportion of the population the fall was slightly greater: 14%] But the most revealing indicator was the drop in the number of people being confirmed. Over the same period, 1920 to 1930, it fell by 45%.¹⁰⁴ The number of communicants relates to the entire age range of the church. The number of people being confirmed relates essentially to the youth. They were staying away from the churches in droves. Disenchantment with the morality of the war – “the moral sag” – was painfully obvious with youth in revolt against all conventional restraints and many attracted to cults such as anthroposophy and nature mysticism, and Oriental faiths.¹⁰⁵ The rate of drift from the minority Roman Catholic Church was even greater than from the Protestant churches, by an estimated 16% for the period 1925–1930.

So the German church was in a state of disarray as ecumenical leaders began to pick up the threads of Christian renewal and unity which had been ripped apart by the war. Before the war a number of channels had been opened between churchmen of different denominations, mainly Protestant, but in some cases Catholic and Orthodox as well. A committee had been formed to continue the inter-church coordination which had been started in Edinburgh with Dr. Mott as chairman. Another, initiated by Bishop Brent of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States but chaired by Bishop Anderson of Chicago with a layman, Robert Gardiner, as secretary, began working towards an ecumenical conference on faith and order or, roughly speaking, “What is Christianity and what is it all about?” Concurrent moves by Peter Ainslie of the Disciples of Christ and leaders of the National Council of Congregational Churches indicated a ground swell of interest and plans were soon being made to enlist the support of the Roman Catholic, Orthodox and other Protestant churches for a World Conference on Faith and Order. The church was stirring. Here were the first substantial signs of the long overdue reassessment.¹⁰⁶

Planning for such a conference went ahead at a fast pace, largely financed by associates of the Episcopal Church, with 100,000 letters addressed to the clergy of all churches, and commissions of a number of churches met in New York on May 8, 1913. While many Catholic clergy showed personal support for the cause there had been no direct response from the Vatican and a letter in Latin was addressed formally to Cardinal Gasparri in the summer of 1914, presumably before the outbreak of war. The reply, dated December 18, 1914, when the war had already been in progress for four and a half months, indicated that the Pope was pleased with the project to examine “in a sincere spirit and without prejudice the essential form of the church.” He hoped that the conference, under the spell of the church’s native beauty, would mean that the mystical body of Christ would no longer be rent and torn, and that by harmony, cooperation and concord of wills, unity of faith and communion may at last prevail. But the final paragraph made it clear that because of its self-understanding there would be no change in the Vatican’s position. “Thanking you, then, that you have thought well to request the aid and support of the Roman Pontiff in expediting your worthy project, His Holiness expresses His earnest desire that the end may answer your expectation, and He asks the same of Christ Jesus with fervent prayers, all the more because, with the voice of Christ Himself sounding before and bidding Him, He knows that He Himself, as the one to whom all men have been given over to be fed, is the source and cause of the unity of the Church.”¹⁰⁷

Independently of those groups another ecumenical and openly pacifist group was forming in the United States under the name ‘The World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches.’ It planned an inaugural three-day conference to begin in Constance, Germany, on August 2 1914. When war erupted that day about the only conferring delegates could do was about how to get out of the country before the borders were closed.¹⁰⁸

A COURAGEOUS START

Under such circumstances it must have taken a lot of courage, tenacity and faith for people to keep contact across the borders of bigotry and then to openly seek ecumenical discussions immediately after the war. But the problem of disunity was so great that the spur to work towards unity was even greater. Archbishop Nathan Soderblom, Sweden, took the first step by prompting the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches to hold a conference in September-October 1919 at Oud Wassenaar in the neutral Netherlands. It attracted churchmen from several countries, including a German delegation, and by attracting a concession from each side it helped to allay some of the deep antagonism which had developed. The Germans conceded that the infringement of Belgian neutrality had been iniquitous, and the British, French and Italians affirmed that missions were supranational and that the freedom for all Christians to carry the Gospel to the world was essential to the church's message.¹⁰⁹

The Episcopal Commission had maintained as much momentum as it could by arranging a preparatory conference attended by fifteen churches in New York in January 1916, then as soon as hostilities ceased it arranged for a group of bishops to visit Europe. Their main meetings were to be with the Greek Orthodox, Russian Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches, culminating in a meeting with Pope Benedict XV in 1919. The Greek church responded positively and accepted their invitations to participate in the planned conference. In Halki they learned from a former head of the Russian church that it was then "sick in body, mind and soul" but that "when she gets well again she will doubtless be represented at the conference." Then in Rome the audience with Pope Benedict XV was cordial. The bishops invited the pope to be represented at a projected conference on Christian Unity¹¹⁰ and the pope responded with a promise of his prayerful interest. But then as the Protestant churchmen were politely ushered from the Vatican they were handed a memorandum. Unity, it reminded them, had been realized from the beginning through the Roman, Catholic and Apostolic Church. Those who wanted it had only to return to Rome.^{111 112} It wasn't quite like an 1868 invitation to Vatican I, but almost. Planning went ahead, encouraged by appeals a few months later (1920) from both the Ecumenical (Orthodox) Patriarchate of Constantinople and the Lambeth Conference of bishops of the Anglican Church (the Church of England) worldwide.

Constantinople was in the middle of Muslim territory and right at the point of the most terrifying campaign of the war where Allied troops, urged on with the worst of racist and religious propaganda, had suffered dreadful casualties (along with the Turks) as they tried to break Turkey's grip on the Bosphorus. It was therefore a very appropriate centre to launch an appeal for Christian unity. And being, in a sense, a bridge between Catholic and Protestant Christians, and also between Russia and its Western detractors, the Orthodox Church was the right body to call Christians to bury their differences and divisions so that they could give the world evidence of the Christian Gospel through unity.¹¹³

The Lambeth Conference appeal for reunion referred to historical causes of the visible division in the church because of which, it said, "The Faith cannot be adequately apprehended and the battle of the Kingdom cannot be worthily fought ...” It saw “the Holy Scriptures as the record of God’s revelation of Himself” (past tense again); it saw the Nicene Creed as “the sufficient statement of the Christian faith”; and it saw the hierarchical episcopate with bishops exercising the authority of the church as “the one means of providing (Christian) ministry.” They were sufficient basis on which Anglicans would be prepared to talk “reunion” with other churches as opposed to the concept of one communion being “absorbed” by another. While it was addressed to the leaders of Christian communities throughout the world it was clearly framed with Rome and Orthodox Churches in mind. Perhaps for that reason and perhaps because it gave the impression of a somewhat inflexible and dogmatic stand, it was greeted with less enthusiasm by many nonconformists than the open-ended call from the Ecumenical Patriarch. It also clung to the Europeanism which was being questioned in many quarters. After referring to the values of Eastern, Western and non-episcopal communions it said that with them “we are closely linked by many affinities, racial historical and spiritual.” Then came its vision of a church “gathering into its fellowship all who profess and call themselves Christian, within whose visible unity all the treasures of faith and order, bequeathed as a heritage by the past to the present, shall be possessed in common ...” A delegation from Constantinople attended the Lambeth Conference and two years later its synod “recognized” Anglican orders to clear the way for the possibility of union.^{114 115}

But at the same time some of the people who did not see the Nicene Creed as “the sufficient statement of the Christian faith” and the hierarchical episcopate with bishops exercising the authority of the church as “the one means of providing (Christian) ministry” were also organizing conferences. The Watchtower Society, under the leadership of its new president J.F. Rutherford, organized two conventions in the United States, the first in 1919 and the second in 1922. They saw the challenge of the Great War as to take up the Biblical call to go out and preach to the nations and they did so with great vigour. They believed that the salvation of man, in the generally understood sense, was secondary to the vindication of God as the rightful Sovereign. They produced a new magazine, The Golden Age, now known as Awake!, as a companion to the Watchtower, they undertook door to door distribution of their magazines with great dedication, and their influence within the United States was soon much wider than their numbers might suggest.

Three major ecumenical conferences eventually got under way in quick succession. The first, at Stockholm, Sweden, in August 1925, tackled important issues affecting the church’s involvement in the life of the community like race, education, capital and labour, social order, church and state, and war and peace. The second was the World Conference on Faith and Order at Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1927. A number of Germans attended both of those conferences and were prominent at the second. The third was the International Missionary Conference in Jerusalem in 1928 and it was then that reconciliation between the German churches and those of the Allied powers appeared complete.¹¹⁶

DEBATING THE BASIS OF BELIEF

During the intervening years the debate, both within and beyond the churches, touched a wide range of social and theological issues as well as the burning questions of church unity and reconciliation. It was vigorous, at times it was acrimonious, and it was often shallow and not well informed, but not always. One of those who were very well informed and who sought to steer the debate towards very basic issues was F. W. Buckler.

A very original although somewhat eccentric thinker, Francis William Buckler (1891–1960) was essentially a historian whose special interest changed progressively from Oriental studies to church history. Born and educated in England, he lectured at colleges in Madras and Allahabad, India, from 1913 to 1916 and then served as a lieutenant in the Indian Army Reserve for four years, being posted with units in Egypt and Palestine as well as India during the war. Back in England in 1922 he completed an MA and lectured until taking up a professorship in the graduate school of theology, Oberlin College, USA, in 1925. He incurred the scorn of British historians, business leaders and politicians in 1922 for his review of British attitudes and conduct at the time of the Indian Mutiny which favoured the Indian position just at the time that Britain was involved in delicate negotiations over the future of the country which was still the jewel in its colonial crown. However it is The Oriental Despot, a paper written in 1923 for the Fifth International Congress of Historical Studies in Brussels and used as the basis for a series of lectures at Oberlin in 1925–1926, and another read at Cleveland in November 1926, The Re-emergence of the Arian Controversy, which are of greater significance. Buckler's experience and fluency in the Persian language enabled him to view world affairs from an Oriental perspective. He consistently criticized Western historians for their eurocentrism and he sought to relocate the Gospels in their Asian setting.¹¹⁷

Buckler maintained that if Western Christians had approached the subject of oriental leaders and their beliefs with an open mind instead of denigrating them and attempting to gain or demonstrate a position of superiority over them, they would have gained insights into terms used in the Gospels and into Christ's teaching which could have changed the course of Christology, church doctrine and Christian theology. He said that from the time of Herodotus Western historians have pictured the Persian ruler as a tyrant in colours of the darkest cruelty and interpreted all acts of a religious significance in terms of servile flattery. "The Greeks saw in him, not only their hated 'tyrant' and 'despot,' but also their dreaded enemy, and if the character of Eastern Kingship has been misread, the fear of the Greeks is the beginning of the misunderstanding. They never understood the symbolism of the Eastern mind; they recorded the facts, often honestly enough, but almost invariably they drew the wrong conclusions. When Rome took over the heritage of Greece and Greek education she added her own hatred of the rex to the Greek prejudice against the Eastern tyrant. Even the idea of the Empire failed to render her Eastern counterpart either more intelligible or more palatable."¹¹⁸

Against that background Buckler discussed the functions of Eastern kingship, the relationships between the kings and their family members and subordinates, and the terms used to identify those relationships. The king stands for a system of rule of which he is the incarnation, incorporating into his own body, by means of certain symbolic acts, the persons of those who share his rule, Buckler said, "They are regarded as being parts of his body, membra corporis regis, and in their district or sphere of activity, they are the king himself – not servants of the king but 'friends' or members of the king, just as the eye is the man in the function of sight, and the ear in the realm of hearing."¹¹⁹ He then discussed the use of robes of honour, coins of the realm and sharing the meal of the king in the same manner before finally turning to each of the major parables and teachings of Jesus of Nazareth in turn. These, he said, provided conclusive proof of the nature of the organic relationship between the king and his agents – or the incorporation of the agents of the king within the king's person and body and "...it seems beyond doubt that it was from this system of kingship that (Jesus) drew His figures of speech to express the relations of God to Man."¹²⁰

Buckler maintained that the Sonship of the Father was another instance of the same idea which underlies that of the true heir, a term restricted to an only son and therefore the authoritative viceregent or deputy of his father, while the words 'all power is given unto me' have a meaning corresponding to that in the Mughal Empire. Now if Buckler's interpretation is applied to an important exchange between Jesus and his disciples in the Gospel of Matthew, the passage takes on a new meaning which, if it had been recognized by the early church, would have had far-reaching consequences for each of its self-understanding, its doctrine and its organization or establishment.

Jesus asked his disciples "Who do people say the Son of Man is?" And some said, "Some say he is John the Baptist, some Elijah, and others Jeremiah or one of the prophets." "But you," he said, "who do you say I am?" Then Simon Peter spoke up, "You are the Christ," he said "the Son of the living God." Jesus replied, "Simon son of Jonah, you are a happy man! Because it was not flesh and blood that revealed this to you but my Father in Heaven. So I now say to you: You are Peter and on this rock I will build my church." Matthew 16:13–18 [Jerusalem translation.]

The same applies to a passage in the Gospel of John which records an exchange between Jesus and a group of Jews who had intended to stone him.

The Jews fetched stones to stone him, so Jesus said to them, "I have done many good works for you to see, works from my Father; for which of these are you stoning me?" The Jews answered him, "We are not stoning you for doing a good work but for blasphemy: you are only a man and you claim to be God." Jesus answered: "Is it not written in your Law: I said you are gods? So the Law uses the word gods of those to whom the word of God was addressed, and scripture cannot be rejected. Yet you say to someone the Father has consecrated and sent into the world, "You are blaspheming," because he says, "I am the Son of God." If I am not doing my Father's work, there is no need to believe me; but if I am doing it, then even if you refuse to believe in me, at least believe in the work I do; then you will know for sure that the Father is in me and I am in the Father.” John 10:31–38 [Jerusalem translation.]

If Jesus and Simon Peter were both using the expression “son” in the understanding of Eastern Kingship, then it carries all of the authority which is implied in the term ‘Messiah’ but without the difficulties which arise because of the concept of incarnation. This is especially so in view of Jesus’ self-understanding, apparent from the words attributed to him, that he was ‘consecrated’ by God and sent into the world – not ‘begotten’ by God. In the same way, the word ‘rock’ in the expression ‘on this rock I shall build my church’ implies that Peter’s rock-solid understanding of his role and authority shall provide the basis for a church, and not Peter personally. Buckler saw the rigorous application of the Jewish Law as a rival kingship to that of Christ as “the true exponent or the command of God.” Jesus, he said, proclaimed war against this rival kingship and conferred authority to his ‘friends’ to ‘continue the fight’, or to uphold his teaching, which they vowed to do at the eucharist.

In Buckler’s analysis it follows that the atonement is automatic, resting on the succession of authority of man against the misrepresentation of God by ‘the Law.’ It also follows that “the divorce of the idea of sonship from its natural surroundings in Eastern kingship gave rise to the differences culminating in the Arian controversy by which an evil dilemma resulted. Either the Son had to be severed from the Father, as did the solution of Arius, or from man, as Athanasius’ atonement ultimately achieved. Whichever triumphed, the atonement was ‘undone.’ Athanasius, the champion of the lesser evil, triumphed, but he did not understand the nature of the Kingdom, or he would not have given a metaphysical solution where a political solution was necessary. The ‘wicked Arians’ were right in their contention: ‘Are we not all sons of god?’”¹²¹

It is hardly surprising that Buckler’s call for a review of the church’s most basic creeds was greeted with either an embarrassed silence or rejection, nor that he was even more outspoken in his Oberlin lectures three years later. In those lectures he dealt with “the wretched state of Semitic Christianity, in which the deification of the Virgin Mary had been accompanied by a revival of tantric ritual¹²²,” and then discussed the relationship between the Prophet Muhammad and the church. The work of the prophet, he said, was primarily to restore to its proper place the idea of the Kingdom of God, around which the whole of his teaching turns. He was driven to Semitic monotheism by the polytheism of the Greek and Semitic Christians and the heathens. Muhammad’s antagonism to the concept of the divine Sonship of Jesus was a protest against the association of a definite act with the Deity, and his protest against the Trinity was aimed at the widespread idea of a family deity: Father, Mother and Son. But, said Buckler, Muhammad did not grasp the full meaning of the cross and he therefore fell short of recognizing ‘the finality of Jesus.’ Both the church and the Prophet had revived the authority of the Law but the church did so in the name of Jesus who had died to shatter it.¹²³ The nearer the Western Christian comes to an understanding of the life, teaching and person of Jesus Christ, the closer he is brought to the Muslim because Jesus and Muhammad preached the Kingdom of God from the same ideas of kingship. Finally Buckler said that the place of Muhammad in Christianity is as a complement to Paul the Apostle. Paul delivered Christ's teaching from the bonds of Judaism at the cost of detaching it from its Semitic connections, while Muhammad delivered it from the Greeks and restored it to a non-Jewish, Semitic atmosphere.¹²⁴

Buckler took his bid to stimulate a reassessment of Christian creeds and doctrine even further in his address to the Cleveland Clericus in November 1926. Taking as his subject The Re-emergence of the Arian Controversy, he discussed the aims of the Council of Nicaea, the concepts of divinity and the terms in which they had been debated, and noted that the whole controversy had been overshadowed by imperial politics. The statements by Athanasius and Arius about the relationship between God and man, as revealed in Jesus Christ, were both intended to bridge the gulf caused by faulty ideas of God and the Creation, he said, but the gulf had been re-opened by the rise of Pharisaism under the name of Puritan Christianity since the Reformation, and redemption had been pushed into the area of debate about the final destiny of mankind. In turn the Social Gospel has been thrown into the gulf in an attempt to bridge it, but those who advocate it have abandoned the Christ in favour of the ethical teacher. Churches of the West have placed a heavy emphasis on ethical perfection and have forgotten that Jesus' sinlessness was a matter of policy and not nature. Christ's object was to redeem man from the bondage of the Law and his attack was two-fold: ridicule of the Law, which angered the Priests, the Scribes and the Pharisees; and satisfaction of the Law, which left his opponents with no loopholes by which they could attack him. A doctrine which makes sin the basis of human nature "misses the whole point of the teaching and life of Christ," Buckler said. Any doctrine of Christ's person which rests on such a basis widens the gulf between sinless and sinful so that it becomes impassable yet again, and atonement is reduced to the realm of social improvement, resting, once more, on man's efforts.

Buckler went on to say that both Arius and Athanasias failed to see that the function of God the Father was as eternal as the Father Himself, and they tried to express the dynamic and organic relation of function in the best terms available to them, without being able to see the limitations of concepts in Greek philosophy. Jesus stands as the embodiment of the essential unity of God and man and neither of the concepts of divinity and humanity which they fought over can be dismissed. The Great War had "shaken the old theology to the foundation" by forcing people to think about the dilemma that "either an omnipotent God who could permit such a catastrophe cannot be a loving Father, or a loving Father who cannot prevent such a social cataclysm cannot be an omnipotent God." The result of current church teaching, he said, was that the Kingdom of God is relegated to the realm of eschatology, man is severed from God, and Christ becomes unreal, being seen as either one with the Father or one with man, but not both. The Arian controversy, Buckler said, is therefore back in our midst and the ordinary man demands once more an explanation of his relationship with God. The confession of faith which Nicaea aimed to convey is still essential to the church but the process by which the council reached its decision is out of date and requires restatement.

But who was going to take up Buckler's challenge and lead the churches into such a restatement? Individually they were all still shell shocked and taking a very defensive position, searching for ways to recover their influence, except in the case of the Roman Catholic Church which was taking a very aggressive stand but with the same basic aim. And the young ecumenical bodies were not yet in strong enough positions to take such initiatives even if they were confident that it was the proper course to take.

RECONCILIATION: A STARTING POINT

A very progressive Swedish Lutheran leader, Archbishop Nathan Soederblom, was the driving force behind a stream of interest or commitment within the wider church which had become known as the Movement for International Friendship, Reconciliation, Life and Work, and the first of the three major conferences, at Stockholm in 1925. But he has been credited with more than that. It has been said that: "His efforts opened up to the churches new fields and new possibilities of common action; if there had been no Soederblom, there would have been no Stockholm 1925, if there had been no Stockholm 1925, the World Council of Churches, at least in its present form, would not exist."¹²⁵ Called a World Conference, the gathering attracted more than 600 delegates from 37 countries and from every major fragment of the church except, consistent with the pope's rebuff, the Roman Catholic Church. Its agenda was designed to relate the church to economic and industrial problems, social and moral problems, international relations, education, and cooperation between the separate and competing churches. Many initiatives were taken which led to the establishment of an International Christian Social Institute, a graduate school of ecumenical studies, a youth commission and an ecumenical press and information service. Plans were laid immediately for another conference in a decade or so on concrete issues of the church's Life and Work, but it did not see itself as the body to deal with issues of doctrine.¹²⁶

The deliberate decision had been taken that there would be no discussion of doctrine or interpretation of faith because "theological debate would mar the practical and realistic quality of the conference" and the 'theological cleavage' was so deep that "great care had to be taken not to offend the susceptibilities of the churches by precipitating confessional issues."¹²⁷ Those matters were to be left for the second of the three major conferences, that of the Faith and Order Movement, to tackle in two years time. While that was an eminently realistic decision it illustrates how deeply divided the church had become, the diversity of what its fragments each believed and taught, its systems of sacraments, discipline and authority, the abject failure of the Reformation, and how urgent was the need for theological reassessment to begin.

FAITH, ORDER ... AND BARTH ON ROMANS

When that World Conference on Faith and Order began at Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1927, it quickly became apparent how deep those divisions were. The atmosphere in which it met and its deliberations on the doctrinal basis of the church and its ministry were very much a product of the tensions which had been generated by the war and international crises. But the reaction to those crises and the thinking of one man, a professor of two obscure subjects (dogmatics and exegesis) at the University of Munster who was not even present at the conference was to have an influence quite out of proportion to his involvement in the institutional life of the church. Five years earlier, in 1922, while that professor was still a parish pastor of the Swiss Reformed Church, 36 years old, he had published the second edition of a commentary on Paul's Epistle to the Romans. That edition reached the book shops just at the time Buckler was having his confrontation with the British establishment. It fell "like a bomb on the playground of the theologians."¹²⁸ Karl Barth had arrived. The impact of his writing was so great that the role of the church and its self-understanding could not be discussed without his name and his ideas being mentioned. He had ushered in – or forced upon the church – the first concerted rethink of its role and its theology since the Reformation. His insistence that the church had to rethink its self-understanding could not be avoided.

Barth was born in Basel into a family with six ministers in four generations.¹²⁹ He was senior to Hitler by three years, and to Buckler by five years. The plight of working people in the Swiss Alps industrial village of Safenwil, to which he was sent as pastor in 1911 at the age of 25, influenced him greatly. When the infamous 93 German academics, including some of his theology teachers, signed a manifesto supporting Kaiser Wilhelm's approach to the Great War in August 1914 he began to question the church's prevailing theological liberalism. A few months later he joined the Social Democratic Party, saying that he could no longer "remain suspended in the clouds above the present evil world (and that) it had to be demonstrated here and now that faith in the Greatest does not exclude but rather includes ... work and suffering in the realm of the imperfect." Liberal theology, he said, had been weighed and found wanting and he wanted to relate the infinite contradiction of life for his people to the infinite message of the Bible.¹³⁰

The letters of the apostle Paul had often been interpreted in a restrictive and chauvinistic sense which had contributed to the development of serious tensions in Christian communities. They seemed to hold a special attraction for Barth who regarded Paul as a prophet speaking to all men in all ages and not simply as an apostle addressing his contemporaries as a product of their particular age and environment. On that basis he began a thorough study of 'Romans' in 1916. His commentary was ready for publication in August 1918, just as the German and Austrian Emperors were preparing their joint peace note to the Allies via the US, just as the Allies were embarking troops for their brutal push against both the Bolsheviks and the Central Powers, and just a few weeks before Hitler was afflicted by Allied gas shells and when, in his own words, "it required only a little imagination to hear the sound of the guns booming away in the north."¹³¹ When it was published the following year, in German only, while Germany's people struggled to find their identity, while the Allies bickered over their fate and while the Vatican politicked to upset plans for a Jewish state, the response from theologians on both sides of the Reformation curtain was swift.

Barth had stirred up a hornet's nest and compliments and condemnation flew thick and fast. Both shocked and encouraged by the response he promptly set about a revision, clarifying and tightening his thinking as much as possible. It was the second edition, published in 1922 just after he accepted a teaching post at the University of Gottingen, which rocked the European theological boat. The world was in such turmoil that politicians and church leaders wanted nice soothing religion which would settle frayed nerves, dampen down red revolutionary talk and put the church back onto its comforting and comfortable pillar of support for capitalism and country. But Barth appeared to be hell-bent on dismantling the church and on justifying revolution.

According to Barth the “concrete, visible powers” of Church and State, of Law and Society each claim to possess the answer to the question, “What shall we do?” They support their claims to be “not merely things in human life, but that order and direction which constitute the solution to the problem” with convincing arguments and demand recognition and obedience. “If we admit their authority”, he wrote, “we concede ... the principle of Legitimism (but if) we reject it, we are bound to accept the principle of Revolution.” He pointed out that we accept reactionary forces who appear to present little danger but we are anxious about revolutionary forces with their vital dangers. “For the honour of God we have to bring the revolutionary within the orbit of sacrifice; and his sacrifice is a sacrifice of quite peculiar dignity!”¹³² In the command to ‘overcome evil with good’ there is “no word of approval of the existing order, but there is endless disapproval of every enemy of it.” God “wishes to be recognized as He that overcometh the unrighteousness of the existing order”¹³³ The divine factor in both the existing order and the revolution that bursts forth against it is its capacity to bring the evil conduct of men under the judgement of God.¹³⁴

Barth wrote that when men undertake to substitute themselves for God, the problem of God, His mind and His judgement still remains, but they are rendered ineffective.¹³⁵ In the church the dead no-man’s-land between two opposing forces becomes visible and the hostility of men against God is brought to a head. All the piety which it encourages and all the knowledge, work and prayer by which it claims to be justified are, in Barth’s view, piled up to form a mighty obstacle on man’s side of the barrier which separates God and man. The church might be great if it adopted humility!¹³⁶ But as if that were not enough to stir a bit of opposition Barth wrote that it would be a sign of real perception if Protestants ceased celebrating the Reformation and learned seriously to regret it as a venture of Titanism.¹³⁷ The KRISIS of Protestantism comes from its refusal to dare to stand on the outermost edge of civilization and society, of world culture and world religion and to be the humble but decisive question mark and exclamation mark.¹³⁸ The Reformation had been a failure and the Reformed Churches had to think very carefully about their theology and their status. That part of Barth’s thinking should have pleased the Vatican.

But as if the Vatican didn’t have enough troubles trying to offset the Balfour Declaration, Barth wrote that Israel and the Jews had not been cast off. In a world lying in wickedness God sets the believer on his feet, reckons according to His standards, passes by all that is concrete, visible and outward, and judges in secret according to His justice.¹³⁹ In fact if the Jews have been “veritably entrusted with the oracles of God, their claim to peculiarity and to special attention is not necessarily presumptuous.”¹⁴⁰ Barth wrote that where human hope comes to an end God enters upon the scene. "He has waited in His wrath for the cry of the lonely man in Israel, only in order that He may declare His mercy to him and to all Israel." The church has been dethroned but it has been no more cast off than Israel and it has perhaps been justified.¹⁴¹ The "elect" do not come from any particular school of thought or group of men; they cannot be identified; they emerge only to be submerged; and in "these bearers of hope the Church can see only the unfathomable freedom of God, for the hope of the elect is centred upon His grace. In them we can learn only the lesson (that) Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for."¹⁴² Salvation, Barth wrote, "concerns all Israel, the whole church, every church" as the fulfillment of prophecy and as the messenger of Christ but, possibly, subject to divine demolition and confronted by an impassable barrier as it dares to tackle its boundless task.

Barth's criticism of the church was so vigorous that it was said that his whole 'ecclesiology' was nothing but a denial of the church and an out-and-out attack on the existing historical church.¹⁴³ Hardly surprising. "... the church seeks to live: it struggles to preserve its life by turning its back on its veritable tribulation, by engaging in a tenacious defence of its traditions and customs, by attempting to galvanize itself into life or by setting out to erect new religious societies. This unwillingness-to-die is the real tragedy of the church."¹⁴⁴

But perhaps the sharpest sting came in Barth's statement that the risen Lord "is no founder of a new religion." Christ "erects no new Church which may be compared or contrasted with other Churches." He is the masterkey which opens every door and the "imperative of the righteousness of God (and) He is the point from which the vast horizon of life is seen in true perspective."¹⁴⁵ Muhammad couldn't have put his own understanding of Jesus of Nazareth any better if he tried. With a Barth in Jerusalem at the time of the Apostles there may never have been a triangle – especially if he had a few more allies such as F. W. Buckler.

With the Vatican waving its heavy hand against the Bolsheviks, against the Jews and against governments which refused to recognize it, and with some nationalistic sections of the Protestant church also lobbying for closer church/state ties, it is no wonder that there was a "celebrated collision in 1923 between Barth and Professor Adolf von Harnack in which both had predicted a black future for theology if the other was left in command of the field."¹⁴⁶ Neither is it a wonder that Karl Barth's ideas had a strong influence on people like the young theological student Dietrich Bonhoeffer who was studying under Harnack at the time of the controversy,¹⁴⁷ as well as at the Lausanne Conference on Faith and Order.

Not only had Imperial Germany been devastated by the war, but the Monarchy was no more. The sheet anchor of belief for many people, that it was the mission of Imperial Germany to exercise world domination as an expression of divine will and as the hammer of God had been shattered, but many Germans, including theologians, were having great difficulty coming to terms with it. They appeared incapable of comprehending the defeat in the war and the post war crisis in Germany, and instead of seeing the nation's collapse as "a sign of the desertion or abandonment by God of His virtually chosen people (which should) lead to a fundamental reappraisal of their ideas”, they saw it as “the victory of the Godless over the Godly.” This led them to grasp the “stab in the back legend which allocated the blame for the defeat of November 1918, and subsequent revolution, to the machinations of ungodly forces within Germany such as political liberalism, social democracy and communism all of which ideologies had prominent Jewish advocates.”¹⁴⁸ Anti-Semitism was being given a help along.

As a result of having read Barth, the young Bonhoeffer, whose posthumous influence as a writer would later prove at least as great as his impact as a leader of the German resistance and the Ecumenical Movement, was greatly influenced by the Stockholm Conference on Life and Work in August 1925. Many other people in the steadily growing Ecumenical Movement were too, no doubt, but Bonhoeffer saw it in a new light. He identified the movement as belonging to the Body of Christ and in his subsequent doctoral dissertation he attributed to Jesus’ high priestly prayer for unity, John 17:23, “the force of a commandment to be implemented here and now.” That verse reads:

*With me in them and you in me, may they be so completely one that the world will realize that it was you who sent me and that I have loved them as much as you loved me.*¹⁴⁹

But in spite of the depth of the divide between the Vatican and the Reformed churches Barth’s influence extended well into the more liberal wings of the Roman Catholic Church. Within weeks of the Stockholm conference a sacerdotal association known as the Friends of Israel was set up within the framework of the Catholic Church by Fr. Anton Van Asseldonck. Its basic aims were said to be to encourage priests “to offer a daily prayer for the conversion of the Jews, to enlighten Catholics about Israel through their sermons and writings, with a view to combating hostile prejudices, and to show good will to Jews as well as a sincere apostolic zeal.” With the support of the Prefect of the Holy Congregation for Propaganda, Cardinal Van Rossum, it was formerly established on February 24, 1926, and by the end of 1927 its members included 19 cardinals, 278 archbishops and bishops, and some 3,000 priests. Having gathered such momentum it was widely seen as a demonstration that the true Catholic spirit was opposed to anti-Semitism.¹⁵⁰

However, as influential as the Stockholm Conference was, and in spite of the steadily growing confidence of the Ecumenical Movement, it appears that Barth’s influence really came to the fore at the Lausanne conference on Faith and Order, and that it was this which upset the reigning pope, Pius XI, more than either Stockholm or the third conference of the series, the International Missionary Council, which was planned for Jerusalem at Easter, April 1928. It was not just the fact of the conference being held which upset him. It was the circumstances of church-state relations in Italy at the time and the framework of the Vatican’s self-understanding which we shall now consider briefly.

ITALY AND THE VATICAN IN TURMOIL

Italy was drifting from one crisis to another, all of them involving church-state relations and Catholic lay participation in politics, and the pope was in the middle of crucial negotiations to get his temporal empire back. Such high powered talk of unity among Christians of non-Roman communions, of the church contributing to the crises of the world, and of an in-depth review of Christian doctrines and the purpose of ministry was seriously undermining his negotiating position. This was especially so because the chief negotiator for the Italian government was no ordinary politician. It was a former teacher turned journalist cum political organizer who had been arrested by the Austrian authorities and expelled from Trentino in 1909, in response to agitation by connections of the Vatican, because of his strong anticlerical attitudes.¹⁵¹ It was none other than Benito Mussolini who had come bouncing back in 1919 to lead the anticlerical, anticapitalist and antisocialist Fascists who wanted rule by a professional elite.

After the First World War the pope had lifted all restrictions on Italian Catholic involvement in politics and there had been swift polarization into factions which were based on attitudes to major social issues. The unifying influence of the Catholic Church, being dependent on single-mindedness of spiritual fellowship, was shattered. By 1922, with no major party able to hold the confidence of parliament for more than a few weeks, the minority Fascists were able to march on the palace and demand that their leader be given a chance to form a government. To King Victor Emmanuel III, faced with the task of getting Italy out of its cycle of recurring crises, anything was worth a try. He obligingly phoned Mussolini who was keeping out of sight in Milan and invited him to become prime minister.

Concerned to find the strongest prop to keep him in power once he was there, Mussolini courted the church. He permitted the use of the crucifix, which had long been banned, and the reintroduction of the catechism in elementary schools. In something of a volte-face he was billed as the newfound friend of the church. Conveniently putting more emphasis on his anti socialism than on his anticapitalism, he had soon wooed a large part of the right wing moderates and the autocratic clerico-fascists who found a leaning towards civil Fascism quite comfortable. By 1923–24 Mussolini had gained the firm support of the aristocrats of Lombard Catholic Finance, the Bank of Rome and the Catholic Trust newspaper chain.¹⁵² The church and Mussolini had almost hooked each other. A touch of patience, then one sharp tug on the line and the pope might get his state back.

The murder of a socialist deputy brought Italy's domestic crisis to near boiling in June 1924 and there was widespread but unfulfilled expectation that Victor Emmanuel III would dismiss Mussolini. The Catholic church found itself host to two bitterly opposed political movements. The Vicar of Christ as Bishop of Rome found his worldwide spiritual responsibilities getting rather confused with his domestic chores and his want to get his state back. He dropped his gloves, and let his mask slip a bit too, when he made a key statement in September 1924, a few weeks after the General Secretary of the Catholic Popular Party had proposed an alliance with the moderate Socialists as a means of deposing Mussolini. When politics and the altar draw near, said Pius XI, the pope has not only the right but the duty to give particular directives which Catholic souls have the right to ask for and the duty to follow. There were dangerously immature ideas among us, he said, that any purpose of public benefit is enough to justify cooperation in evil. He indicated that collaboration with Socialists in other countries, once they were in power, was acceptable but collaboration with Italy's Socialists which might help them to gain power was different. He then held the chopper aloft saying it pained him to see good Catholics taking action which would separate them from the faith. It was proper and necessary that they should put the great principles of faith and religion at the base of their every activity, even political.¹⁵³ What he was really saying was that Lombard Finance, the Bank of Rome, the shipping line and the Catholic Trust system were not to be placed in jeopardy.

The pope had assumed personal direction of the political life of Italian Catholicism; all that remained was to pronounce the last rites over the Catholic Popular Party because it had been dealt a mortal body blow – and Mussolini had found his prop.¹⁵⁴ On January 3, 1925 he, too, dropped his mask, admitted that he had been responsible for all that had happened during the previous months, and declared that henceforth the Fascists would rule dictatorially. The grassroots church was thrown into confusion. Those who were game moved to counter Mussolini's declaration but it was too late. The great repression of opposition parties, press and labour organizations began immediately and it didn't take long to either silence or dissolve them all.¹⁵⁵

For the moment national feeling was running strongly against him but Mussolini had brute force on his side and there was plenty of time. He could afford to wait and he still had his trump card up his sleeve. He waited a discreet time and then negotiations were quietly opened, in 1926, through an intermediary, to resolve the Roman Question. They dragged on for three years but, as the public gradually got wind of what was happening, opposition increased. As a result there was anything but unity in the Italian church when 394 delegates – only nine of them women – gathered for the opening of the three-week Faith and Order Conference just across the border at Lausanne on August 3, 1927, without the Italian church involved. The pope had harshly suppressed the wish of many clergy to be involved, and while it was still in progress there was strong agitation for Rome to be represented at the next major ecumenical conference, that of the International Missionary Council, which was being planned for Jerusalem at Easter the following year.

Lausanne was the first international conference which had ever been convened within the non-Catholic churches specifically to consider matters of faith and order. It therefore provided the first post-war opportunity for theological heavy weights from the teaching institutions of Orthodox and Reformed churches to compare notes on their particular interpretations of the Bible face to face and without the immediate tensions of interfaith wars and international crises.¹⁵⁶ But there were other reasons for tension. One was the circumstances of church/state relations in Europe. Another was the dynamic – or devastating – challenge of Barth's Romans. As a result, with the conference working in seven sections,¹⁵⁷ each with a major aspect of faith to consider, the conference had periods of high drama in which the differences in doctrinal approach came to the surface and threatened to undermine progress towards the establishment of an international ecumenical body.

When the section dealing with the unity of Christendom proposed that issues of practical application of faith (dealt with by the Life and Work Movement) would provide a basis for collaboration within an organization like the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, the delegates of Anglo-Catholic outlook objected. They did not want worldly issues emphasized at the expense of unity in faith, liturgy and systems of authority in the church.

The section dealing with a common confession of faith was similarly divided and the Nicene Creed was, naturally, at the centre of the controversy. Some theologians, notably the Orthodox, demanded that the conference declare the Trinitarian statement, in its existing form, to be basic to the life of the church. Others pressed the view that "the scriptures" were a sufficient basis for Christian life and worship without creeds, and one Congregationalist said the church "should clear all that old lumber out of the way." But what did the term 'the Scriptures' mean? The Bible on its own, or linked with 'tradition' and, in the common German view, an assortment of developed statements of confession? When each of several denominational (or confessional) groups stated their contrasting positions it did not help and it was apparent that there was deep division between the Reformed churches and the Orthodox churches. After Archbishop Germanos read a declaration on behalf of the Orthodox churches that the bases of the proposed reports were "inconsistent with the principles of the Orthodox Church" and that they would refrain from voting on all sections except the one dealing with the Gospel as the church's message to the world, he returned to his seat with tears pouring down his face.¹⁵⁸

The divisions were so deep that attempts to arrange either a united service of Holy Communion or a conference celebration failed, but the conference was able to agree on a call to Christian unity and a Continuation Committee was set up to plan for further consultations and conferences. In one sense the Vatican was delighted to see its competitors in the separated churches falling about arguing over every issue, but their divisions also brought to the surface the divisions within the Roman Catholic Church and some of its clergy were more eager than ever to see the debates continue and to be part of them. Thus, with his negotiations at a delicate stage the pope demanded that the boat rocking stop.

MORTALIUM ANIMOS: AGAINST THE TIDE

On January 6, 1928, Pius XI issued the encyclical letter known as Mortalium Animos. In it he condemned wholesale the conferences and assemblies through which the "pan-Christians" were trying to bring unity among Christians. This was, he said, based on false religious indifferentism which held that any religion at all was more or less good and praiseworthy because they all revealed and explained the significance of the native, inborn instinct which turns people towards God and makes them acknowledge His sovereignty.^{159 160} He forbade Catholics to have anything to do with the movement.^{161 162 163} He then repeated the old routine of justifying Rome through Peter but added a couple of fanciful new claims. The Roman Catholic Church was a perfect society. It remained always identical to itself, visibly one, and it was the guardian of the immutable deposit of revelation. Within it the Roman Pontiff and the Bishops in communion with him were responsible to teach authoritatively and infallibly that deposit of faith. The union of Christians can only be fostered by promoting the return of the dissidents to the one true Church of Christ which they had abandoned and which Christ had destined for the common salvation of men. The mystical Spouse of Christ had never been contaminated (nor would she ever be) and no one remains within it unless he acknowledges and accepts with obedience the authority and power of Peter's legitimate successors. Finally the dissidents were again invited to return, provided that they did so without any expectation that the root and matrix of the church (which was also the pillar and ground of truth) would sacrifice the integrity of faith, and provided also that they intended to submit to her authority and government.¹⁶⁴

It is difficult to read that encyclical without a sickening feeling that Pius XI was anticipating the successful growth of totalitarian states complete with a return to the good old days of the Inquisition. But at the same time the real motives for setting up a series of special centres to foster relations with the Eastern Church and "to provide opportunities for evaluation and exchange of mutual information" in an atmosphere of dialogue which were established during that period becomes clear. Not only might it draw the Orthodox Churches back to Rome, it might undermine the strength of the Reformed wing by drawing the Orthodox Churches out of the international Christian unity discussions.^{165 166}

The overall effect of that encyclical was to entrench even more deeply the bigotry in inter-denominational attitudes which had risen and fallen since Vatican I and made it virtually impossible for the European powers to avoid a repeat performance of the psychological warfare of the First World War in the event of another war. The possibility of such a war was already being discussed around the world. Because of that it must rank among the most important statements to come from the Christian Church between the two world wars. Certainly it was the most destructive. The pope's assumption of the direction of Italian Catholic political life had been of immense importance and just a year later he would crystallize – or mummify – the church's view of itself and his view of the papacy when he announced the Lateran Treaty. One thing is certain. Without Mortalium Animos the world's affairs could possibly have taken a different course during the next generation.

Then on March 25, 1928, less than three months later, as Protestant leaders prepared to meet in Jerusalem for the International Missionary Conference the Holy Office issued a decree suppressing the Friends of Israel Association. The decree required, and had, papal approval. The world was expected to believe that the Catholic Church was so consistent in its opposition to anti-Semitism that it did not need a priestly association especially to promote or to demonstrate that position. The Catholic Church, according to the decree, had always been accustomed to pray for the Jewish people "which was the depository of divine promises up until Jesus Christ" in spite of "and indeed precisely because of" its continual blindness. It had protected them with charity against "unjust persecutions" – which implies that all that it had done for about 1,600 years had been "just" – and "because it disapproves of all hatreds and animosities among people, it condemns in the highest degree hatred against the people formerly chosen by God, [implying now 'rejected'] the hatred that is commonly designated today under the name of 'anti-Semitism.'" ¹⁶⁷

Priests should simply stress, on the basis of scripture, "a prerogative of Divine Love toward the people of Israel; the sublime sign of this love constituted by the incarnation of Christ ...; the permanence of this love, and even its increase because of ... Christ's death; and ... the proof of this love in the conduct of the Apostles." One should be honest, show justice towards Jews and never doubt God's grace, but it might not be legitimate to conceal the role played by Israel with regard to Christ. No one, he said, "wants to make 'deicide' a sort of 'original sin' borne by every Jew today, but one cannot remain silent about Israel's unfaithfulness to its mission" or its participation in Christ's death, or the Divine punishment of the destruction of Jerusalem, or the requirement to work for 'conversion' of the Jews. It was an error, excessive and inexact "to praise Judaism so much that one seems to attribute to the Jewish race today a place of honour within contemporary Christianity, a place reserved for it and remaining vacant until its arrival." And "one should not strengthen among Jews, who are already so fiercely nationalistic, an anti-Catholic mentality whose omissions and deficiencies were admirably pointed out by St. Paul." ¹⁶⁸

Thus the Friends of Israel Association was suppressed with the full authority of Pius XI because it was trying to realign or redirect Catholic teaching on the Jewish Question in the manner of Karl Barth. It had challenged, within the Catholic Church itself, "an interpretation of tradition, a manner of speaking and prejudices that could only add to the scorn and hatred for Jews." ¹⁶⁹ That interpretation had arisen within the church. It had been perpetuated and reinforced within the church, and the church now wanted to continue to use it for its own ends. But it had so effectively permeated the entire amorphous Christian gel of the Western world that it was impossible to either exorcize it or see it apart from the church, and it had now become a fundamental aspect of Hitler's parody of the church, Mein Kampf, which was a major component of the trigger for theological reassessment. In a more immediate sense the suppression of the Friends of Israel was a strong rebuff to the thousands of clergy who had become associated with it so quickly; a direct rejection of the challenge of Karl Barth and any suggestion that the church should reassess its self-understanding or its theology; an affront to the Ecumenical Movement; and real encouragement to those, including Hitler, who wanted to share the anti-Semitic limelight with the church.

THE MISSIONARY COUNCIL IN JERUSALEM

It was therefore a somewhat dispirited band of about 230 delegates, equally split between "old churches" of the European mould and "younger churches" of the Afro-Asian mould, which made its way up the Mount of Olives at Easter 1928. They made up the first augmented meeting of the International Missionary Council which had been formed in 1921 as a follow-up to the 1910 Edinburgh Conference.¹⁷⁰ No Germans had attended the 1921 meeting and there were none among the delegates at Jerusalem either. The German churches had decided that as long as they were excluded from the territories of the former enemies of the Fatherland they could not take part in international missionary conferences.¹⁷¹ The delegates in Jerusalem were therefore faced with division in their own ranks about who ought to have been at the meeting, about how the Gospel should be interpreted and therefore about the basic thrust of mission work. They had to recognize that the moral prestige and superiority of the Christian West had been exposed as a pernicious ideological myth by the First World War. This meant they no longer enjoyed captive audiences. They faced African and Asian societies which were showing vital revivals and turning their backs on the amorphous gel of Christian culture. These societies were struggling to find human fulfillment and salvation through profound strengths and values in their pre-Messianic faiths (which were being brought to light by a new kind of scrutiny) and they turned against the colonial legacy of racial domination, making rebellious demands for self-determination born out of sheer frustration.¹⁷²

The delegates were also shaken by the state of affairs in both Russia and Germany which had been humiliated, swamped with bitterness at the terms of the so-called peace settlement and which were determined to have their national revenge. Germany was about to have a national election and the fanatical anti-Semitic leader of one of its minor parties was running around saying that he would conclude the work which Christ had started but could not finish. That was the frank and disarming manner in which Hitler had already announced his personal messianic mission in life: the completion of the Christian Church's battle against the Jews whom he agreed were the enemy of the world.¹⁷³ Now they were gathered for a meeting in the city which was the focal point of both their own faith and that of the Jews. It was in an area over which Muslim Arabs had been promised sovereignty but, in view of Britain's contradictory promise, many of Europe's Jews hoped to make it the capital of their homeland in which they could escape from the clutches of the church and its allies like Hitler. In addition, as a result of decisions which Britain had recently taken as mandatory power the Jews were strengthening their political and religious organization.

As early as December 1918, only a year after the announcement of the Balfour Declaration, the Jews of Palestine had agreed among themselves on the structure and functions of an Assembly of Delegates (Asefat Hanivharim) and a National Council (Va'ad Leumi) as the basis of their domestic organization. In 1921 Britain recognized these as the Assembly of Israel (Knesset Israel) for purposes of relations with the mandatory authorities. Then in 1926 it granted limited taxing powers and legal status to the religious institutions of each of the three communities of faith as it struggled to negate the conflicts of interest which it had triggered with the Balfour Declaration. In a related move which subsequently caused considerable difficulties for the Jewish community and which must have displeased the Vatican greatly, both the Chief Rabbinate and the Rabbinical Council were recognized as part of Knesset Israel.

The Zionist Organization had sought to keep political and religious authority quite separate, and the Ultra-Orthodox groups declined to recognize Knesset Israel or any political organization unless it acknowledged that it derived its authority solely from Halakhah, the Orthodox religious law. Their position was remarkably similar to that which the Vatican had sought to impose throughout Europe over a very long period, and the mainstream Muslim attitude towards the relationship between religion and state. In the circumstances, the Zionist Organization had little option but to accept the religious institutions as an integral part of Knesset Israel. However in an effort to prevent the possibility of Ultra-Orthodox (or other) groups rejecting the authority of Knesset Israel and seeking to secede, it rejected any separation of religion and politics. It declared that "religion was not a private matter for the individual conscience but an essential component in the structure of leadership within the new Jewish society, and ... a source of Zionist legitimacy." In using that expression it had sought to turn to its advantage the Orthodox argument that there was no political legitimacy without acceptance of Halakhah. But its move did not immediately succeed. Ultra-Orthodox groups, representing about thirteen thousand people, declared themselves to be outside Knesset Israel and sought recognition from Britain as a separate and parallel political community.¹⁷⁴

At the same time that these institutional developments were taking place within the growing Jewish community, political groups were being formed on both sides of the ethnic divide and volunteer Jewish defence groups were also being set up. These moves reflected the underlying tension between the Jewish and non-Jewish communities and the fears which each of them harboured. On one hand, fear that anti-Semitism could spill over from Europe and, on the other hand, concern at the intrusive nature of Jewish settlement and fear that collaboration between the Zionists and the British government might lead to non-Jews being swamped. The Muslim Christian Association (MCA) which was formed by leading members of those communities about the same time as the two units of the Assembly of Israel, became the mainstay of the Palestinian nationalist movement and branches were organized in several towns by 1919. It worked in parallel with two other groups, the Literary Society and the Arab Club, which were exclusively Muslim, but in addition there were a series of church-linked groups and "secret societies" some of which were somewhat less subtle in their attempts to counter the growth of Zionist influence. Together, all of these groups were represented at a series of All-Palestine Congresses, the first of which was organized by the MCA in 1919. A Palestine Arab Executive was appointed at successive congresses to serve as the peak body until the following congress, and elections became structured so that as the organization grew there were Muslim and Christian representatives from each district and from each religious institution. In addition a Supreme Muslim Council, led by the Mufti of Jerusalem, was established in 1922 to have responsibility for matters of specific concern to the Muslim community.

As if the complex inter-faith environment into which the delegates to the International Missionary Council stumbled was not enough to guarantee tensions within the group and to dampen its capacity to develop an effective program, the Council was faced with bitter antagonism from the Vatican and the Catholic Community as a consequence of Mortalium Animos and the decree suppressing the Friends of Israel. This was a strange twist to the prayerful interest which they had been promised. Perhaps it was a spur towards the fundamental theological rethink which was becoming ever more urgent. In any case the Council did produce a document with some vital new thrusts in line with the functions which had been adopted in 1921. These included: to help unite Christian public opinion in support of freedom of conscience and religion and of missionary liberty, and to help unite the Christian forces of the world in seeking justice in international and inter-racial relations.¹⁷⁵ It repudiated attempts by trade and government to openly or covertly use missionary programmes for ulterior purposes. Any conscious or unconscious desire to use Christian missions as a means to fasten a bondage, whether economic, political or social, on any people could not be tolerated, it said. Neither did the Council wish to bind up the Gospel with fixed ecclesiastical forms which took their meaning from the experience of the Western church. Perhaps that was a response to the pope's encyclical letter. The Gospel was a sure source of power for social regeneration. It was also the only way by which humanity could escape from the class and race hatred which had devastated society to enjoy national well-being, international friendship and peace. It was the gift of a new world from God to the old world of sin and death, and it did not recognize an "antithesis ... between individual and social regeneration." It was the victory over sin and death. The Council said that Christ is the revelation of what God is and of what man, through Him, may become. In Him we come face to face with the ultimate reality of the universe. And, referring to other religions in which Christ is not recognized as Son of God, the Council said that the Father had nowhere left Himself without witness.¹⁷⁶

There hadn't been such an exciting fresh breeze to rustle the leaves in the reopened Christian book since Stephen proclaimed his vision of the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God. The Council even did a somersault over the Baptist and Westminster Confessions. In Jesus Christ, it said, we find the ever-unfolding revelation of the God in whom we live and move and have our being. Muhammad would have agreed with every word of it. It was the closest the church had come to his insistence that Jesus, the Son of Mary ¹⁷⁷(a), was a blessing from Allah (b) through whom the Gospel was revealed (c), through whom the Torah was confirmed (d), and who was a sign to mankind (e) to the Day of Resurrection(f). Buckler should have been quite pleased at the progress, too. But the Council had to make some concession to the church's dominant doctrine and deeply ingrained tradition. It took the shine off a brilliant piece of work by retreating part way back to Nicaea with the words "... in Him we find God incarnate ..." The old barrier was still there. At least the Council had avoided the traditional words "... Jesus Christ, the only Begotten Son of God ... God from God, Light from Light, True God from True God ... of one Being with the Father, By whom all things were made ..." ^{178 179}

Even that retreat still left the International Missionary Council way out in front of the rest of the church. It had faced the challenge of the Balfour Declaration head on. It had met at the physical focal point of its faith, within view of the Jews' sacred Temple Mount, right in the middle of Muslim territory (and in very difficult circumstances) instead of at some comfortable European conference centre.^{180 181} It had not been intimidated by the pope's Mortalium Animos and it had taken seriously the task of rethinking what the church was really all about. It had been like an impatient forward scout going too far, too quickly, into enemy territory. It was certainly exposed to sniper fire and most of the snipers proved to be behind it, not in front. It wasn't long before some of the more conservative churchmen were accusing it of syncretism. According to some of its critics it had fallen under the spell of meeting in a Muslim region, but to others it appeared to have been so influenced by Karl Barth that it was falling under the spell of Zionist leaders like Rabbi Meir Bar-Ilan of the Mizrahi Movement. It was, they said, trying to achieve conversions by watering down the faith when the church was failing to achieve them by evangelism. It was also accused of concealing important differences between the faiths and of being too tough on secular involvement in mission work.

The reactions from conservative churchmen had been quite predictable but at least the Council had made a lot of progress. Many of the churches which had sent delegates took notice of its call to make mission work a series of decentralized partnerships with young churches and not a paternalistic colonial function which could be started and stopped at will. Many of them also began to debate social and economic issues in a new light. They had been reminded very bluntly that they had a duty to speak and work fearlessly against injustice of all types and to support all forces which bring nearer the establishment of Christ's Kingdom in the world of social relations, industrial organization and economic life.¹⁸² Padded pews were not all thrown out straight away, but at least they didn't feel quite so comfortable and soul-satisfying anymore.

ROME REVIEWS ITS APPROACH TO MISSIONS

It comes as no surprise to find that the I.M.C.'s attitude made relations between the Reformed churches and Rome even more difficult by highlighting differences in their approach to "mission" or evangelism, as well as causing ripples in the Reformed and Orthodox ponds. Pius XI had strong personal views on mission work and the role of the Vatican, and he had taken office in February 1922 when the world was very restless. The Western World had its eyes riveted on Russia to see what course world Communism would take following the appointment of Joseph Stalin as General Secretary of the party in Russia a few months earlier. It should have been taking more interest in people and events in China where the social progress of more than one fifth of the world community was at a critical stage. Relations between China and the Treaty Powers were shaky and a showdown had just been averted by the Washington Conference. Relations between the complex Chinese society and the fragmented Chinese authorities on one hand and the European and American sponsored Christian Missions on the other were little better. Neither were relations between competing missions. In his new role Pius XI immediately undertook a complete review of Catholic missions with, it appears, due emphasis on the problem of China.

He would have been well aware that Protestant fervour in China was such that their community growth rate was still quite a bit faster than that of the Catholic community.^{183 184} Just as he took office a National Christian Council was being organized to coordinate the growth of the "indigenous" Chinese Christian church and to expand work under the "social gospel", and Protestant missionaries were especially active in organizing the China International Famine Relief Commission in the wake of the North China famine of 1920–21.¹⁸⁵

But Pius' review took him in a completely different direction. On May 3 1922 he consolidated all Catholic mission programmes, budgeting, distribution of funds and fundraising under Boards of the Propaganda responsible to him. This involved transferring the headquarters of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith from Paris and Lyons to Rome.¹⁸⁶

In explaining his action to an audience of Missionary Union clergy six weeks later, (June 13 1922), Pius said the Catholic Church could no longer rely upon substantial help towards mission programmes from the civil powers. During the sixteenth century, (with its trauma of the Reformation), the papacy had relied on Portugal and Spain, he said. During various periods of the nineteenth century it had relied on France and Austria. But in future, he said, the Holy See would have to depend on the Faithful of Christendom in "the ancient duel being fought between God and the devil" on the mission fields. He proposed that a Priests' Missionary Union be formed in every parish.¹⁸⁷

CHINA: THE NEW FOCUS

At Pentecost a year later, (June 1923), he noted that the shift in Catholic numbers in Europe due to the sixteenth century upheavals "which had torn so many nations from the heart of the church" was being compensated for by growth in China and other parts of the Far East. This was due, he said, to the efforts of the Propaganda and he appealed for worldwide Catholic support. He also further tightened the papal strings around the Catholic mission programme by appointing Apostolic Delegates to China, Indochina¹⁸⁸ and South Africa.

There were to be no half measures. To make sure the money flowed freely, preparation for the grandest missionary display that had ever been conceived was pushed ahead under Cardinal Van Rossum of the Propaganda. It was to be the focal point for a Holy Year Exhibition 18 months later that would take the wind out of any talk of unity or coordination of mission work.¹⁸⁹ Neither was there to be any wilting under pressure. The message had to be pressed home relentlessly. China was to be no exception even if antichristian feeling was rising and even if competing warlords were tearing it apart so that it was at the point of a breakdown of civil authority. Those problems only made the challenge more interesting and called for more determination.

By 1919 there were already about half a million students in a mixed bag of Catholic and Protestant schools compared with four million in new style government operated schools ¹⁹⁰ and, as the crisis deepened, missions competed for the support of warlords and revolutionary leaders while they, in turn, competed for the support of either the church or the Confucian community. Feng Yu Hsiang, baptized by Dr. Mott in 1913, was known as the "Christian General" because he openly used his army to press Protestantism, austerity, practical education and social reform. He is said to have baptized his troops with a hose.¹⁹¹ His superior, Wu Peifu, on the other hand was a classical Confucian who was regarded by both British and Chinese aristocracy as a stabilizing influence in Central China. They were two of the main figures in a series of regional power struggles, complete with pitched battles for the control of Peking, which began in 1921.¹⁹²

But in the period flowing on from the collapse of the Ch'ing Dynasty and the Great War, China faced economic and social reconstruction as well as power struggles. Her rural and secondary industries had to expand to offset the shortfall in European imports on which the country had become dependent because of the treaties forced on it by Europe and the United States during the previous few generations. Its new dependence was firstly on foreign capital which controlled much of its railway system, coal mining and manufacturing industry, and secondly on supplies of kerosene for domestic use and fuel oil for industrial use.¹⁹³ They came through affiliates of Royal Dutch Shell and Standard Oil which was about as popular as it was with the governments of Europe.

There was strong resentment that the self-determination which was being "granted" by the Allies (with much flag waving by US President Wilson) to some of the defeated peoples of Europe was not going to apply in the Far East. It was especially strong among the young educated elite who were still trying to batter down the remnants of the old system of government employment. They were also the ones most resentful of the secret deals between Peking and the Allies under which Japan was to hold the privileges previously held by Germany in Shantung Province.¹⁹⁴ Such things were enough to fuel a revolution but in addition there was real indignation at the refusal of foreign commercial interests to give up old treaty privileges after their governments had agreed to modified treaties at the Washington Conference of November 12 1921 to February 2 1922.¹⁹⁵

In that environment strong Socialist and Communist parties formed with links in Japan, Europe and Russia. The republican Kuomintang, led by the Anglican-educated 'Henry George' Socialist Dr. Sun Yat Sen and his anticommunist, non-Christian military deputy Chiang KaiShek, arranged a powerful coalition of convenience with the Chinese Communist Party in 1922. However Dr. Sun and the Russian Foreign Ministry agreed that the Soviet system would have to be greatly adapted for conditions in China.¹⁹⁶

Then with China rolling steadily towards revolution on a wave of anti-foreign, anti-Christian¹⁹⁷¹⁹⁸ and also anti-capitalist sentiments, or simply revulsion at that "amorphous gel", the Kuomintang planned its First National Congress for January 1924. Sun Yat Sen's 'Three Principles of the People' which he had published twenty years before to provide a basis for China's development as a multicultural society had retained their early wide acceptance. They were Nationalism, Democracy and Socialism. They were not in dispute but the emphasis had changed from time to time. In 1924 they carried heavy overtones of anti-imperialism. What the Congress would do would be to determine a method to carry out China's revolutionary reconstruction along those lines within the framework of Kuomintang/Communist cooperation.¹⁹⁹

With tension mounting, the Protestant churches believed discretion was the better part of valour. They took a low profile, avoided public incidents, and some began to move away from troubled regions to return when the situation was more stable. But that did not fit into the Propaganda's no-wilting philosophy. It arranged to hold the First National Council of the Chinese (Catholic) Church to coincide with the Kuomintang Congress.²⁰⁰ To some it may appear to have been a bold evangelical move. To others it was at best an indiscretion and at worst an ill-considered deliberate confrontation which served only to inflame burning antichristian passions.

Out of the Congress came a plan based on three tactical principles. The Kuomintang would work in alliance with the Soviet Union; in collaboration with the Chinese Communist Party; and through the development of a workers' and peasants' mass movement.²⁰¹ It was put into immediate effect. The power of the Kuomintang/Communist Party alliance snowballed and so did the pressure against the churches.

Pius XI must therefore have been very conscious of events in China as he opened his Holy Year Missionary Exhibition with its mile-long avenue of pavilions on Vatican Hill on December 21 that year. In his inaugural address he left little doubt about who was expected to finance expanded Propaganda programmes and what the benefits would be, and it didn't matter whether it was good Catholic money, tainted Protestant money or even more of that Jewish money which had put the Vicar of Christ back on his throne after the 1848 revolution. He launched the Catholic Church into direct competition for the financial support of the largely American commercial interests which were backing Protestant missions in China on the basis that they would profit from improved commercial access to regions in which missions operated.^{202 203}

Referring to the scientific, ethnological, medical and literary aspects of mission programmes, and in clear contradiction of earlier papal pronouncements on things scientific, Pius XI said the time had come when "all the sacrifices which accompany missionary work will not suffice without the further help of scientific knowledge." Science, he said, must bring light, point to more direct ways and suggest better methods.^{204 205} This was true of industry, commerce and in practical economics. Missions "cannot and must not be deprived of the practical helps that present times afford", he said. Two weeks later he was able to congratulate the organizers for showing many who previously saw mission as "mere pious work" that it is "a work of worldwide importance, interesting alike both to religious and civil society, even from the mere civilizing point of view."²⁰⁶

On April 1 1925 Pius XI neatly redefined "mission" (to fit in with what was established fact throughout the church anyway) when he received the Superior Council of the Propaganda in audience. The Missionary Apostolate, he said, possessed "infinite grandeur and importance" and its aims were not only to evangelize peoples and to lead them "to the true Faith and to the supernatural life which is the highest one can aspire to ... But over and above all that, the mission aim is also to spread science, culture, civilization, in its sublimest comprehension, and thereby.... to uplift humanity itself."^{207 208} He was obviously delighted with the response to the exhibition, then well into its fourth month, but it is equally clear that he was very conscious of the dire situation in China and the alternative paths it might take following the death of Sun Yat Sen less than three weeks earlier.

THE VATICAN'S NEW APPROACH

Pressure against the church had already been increasing under the Kuomintang/ Communist alliance even before Sun Yat Sen's death and it was a reasonable assumption that with its very moderate Protestant leader out of the way its position would become more militantly antichristian. It did, and against a background of whole regions being left without missionaries as intimidation forced them out, Pius XI was somewhat more subdued when he issued another major call for support for missions in his encyclical Rerum Ecclesiae in February 1926.^{209 210} He admitted that there was havoc on some mission fields as a consequence of the Great War and he drew two scenarios. In the first he suggested that a war of revolution might bring a change of regime so that European missionaries of one or another part of the church or nationality might be expelled. In the second, he said, a native people, having reached such a degree of civilization and political maturity that nothing short of complete autonomy would satisfy them, might rise in armed rebellion to expel all Europeans whether soldiers, officials or missionaries. Such events, he declared, would be a calamity for the church unless it had well established native missions with a native clergy able to look after the flock of Christ.

Pius then directed the heads of missions to recruit and train enough native priests to "extend the frontiers of Christianity and to govern the faithful by themselves alone, without the help of any outside clergy."²¹¹ In the eyes of the church there was no distinction between a native priest and a European priest, no barrier and no separation whatever, he said. It was a mistake to imagine that natives are inferior beings or dull-minded and long experience had proved the Eastern and African races have little to envy Europeans in terms of intellectual gifts and the potential for development of their minds, he said.

It was a remarkable and praiseworthy volte face on the part of the papacy. But it is also a shocking indictment against the church. It had been responsible for, it had fostered and it had clung to arrogant, ill-conceived racism, contrary to the Good News, ever since the Council of Nicaea and its sane, logical, long overdue change of attitude only came because of the force of a grave political situation and the threat of the expulsion of European clergy.

The world had waited a long time for such a ray of light. At least it proved the lamp on the hill hadn't been extinguished altogether, but there was still a long way to go to undo sixteen hundred years of damage. In fact just as Pius XI penned that encyclical racism was plumbing new depths both in Europe and North America under the pseudo-scientific guise of eugenics. This made the pope's encyclical all the more remarkable but also all the more difficult for the world to accept because of the Vatican's consistent rejection of things scientific. With simple Biblical truth and logic Pius had confronted the latest in popular scientific thinking and he had been right.^{212 213 214} He did it again four years later. On top of that there were many churchmen actively supporting the eugenics movement so there was plenty of scope for people to read into the encyclical whatever motives and justification for whatever actions they wished.

Pius also weakened the impact of his direction and showed sympathy for prevailing attitudes when he went on to write that missions should have Religious Congregations of their own for natives of both sexes.²¹⁵ He thought these could be “more suitable to the native mentality and environment.” Of course he included the proviso that if natives wanted to become members of existing Congregations and seemed “endowed with the necessary qualifications, by all means let them be encouraged in their holy design ...”²¹⁶ And in addition to recruitment of a native clergy he wanted monasteries of contemplative orders established, (clearly to compete with the impact of Buddhism among Chinese); greater emphasis on schools and welfare institutions for children and the sick; and cooperation instead of competition between orders.

Turning on the “spiritual slackers” of the Western World who were the recipients and beneficiaries of the gifts of Faith, Grace and earthly treasures, Pius XI demanded they should shake off their lethargy and start sharing their gifts. He demanded a maximum effort from every bishop to set up Priests’ Missionary Unions and in soliciting funds for each of the missionary associations. Having picked up the thrust of the Chinese National Christian Council’s Social Gospel programme he also picked up the thrust of John Mott’s “Evangelization of the World in This Generation.”^{217 218} Christian Society should be “ever eager to give of her gold and her children for the cause of missions” he said, concerned that one thousand million human beings had not yet been led towards Christ who “became man” for their sake. Each succeeding Catholic generation should be anxious, eager and longing to leave a mark on the sands of time and to share in the history of Christ’s conquering march.²¹⁹

Just four months later, (June 15, 1926), Pius XI addressed a Pontifical message directly to the bishops of China with a sense of urgency which borders on despair. He referred to growing misunderstanding between the church and the people of China to whom Catholicism spelt Europeanism and who saw Catholic missionaries as agents of foreign powers, hostile to the political independence and just aspirations of the nations they evangelized. He acknowledged that at times politics and national passions had helped to spread prejudice which was injurious and unfair to the church. The ignorant, the simple and the youth among whom such prejudice took root, and “their governments, ever prone to suspect the Church as the inveterate enemy of their rights and liberties, were being alienated more and more from the Catholic religion” he said. But then, either in a flight of fancy or with an appalling ignorance of colonial history, or both, he claimed that the church “has never allowed her missions to be used as political tools by earthly powers ... (or allowed) ... any of the powers to make use of the missions for its own political ends ... (and) ... she has ever endeavoured to suppress any infiltration of the spirit of nationalism in the divine work of the missions.”²²⁰

The works of a long line of people like Constantine, Isabella, the Medicis, Napoleon Bonaparte, Napoleon III, the Romanovs, Queen Victoria and her lackeys, and industrialists like John D. Rockefeller who were pouring money into missions were coming home to roost. So was the church's misunderstanding of itself and, as if to confirm that even revolution and persecution could not force the church to rethink its role, Pius XI blatantly contradicted the "no-Europeanism" line he was trying to promote.

With unmistakable allusion to the Treaty Powers he said that any government can and must, of its own right, protect its subjects and their property, including missionaries and their institutions, in any country and especially in times of persecution and revolution.²²¹ If it was intended either as a threat of Italian, French, British or American intervention on behalf of their missions or as an appeal for intervention by those powers, then it clearly confirmed what the Chinese revolutionaries were saying.^{222 223 224 225 226} If on the other hand it was a statement of religious philosophy then it was an open invitation for armed intervention by any country, anywhere, because what is good enough for the goose should be good enough for the gander. If it was proper for the Treaty Powers to "protect" the church in China as they had so often done, for example in the Boxer Rebellion, then it was also proper for China to intervene to "protect" a Confucian monk in Vietnam or for Turkey to send a battle cruiser to "protect" an Imam in Cyprus – or even Rome.

Another four months on, (October 28 1926), and Pius XI personally consecrated a batch of six Chinese bishops. They were the first non-European Catholic bishops ever. The situation had indeed become desperate with many European missionaries being evacuated as China's revolution neared its climax and persecution kept pace with it.²²⁷ It is hardly surprising.

The revolutionaries, struggling for the independence and just aspirations of which Pius XI had written, were having problems of their own. Chiang Kai Shek, as successor to Sun Yat Sen, had meshed military and political control together and grabbed the pinnacle of Kuomintang power by means of a personal bureaucracy and with the aid of Chinese bankers, US capitalists and friends among Protestant church leaders. He and the Chinese Communist Party under leaders such as Chou En Lai were gradually drifting apart as so often happens with coalitions, whether in revolution or in government, even without the coercive backing of a third party which is in open conflict with a coalition partner. That was bad enough but the C.C.P., backed by Russia, was keenly watching the Catholic press and the Vatican hierarchy making very friendly gestures towards their Fascist arch enemy, Mussolini. The C.C.P. turned the screws on the churches tighter and tighter so that in about two years five eighths of the foreign Protestant missionaries in the region of Central China were withdrawn and it seemed that "the ultimate day of trial for the Christian cause in China had come" after reaching a 1925 peak of 8,158 missionaries.²²⁸ Then in 1927 Chiang Kai Shek married a sister of Sun Yat Sen's widow; accepted Methodist baptism in 1930; tightened family links with the American financial world; and began systematically dismantling the labour movements which gave the C.C.P. its strength.

The revolutionary coalition broke up completely. The C.C.P. went underground or into the mountains and Chiang Kai Shek set up a government at Nanking to begin the task of reunifying China. He also acted to suppress attacks on the church so that its missionaries began to make their way back into Central China. With the people of China, more than one fifth of the entire world population, moving into a period of calm the worst appeared to have passed for the Church.²²⁹

Such was the situation when the International Missionary Council was preparing its report in Jerusalem at Easter 1928. Apart from all the provocative things it said about the nature of the church and about church-state relations it was pretty blunt on some other issues and the influence on its thinking of events in Asia and Africa is obvious. It said that all social and economic systems, including the one “dominated almost entirely by the profit motive”, should be tested against three simple but fundamental criteria from Christ’s teaching: sanctity of personality, brotherhood, and corporate responsibility.²³⁰ It condemned the rivalry of competing imperialisms in their efforts to secure preferential access to sources of raw materials, markets, and opportunities for investment in Asia and Africa which, it said, were “ruinous alike to the nations engaged in it and to the indigenous populations.”²³¹ Then there was its punchline. “We believe that the Gospel ‘proclaims the only way by which humanity can escape from class and race hatred.’ But we are forced to recognize that such a claim requires to be made good and that the record of Christendom hitherto is not sufficient to sustain it ...”²³²

ITALY AND THE VATICAN REBUILD AN ALLIANCE

Within a matter of months Pius XI had put the finishing touches to his concordat with Mussolini, and the Lateran Treaty, and he was ready to unveil his answer to Jerusalem and the unity antics of the reformed and orthodox wings of the church. On February 11 1929 he announced to a special augmented audience of the parish priests of Rome that the Roman Question had been resolved once and for always. There was, of course, nothing unusual about the signing of a concordat. The Vatican used them as its means of negotiating a special status for the Roman Catholic Church and its adherents and it was under them that it exchanged diplomatic representatives with a string of countries. More than forty were signed during the reigns of Pius XI and his successor Pius XII.²³³ The system was an anachronism because it placed the rights of the Catholic Church above changing social conditions and was contrary to the principle of equality for all citizens before the law.²³⁴ It was no different in that respect to state-church laws in countries like Britain. They are an anachronism too. So we may well wonder what was so special about the 1929 Concordat with Italy. To put it in perspective we must retrace our steps from the beginning of The Great War.

Once the old links between a single church and a network of absolute monarchies had been broken, and once competition for the favours of the new constitutional governments developed between the old “parent” church and its “daughters”, (either Reformed or breakaway fragments), the concordat system became vital to the Curia. It provided the capacity to tie the regional units of the Catholic Church to the Vatican and the papacy. If the regional churches were able to make their own competitive arrangements with the governments to which their members owed their civil allegiance they could ignore the papacy altogether. They would be independent.²³⁵ ²³⁶ The concordat system was therefore developed in such a way that the Roman Catholic Church's diplomatic links – political links might be more accurate – were directly between the papacy and national governments. In that way the regional churches were held dependent on their Roman connection. It was Rome's form of Christian unity. It also made conformity and agreement in all matters vital because without them the tensions which came from disagreements would begin the sixteenth century fragmentation process all over again. The central ruler therefore had to be more absolute than any ordinary monarch to suppress disagreement. From that flowed the dogma of papal infallibility, the need for an oath of antimodernist allegiance, secret services and more concordats. The circle got tighter and tighter.

As we have noted, the Italian government had made it a condition of its entry into The First World War that the pope was not to be involved in either peace negotiations or settlements. There was to be no question of the re-establishment of a papal state without the government's specific agreement. However in July 1917, just a few weeks after Pope Benedict XV met Nahum Sokolow at the Vatican and described Zionist plans for Palestine as "providential", he decided it was time to ignore the Italian Government. Perhaps the military situation was so sticky that Benedict felt he could not rely on providential intervention, but that seems unlikely because just at that stage Italy, with Allied support, had Austria running backwards through Trentino and the disaster of Caporetto was still a thing of the future. Perhaps, on the other hand, he had thought through the implications of that providential intervention, didn't like what he found, and decided to try to do without it. The Jews could stay where they were. Cardinal Pacelli went to Berlin as a papal emissary and on the basis of discussions with government ministers helped to prepare a peace plan which became known as "the papal note." It proposed a series of international agreements and systems of arbitration for future disputes; evacuation of occupied France, Belgium and the overseas German colonies; friendly settlement of the territorial disputes between Germany and France, and between Austria and Italy; and the restoration of Serbia, Rumania, Montenegro and Poland.²³⁷

The Papal Note certainly won the Vatican no friends in Britain's southern dominions and Japan, and it put Britain in an extremely difficult situation with each of them. The Vatican knew that President Wilson had previously pressed for the return of all of Germany's overseas colonies in an effort, it can be argued, to establish the principle that wars for territorial gain were no longer supportable. In doing so he had brought out sharp differences of opinion within the British government but there appears to have been a consensus that the future of the German colonies was a matter for international negotiation, with self-determination even being an option in some cases.²³⁸ However Australia and New Zealand saw the Pacific Islands, and especially the phosphate rich islands, as the spoils of war in compensation for their support for Britain. Australia also wanted NE New Guinea to extend the frontier of its White Australia Policy against "the Japanese Yellow Peril." South Africa wanted control of German South West Africa, and the London Times, (whatever vested interests it was speaking for), wanted Tanganyika in the British Empire. They were all rather upset and on January 31, 1917, the British Colonial Secretary found it necessary to issue a public statement that the German colonies would never be returned.²³⁹ Germany's determination to fight on rose noticeably and Britain found the need for naval support in the Pacific more urgent than ever. Japan agreed to enter the war a few weeks later to neutralize the German Pacific fleet in return for a secret agreement with Britain that she could have Germany's colonies north of the equator, including Tsingtao on the Chinese mainland, and that Britain would support her claims to the whole of the surrounding province of Shantung.²⁴⁰ Britain, the great defender and bastion of the Christian faith and a leader in Protestant evangelism of the crude non-Christian, had already made her secret deal to set up a new Muslim Caliphate. She was now committed to handing colonies which were being actively evangelized to "the last stronghold of Confucian social practice"²⁴¹ and she was about to ring in the Balfour Declaration as well.

It could never be said that the papal note was not a serious attempt to get genuine peace negotiations underway but the circumstances were rather intriguing, the allied responses were generally cool and each of the warring parties put preconditions on consideration of the plan. President Wilson came nearest to supporting the Vatican initiative. However it is clear that no one wanted to sit around a conference table with the pope as chairman. There also appears to have been a feeling that the note was a little naive, and that the pope's interests in independence for each of the Orthodox areas under Russian influence and "friendly settlement" of territorial disputes between Austria and Italy were rather transparent. In any case the papal note was soon swept aside by the pace of events and it was quietly ignored as the powers jockeyed for positions and continued their pre-armistice deals in secret.^{242 243 244}

All that considered, the Vatican clearly felt that its efforts had justified a change of heart by the Allies and a seat at the eventual peace conference. But when it opened at Versailles, two months and a British general election after the armistice had been signed, the Vatican was not among the 27 powers who shared 70 seats around the table between them. The Allies had not had a change of heart. There were several major empires represented, a lot of independent countries, including those for whom the Vatican had spoken (in one grouping or another), plus a handful whose interest in the war had been fairly obscure. But not the Vatican, and there was strong resentment and disappointment in its corridors of power.

ROME'S AUTHORITY AT RISK

The attitude of the powers towards the church during the conference had made it perfectly clear there were difficult times ahead and the Vatican decided that a vigorous programme to secure concordats was necessary. It was pursued with vigour as soon as the new pope, Pius XI, was enthroned. Pius, otherwise named Achille Ratti, had spent the war years with the title Prefect of the Vatican Library where his responsibilities presumably included intelligence and information processing. He was then sent in 1918 as papal delegate to the church in Poland which was something akin to the missing jewel from the papal crown. As already noted, it had been pawned repeatedly in previous war and peace negotiations. Achille Ratti had the difficult task of ensuring that Roman Catholicism was adopted as the state church if and when the Allies either recognized the Austro-German promise to set up an hereditary monarchy or acted on their own adaptation of it to grant Poland autonomy. It was no easy task because Poland's unique ethnic and religious mix had provided excellent fuel for subversion by each of the powers right to the end of the war.²⁴⁵ When the Polish Republic was recognized by the Allies in 1919 Ratti gained diplomatic accreditation as papal nuncio but he did not achieve his primary task. He was elevated to Archbishop of Milan, then cardinal, and then pope in very quick succession.^{246 247}

But the peace negotiators soon ran into troubles. Several countries which didn't want concordats with the Roman Catholic Church, or with any church for that matter, said they couldn't negotiate agreements with powers with whom they didn't have diplomatic relations. Then it was very convenient that they couldn't establish diplomatic relations or exchange diplomatic representatives with the church because as a power it didn't exist. After all the church was, they pointed out, a religious community and not a constituted sovereign power. Perhaps it might be better for local churchmen to simply represent their points of view to their governments just like the Protestants had to. But what about the Jews? Oh yes, of course the powers would establish diplomatic relations with them when they went to Palestine because they were, according to the church's insistence, a race. If a national home were set up for them they would naturally have some sort of sovereign government and they would therefore be entitled to diplomatic recognition.

The Vatican was in a bind. It could accept that ghastly proposition, grant administrative autonomy to its national or regional branches and be content to appoint papal delegates to churches, with little more than advisory roles. But if it did so for one, it would soon have to do so for others and then its version of Christian unity would be shattered. All hope for a single worldwide Christian church based on Rome would be lost and yet Judaism would have worldwide recognition as a political force as well as being the religion of the Jews. That had serious theological implications.

In fact the Vatican had anticipated those reactions and as soon as it was confirmed by the Russian publication of the Treaty of London that there would be no seat for it at the Peace Conference and the implications of the Balfour Declaration became clear it set out to prevent Britain from securing the mandate for Palestine, to discredit the Zionist Movement, and to vigorously condemn the concept of a Jewish State. The level and venom of anti-Semitic statements emanating from Vatican sources increased at the same time.

During the early months of 1917, when the tide of war was turning in Britain's favor, European attention turned to the form of government in Palestine in the event of a British-French victory. Those who were well informed saw that phase of the war in terms of control of territory for access to resources, while some saw it simply as an extension of the struggle between the great powers for control of trade routes, and others saw it as the ultimate extension of the Crusades and the recovery of Palestine from Muslim control for the Christian Church. Their particular perspectives influenced people's attitudes towards future governance of the whole region known as Palestine, and the alternatives canvassed included annexation by Britain, a British protectorate, a British-French condominium, a Belgian trusteeship and an international commission.

A MATTER OF TEMPORAL AUTHORITY

But the Vatican wanted control of Jerusalem and a strip of territory which would take in a host of other holy places and it certainly did not want a Jewish State. If the world would not let it have papal states and the temporal power and political influence which went with them, then the Jews most certainly were not to have them. When the Peace Conference convened in Paris (Versailles) on January 18, 1919, tension was running high in Rome because the Vatican was not invited to be represented and Secretary of State Gasparri's hostility to Zionism was pronounced. Sykes, who had visited Palestine prior to the conference, reported on arrival in Paris that "he was convinced that an estrangement between the Zionists and the Catholic Church would mean that 'two moral forces, pivoted on the same centre, instead of radiating outwards will consume their strength inwardly.'"²⁴⁹ His concerns were illustrated graphically by letters from the Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Bourne, to both the British Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary about a week after the conference opened. He wrote: "The whole [Zionist] Movement appears to be quite contrary to Christian sentiment and tradition. Let Jews live here by all means, if they like, and enjoy the same liberties as other people; but that they should ever again dominate and rule the country would be an outrage to Christianity and its Divine founder."²⁵⁰

Six weeks later both Gasparri and the pope personally expressed similar views. Gasparri told French Cardinal Amette (and indirectly the French Embassy in Rome): We are very worried about Palestine. ... we are told Zionism is gaining victories every day at the [Peace] Conference."²⁵¹ Then, in a conversation with the British envoy, Count de Salis, he implied that the Vatican would turn to France and Italy for a renewed religious protectorate if Britain acceded to Zionist demands.²⁵² Next came Pope Benedict's address to the consistory of cardinals on March 10. In a transparent bid to evoke the spirit of the Crusades he referred to "the efforts of Our predecessors to free [the Holy Places] from the dominion of infidels, the heroic deeds and the blood shed by the Christians of the West through the centuries." He then noted "the rejoicing of all good men [that] they have finally returned into the hands of the Christians" and his keen anxiety about the decisions the Peace Conference may reach, and said it would be terrible grief for all faithful Christians "if infidels were placed in a privileged and prominent position; much more if those most holy sanctuaries of the Christian religion were given into the charge of non-Christians." Then an appeal for funds for Christian missions and institutions, and a veiled threat: "... it is our intention to excite the Bishops of the whole Catholic world that they may take to heart such a noble and holy case, arousing among all the faithful that sense of active charity which their ancestors always showed towards their brethren of the Orient."²⁵³ Gasparri sought to clarify this a few days later in discussions with the Belgian Representative, saying: "The danger we most fear is the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine.” He noted “the influence the Jewish element has on the leading Allied statesmen” and that “... the private secretaries of President Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd George are Jews. Add to this the activity of Jewish banking and you will understand the causes of our concern.”²⁵⁴

NO PLACE FOR A JEWISH STATE

Naturally, within days Osservatore Romano and the Jesuit organ Civiltà Cattolica were both pursuing the pope's theme. Explaining the church's opposition to ‘the Zionist illusion’ Osservatore Romano stated that the Jews had been dispersed by divine decree and would return to Palestine only after they had converted to Christianity. It continued: “The salvation of Israel will arrive when all the nations open their souls to the hope of the Kingdom of God. ... (But) even when East and West fully join the Catholic Church and the Jews accept Christianity, there will still be no assurance that the Jewish nation will rise again.”²⁵⁵

So international discussion of the question of the administration of Palestine dragged on until a conference was held at San Remo in April 1920 and the Allies agreed that a mandate should be granted to Britain, subject to ratification by the League of Nations in due course. When the British government proceeded to appoint a Jew, Sir Herbert Samuel, as first High Commissioner to Palestine there was grave concern in the Vatican²⁵⁶ and it was not long before The Protocols of the Elders of Zion were given greater credibility by commentaries in Osservatore Romano. In October it republished an article on the ‘Jewish Peril’ from the French Catholic newspaper La Croix. This asserted that the Jews who hated Christ and Christian nations were behind the British policy on Palestine. It questioned the authenticity of The Protocols but then said the danger described was real and that the Jews had carried out in Russia, through the Bolshevik Revolution, the plan set out in the book and had also stirred up the miners' strikes in England. Six months later both newspapers took up the same theme again: even if the book was not to be believed, the Jews' plan set out in it certainly was.²⁵⁷ The relentless campaign certainly had some effect. When de Salis reported on the Vatican's anxieties to the Foreign Office a senior official penned a note on his cable: “... I share the pope's anxiety regarding the most extreme intentions of the Zionists. ... he foresees a spiritual campaign against Christianity. Is the anti-Christ not a Jew according to the Roman tradition? Judaism, under the cover of Bolshevism, has already destroyed the Orthodox Church; could Bolshevism not do the same to Rome? ...”²⁵⁸

But Britain was obliged by the San Remo Conference to establish a commission to administer the Holy Places under the chairmanship of a League of Nations appointee and in November 1920 the government received a proposal drawn up by Samuel. His proposal was that a 31-member commission would have eleven Christians, eight Jews, eight Muslims and four additional members appointed by the administration. The Christian representatives would be three Catholics, three Greek Orthodox, two Armenians, one Copt, one Abyssinian and one Anglican to reasonably reflect the existing denominational involvement in the Holy City.²⁵⁹ But the Vatican objected strongly. It saw a plot being hatched by Jewish, Protestant and Orthodox interests to prevent the Vatican from exercising its rights and authority as – in its view – the sole representative of God on earth. In December a British Government committee of Ministers adopted an alternative, providing for six commissioners, all nominated by Britain, three of whom would be Christians, with a chairman appointed by the League of Nations. But this was little better for the Vatican and in a bid to break the plot and to avoid Jewish representation altogether it sought to substitute a commission of consuls who represented members of the League of Nations in Palestine. Catholic countries were to be in the majority and religious representatives were to be present only in a consultative capacity. It soon became obvious to the government that the international and inter-religious conflicts of interest were so complicated that the matter could not be readily resolved, and when a draft mandate document was submitted to the League of Nations no numbers were included. Subsequently the Colonial Office proposed three Christians, three Muslims and two Jews, but still no agreement could be reached and Britain reserved the right to appoint a commission after the mandate was ratified.

A note of desperation gradually crept into the pope's statements, reaching a peak in his allocution to the cardinals on June 13, 1921, which was directed squarely at the Christian member states of the League of Nations to which the matter of Palestine had been referred for ratification by the San Remo Conference. He referred to his 1919 speech and said his anxiety was increasing every day; lamented the "iniquitous activity of non-Catholic sects which are pleased to glory in the name of Christian, ... cleverly profiting by the misery in which the inhabitants were plunged after the war;" complained of the prospect of Jewish privilege over Christians in Palestine; and closed with a mixture of coercion and appeal. The rights of Jews must in no way be put above the just rights of the Christians, he said, "and to this end We warmly urge all the governments of Christian nations, even if not Catholic, to bring vigilant pressure to bear on the League of Nations which, it is commonly said, is to consider and adjudicate on the English mandate in Palestine."²⁶¹ ²⁶²

THE LATERAN TREATY: A MUTUAL CONVENIENCE

The Vatican was certainly in a bind and so the Great Powers were also in a bind again because the Roman church was in trouble – yet again. Its understanding of itself and its doctrines interacted, influenced each other and determined its structures, its policies and its attitudes to the world around it. To prop them up in the twentieth century it had to have concordats but to get concordats it had to get its temporal power back. By the time Mussolini had blasted his way to his Fascist dictatorship he and the pope were equally eager to agree a concordat and a treaty to go with it, and the pope was more eager than ever that the Jews should not go to Jerusalem.

When Pius XI made his historic statements in February 1929 it was with surprising frankness that he said of the Lateran Treaty, which gave him and his successors absolute sovereignty over Vatican City, that "... no form of sovereignty is recognized by the world as true and proper unless it is also territorial ...” He said “... the Vicar of Christ is not influenced by worldly greed, but only by the recognition of that which it is impossible not to ask for; because a territorial sovereignty of this sort is universally recognized as an indispensable condition for all real sovereignty of jurisdiction.” It was therefore “... indispensable (to enable) him ... to exercise the spiritual power entrusted to him for the good of mankind”, but he had only sought “... a minimum of territory, just enough for the exercise of sovereignty ...,” or “... just enough body to retain his soul in union with it.”²⁶³

The Lateran Treaty provided the stitches which were to draw together the fabric and authority of the Roman Catholic Church which had been ripped when Garibaldi proclaimed the former papal states a part of a reunited Italy. The world's powers, with the possible exceptions of Spain and Austria, had been happy to see the fabric torn and would do nothing to mend it until Mussolini needed a prop for his Fascist dictatorship. Under such circumstances the pope's statement may appear at first glance to be no different to the views of the Vatican for many hundreds of years. However he had gone further and his description of the church, the papacy and the Fascist dictator whose cause he now espoused must be seen in relation to the new Reformed and Orthodox ecumenical movement; the increasing prevalence of totalitarian regimes; the vital new Christian interest in Jerusalem as the focal point of the Christian faith which had been triggered by Zionism and the Balfour Declaration; and the Zionist struggle for a national Jewish homeland based on Jerusalem at the expense of the Muslim community.

Pius XI even introduced a touch of divinity into the explanation of his job description which none of his predecessors had dared to do. He said that a “true, proper and real territorial sovereignty ... is necessarily due to him who, holding the Divine Commission and being the Divine Representative, cannot be subject to any earthly sovereign.” He had changed himself from simply a representative of God, the Divine Creator, to the Divine Representative in a single sentence. Having claimed that transformation he went on to refer to the universal Fatherhood and universal Magisterium confided in the Sovereign Pontiff, the Representative and Vicar of God on earth, by Divine Providence.

The totalitarian, inquisitorial streaks which had been apparent in his anti-Christian-unity encyclical a year before were confirmed and reinforced although he made no direct reference to either dissident Pan-Christians or Jews. Jerusalem was written off, as a competitor of Rome, in a couple of sentences. Admitting that “... the territory We have reserved ... is materially very small ...” Pius said that “... nevertheless We have the right to say that it is ... larger than anything in the world, from whatever point of view it is looked at. When a territory can boast of Bernini's Colonnade, of Michael Angelo's Cupola, of the treasures of art and science contained in the archives and the libraries, in the museums and galleries of the Vatican; when a territory governs and guards the Tomb of the Prince of the Apostles, surely it has a right to claim that in all the world no other territory is greater or more precious.” It was a deliberate denigration of Jerusalem – the Holy City with sacred sanctuaries venerated by the people of several faiths – as well as Bethlehem, Nazareth, the River Jordan, and every other place from Lake Tiberias to Hebron which was held holy by Christians. And yet the security and responsibility for “those most holy sanctuaries” had been the stated basis of the Vatican’s efforts to prevent the British mandate and the possibility of a Jewish State in Palestine. The pope was desperate to justify his treaty and the concordat, and to draw world attention away from Jerusalem and the Zionist bid for a Jewish state.

The conflicts of interest which had been caused by the need for one or more defence pacts to guarantee the security of the former papal states had concerned many critics while the treaty was being prepared. Pius admitted that he had been questioned about any guarantees he might want from friendly (Catholic) powers when he had briefed the corps of diplomats accredited to the Vatican on the progress of negotiations. He showed that alliances with mere temporal powers had proved inadequate in the past; he said he valued the favour and friendship of all States and all Governments; he “emphatically endorsed” the view that “there could be no question of (the Sovereign Pontiff) asking permission, or consent, or guarantees”; and he said that future dangers could only be hypothetical and “... are certainly never more unlikely than today.” He looked for guarantees “... in the consciousness of Our own just cause ... the conscience and sense of justice of the Italian people ... (and) in God’s Providence in that indefectible assistance, divinely promised to the Church, which is seen working in a special manner through the Representative and Vicar of God on earth.”

The Concordat had been achieved by the Grace of God and the future was, he said, in God’s hands. But he either let the mask drop or suffered the gravest lapse of judgement, or both, when he said that “there was also needed a man such as Providence has caused Us to meet, a man unaffected by the prejudices of the “Liberal School” ... (through whose) constant and generous assistance ... We have succeeded ... in drawing up a Concordat which, if not actually the very best possible, is certainly to be reckoned among the best ...” Cavalier Benito Mussolini. “Therefore”, said the pope, “it is with the deepest satisfaction that We are persuaded that We have given God back to Italy, and Italy to God.” With a friend like that in the Vatican Mussolini had no further need for a ballot box unless he rocked the papal boat, especially in view of Article 43 of the Concordat.

The State agreed to recognize organizations dependent on Italian Catholic Action in so far as they were to spread and realize Catholic principles under the direction of the Church hierarchy and also in as far as they acted outside of any political party. At the same time the pope agreed to reimpose the old prohibition on Italian clergy enrolling and working in political parties. To some observers this was a neat coup by Mussolini who eliminated a source of political opposition at the stroke of a papal pen. To others it was equally a coup by the Vatican and a high price for Mussolini to pay for a compliant church because the pulpit, parish hall and school room became more than ever the focal point for Italian political power play with the pope firmly in control and with no definition or restriction on matters of Catholic principle.²⁶⁴

The apparent benefits of the Concordat, apart from “the sympathy of the entire world” which it and the treaty were “calculated to evoke”, were the establishment of the Roman Catholic Church as the only state church in Italy; restoration of religious marriages alongside civil; reintroduction of compulsory religious instruction in both elementary and secondary schools; absolute control over religious appointments throughout Italy, and diplomatic immunity for Vatican officials. Of course there was also the little matter of financial settlement for church property confiscated in 1870. The Holy See accepted 750 million lire in cash and 1,000 million lire in Italian State Bonds. This was substantially less than it had refused in 1871 but the new political relationships which came with its sovereignty were far more important than cash compensation. In any case Pius was quick to remind the clergy that “We have unlimited confidence in the charity of the faithful, in that marvelous work of Divine Providence which is expressed practically in ‘Peter’s Pence’ truly the hand of God ...”

The new political situation called for a Secretary of State with the same attitudes towards papal diplomacy as the pope and preferably similar experience. The ink was hardly dry on the Lateran Treaty before the pope appointed Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli to the post. Pacelli, coming from a Bank of Rome family, was well connected with the Fascist government. He was the emissary who had carried the papal peace note around Europe and he had stayed in Munich and Berlin as nuncio to successive German governments under the collapsing monarchy, the Republic and the Reich, with essentially the same responsibilities which Pius had during his concurrent spell in Poland. In addition his brother had been the first papal representative in negotiations for the Lateran Treaty and the Italian Concordat.^{265 266}

CONCORDATS BACK IN FAVOUR

In the meantime several other countries had succumbed and agreed to concordats of one type or another, including the long sought after jewel: Poland. A much manipulated pawn in the war games, Poland had to steer its way through an obstacle course of the Treaty of Brest Litovsk, then Versailles with its series of plebiscites and finally a border war with Bolshevik Russia.²⁶⁷
^{268 269} But it eventually emerged as a strong – albeit harassed – republic with an eastern boundary roughly the same as after the second partition in 1793. It had its glorious mixture of Jewish, Protestant, Catholic and Orthodox faiths and, like the United States, an excellent base from which to demonstrate complete religious tolerance of the sort which had made the nation great in the days of King Boleslav the Pious.

But the people and the times had changed. Poland had been subjected to more vile, contemptible sectarian propaganda from each of tsarist Russia, Germany and Austria, Britain and France, the Vatican, and then Britain again with the Balfour Declaration than any other part of Europe. In that situation religious tolerance was no more than a fantasy.

When the Russian monarchy fell the Russian border areas had, among the Christian population, a majority of Russian Orthodox and a minority of Roman Catholics and members of other sects who had managed to survive attempts by the tsarist regime to eliminate them. The influential Orthodox Christians tended to be reactionary and quick to subvert Bolshevik government affairs so when they came under notice they were treated severely. However the Roman Catholics had been so primed against the Orthodox Church as well as against Communism that they tended to be anti Russian rather than just anti-Bolshevik and they were treated rather ruthlessly with quite a few joining the missing persons list – permanently. Naturally the Communists added their touch of antireligious propaganda to all the garbage and bigotry that was flowing already. It was their attempt to bring some reason and stability to the disgraceful mess. In doing so they handed the church a lot more ammunition to throw back on the grounds of religious persecution.

Then came four years of utter confusion. Between Brest Litovsk and Versailles, Germany ruled the region until the Republic of Poland became a reality and the people were swept back into a war between Poland and Russia. Marshal Pilsudski, encouraged by the Allies, took advantage of the civil war which went with the establishment of a Bolshevik republic and tried for a bit more of Russia than the peace treaties allocated to Poland. Being too greedy, he refused to quit when the Bolsheviks twice offered terms while he was in front. The Russians thereupon buried their differences for a while, threw everything at the marshal and pushed him back to Warsaw. It looked as if Poland was about to be rubbed off the map again until Britain or France sent some moral and technical support in the form of civil and military missions led by Lord D'Abernon and General Weygand. The tide turned once more and, in what the Catholic Church was able to dramatize as "the miracle of the Vistula", the Russians were pushed back home.²⁷⁰

POLAND, PILSUDSKI AND A MESSAGE FOR THE JEWS

It was not until 1931 that the new border was formally agreed in the Treaty of Riga and so for ten years there was continued agitation and conflict. Pilsudski needed either a buffer between his French and British-backed Capitalist regime and the Russian Communist regime or clear-cut separation and both were difficult to achieve because the disputed border areas then contained a majority of Catholics and a minority of Russian and Ukrainian Orthodox, and Jews. Pending a final settlement, a concordat might help to provide some political stability through clerical influence, even if not through religious conformity. A concordat with the Vatican was signed and took effect in 1925. The Vatican got what it wanted, but there was a price tag: support for Pilsudski to stabilize the country and to reduce the role of parliamentary government. But perhaps it was a matter of mutual convenience and not a "price." The church and the state each wanted to assimilate the Ukrainians and there was bound to be resistance. There was.

Thus, after Pilsudski and the Vatican had exchanged props the pope devoted a little thought to both Ukrainian assimilation and the Jewish question. Poland's Jews once more began to get the messages that "Christ must rule" and that the peace of Christ would come through the reign of Christ – or his sole representative, of course. On his elevation to the papacy in 1922 Pius XI had adopted the motto "Pax Christi in regno Christi," and now, immediately after the triumph of his Polish concordat, he instituted the annual feast of Christ the King.²⁷¹ It was said to be in honour of Jesus Christ as lord over all creation, a magnification of the Feast of the Ascension, and to highlight "the royal prerogatives of Christ" in a declaration that he was entitled to homage, service and fidelity from all men in all phases of individual and social life.²⁷²

But the new feast, officially instituted on December 11, 1925, became the centre of controversy and was opposed by many theologians who said that the Feast of the Epiphany already highlighted Christ's role effectively,²⁷³ and they were not comfortable with the introduction of yet another feast as a mechanism for 'assimilation' or proselytizing. Some of the pope's stated reasons for going ahead with it are therefore noteworthy. In their attempts to justify it, Vatican authorities referred to selected passages in the encyclical Quas Prima in which Pius XI said that "people are instructed in the truths of the faith, and brought to appreciate the inner joys of religion far more effectively by the annual celebration of our sacred mysteries than by any pronouncements, however weighty, made by the teaching of the church (which) usually reach only a few and the more learned among the faithful ..." ²⁷⁴ Another reference was said to be directed at Communist states and others which had not yet started negotiations for concordats. It noted that the new feast should call to mind "for princes and rulers as well as private individuals the Last Judgement when Christ, cast out of public life, despised, neglected and ignored, will most severely avenge these insults; for his kingly dignity demands that the State shall take account of God's Commandments and Christian principles. This both in lawmaking and administration; also in providing sound moral education for the young." Some writers suggest it was also aimed at totalitarian regimes such as those of Mussolini and Pilsudski but, in view of his relationships with them and both his earlier and later pronouncements, that must be regarded as diversionary.²⁷⁵

However the Pope's other motive had to come out eventually and he admitted, during an audience, that it was also a message for "non-Christians," and that the new feast also highlighted the affinity between the church of Rome and the atmosphere and practices to which the Russian Orthodox Poles had long been accustomed. The pope was reinforcing the Vatican's regular efforts to offset the Jerusalem-and-unity trend.

However a reading of the complete encyclical is more revealing. Pius referred to his first encyclical in which he had said that the chief causes of the difficulties under which mankind was labouring were the manifold evils due to the fact that the majority of men had thrust Jesus Christ and his holy law out of their lives. Until individuals and states submit to the rule of our Saviour there was no "really hopeful prospect of a lasting peace among nations." He referred to men and nations cut off from God, stirring up strife and discord and hurrying along the road to ruin and death, and said men must look for the peace of Christ in the Kingdom of Christ – his Church – the one Source of Salvation.

Then the pope moved to his theme, extending his reasoning progressively towards the point that ultimate divine authority over all states and all individuals was vested in, and should be accorded to, the Catholic Church. He said the Nicene Synod had "defined and proposed for Catholic belief the dogma of the Consubstantiality of the Only begotten with the Father, and added to the Creed the words 'of whose kingdom there shall be no end,' thereby affirming the kingly dignity of Christ." He then wove a series of Biblical quotations together to the effect that it was Christ who came out of Jacob to rule, who has been set by the Father as king over Sion, his holy mount, who shall have the Gentiles for his inheritance and the utmost parts of the earth for his possession, and as King of Israel is to be hailed as a most rich and powerful monarch. Christ shall execute judgement and justice in the earth and reign in the House of Jacob for ever. The Father does not judge any man, having given all power of judgement to the Son, including “the right of rewarding and punishing all men living” and executive power which all must obey and none may escape.

With a return to the concept of the Holy Roman Empire in his sights, Pius wrote “The empire of Christ over all nations was rejected. The right which the Church has from Christ himself, to teach mankind, to make laws, to govern peoples in all that pertains to their eternal salvation, that right was denied. ... The rebellion of individuals and states against the authority of Christ has produced deplorable consequences.” And: “It would be a grave error ... to say that Christ has no authority whatever in civil affairs, since, by virtue of the absolute empire over all creatures committed to him by the Father, all things are in his power.” During his life on earth he refrained from the exercise of such authority but his empire embraces all men and (quoting from Pope Leo XIII, he said) his empire includes not only Catholic nations, not only baptized persons who, though of right belonging to the church, have been led astray by error, or have been cut off from her by schism, but also all those who are outside the Christian faith, so that truly the whole of mankind, individual, family and state, is subject to the power of Jesus Christ. If, therefore, the rulers of nations wish to preserve their authority, to promote and increase the prosperity of their countries, they will not neglect the public duty of reverence and obedience to the rule of Christ.

The Church was, according to Pius, founded by Christ as a perfect society and has “a natural and inalienable right to perfect freedom and immunity from the power of the state and ... she cannot be subject to any external power.” Then the reference that private individuals, rulers and princes (must) “call to their minds the thoughts of the last judgement, wherein Christ, who has been cast out of public life, despised, neglected and ignored, will most severely avenge these insults: for his kingly dignity demands that the State should take account of the commandments of God and of Christian principles” Clearly the pope had in mind Herzl’s discussions with his predecessors and the Vatican’s failed bid to prevent Britain being granted a mandate over Palestine when he wrote: “On many occasions, when the Jews and even the Apostles wrongly supposed that the Messiah would restore the liberties and the kingdom of Israel, he repelled and denied such a suggestion.” It was his fervent desire, he said, “that those who are without the fold may seek after and accept the sweet yoke of Christ ...”

In May 1926, within months of the concordat taking effect and the introduction of the Feast of Christ the King, Pilsudski seized absolute power in a military coup, justifying it on the basis of the weakness of Poland’s coalition governments. The process of assimilation of the Ukrainians could proceed, assisted by coercion from Orthodoxy to Roman Catholicism as the state’s version of Christianity and, in view of the level of reluctance to arbitrarily change theology, it resulted in the imprisonment and execution of many of their Orthodox clergy.^{276 277}

Among the other takers for concordats during those years were Latvia (1922), Lithuania (1927), both from somewhat similar motives to Poland, and Rumania (1927) which, having absorbed a Roman Catholic Hungarian minority of 1,500,000, either had to recognize Rome in some way or face a very hostile religious minority. Then there were the German provinces of Bavaria (1924) and Prussia (1929), both in Cardinal Pacelli's territory, and eventually Baden (1932). This gave the Vatican a very good foothold in postwar Germany but it wasn't satisfied. Successive federal governments would not agree to a federal German concordat in spite of Pacelli's concentrated efforts²⁷⁸ and the Vatican saw this as a serious impediment. The church hierarchy intervened directly in German politics more and more. Priests held many important posts in the Centre Party, including the party chairmanship from 1928, in sharp contrast to the prohibition on them joining political parties in Mussolini's Fascist Italy, but the distinction could no doubt be justified by some distorted theological gymnastics. After all, Germany had not yet been given back to God. It was not until 1933 that the Vatican was able to correct that situation, but before we look at the German Concordat we must first look at the life, career and teachings of the man under whose authority it was signed on behalf of Germany.

CHAPTER 18

HITLER'S BLUEPRINT WINS SUPPORT

Adolf Hitler was a product of Christian Europe. Certainly he left his own very big mark on it. But he was essentially a product of the dominant Christian influences of the Europe of Dreyfus, (the affair ran from about his fifth to his seventeenth birthdays); of the Boxer Rebellion; the Boer War; the Edinburgh International Missionary Conference; the papal oath against modernism; the Great War; the twin Russian Revolutions, and the Balfour Declaration. He was no more and he was no less a product of those influences than his contemporaries, who included Marshal Erwin Rommel (two years his junior), President Charles De Gaulle (one year his junior), or the theologian and writer Professor Karl Barth (three years his senior). The fact that they each saw the same situations from a different point of view and reacted somewhat differently makes none of them any less a product of Christian Europe. It simply demonstrates the diversity of human nature, the capacity we each have, by the Grace of God, to make our own choices within the constraints of our particular environment and the capacity we each have to influence others in the way in which they use their capacity. If the factors which shaped his thinking had not also shaped the thinking of a great many other people so that they were ready to respond to him, Hitler would not have been able to carry out the programme which he did.

Hitler experienced his share of family discord. He was fathered by an Austrian customs official of illegitimate birth whose legitimization complicated his extramarital relations. On the death of his first legal wife he had to appeal to Rome for a special dispensation to marry a 'niece' who was already pregnant. Being his mother's fourth-born but first surviving child, Adolf was spoiled. His mother was devout, protective and possessive. But he was maltreated by his father who became gradually more tyrannical. He faced jealousy from his half-brother and he knew personal tragedy when his mother suffered an agonizing, drawn-out death from cancer. At the age of eight he was in the highest grading at school and because of his good natural singing voice his padre encouraged him to attend sessions at the Benedictine monastery choir school. The monastery made a very strong impact on him. The abbot became his boyhood idol; he became intoxicated with the solemn splendor of brilliant church festivals so that for some time he aspired to become a priest. The main feature of the monastery's coat of arms also left a deep impression on him. It was a swastika¹

The Boer War was raging when Hitler started secondary school. At first he was swamped, felt isolated and did not show the promise of his primary school days at the monastery. But it inspired his Germanic patriotism, introduced him to anti-British sentiment and no doubt helped plug the gap that had developed in his confidence so that after a year or so he was again filling a student leadership role. His short-lived clerical ambitions being a thing of the past, he devoted himself to art but messed up his chance to pass his technical school exams. Determined to become a great artist he headed for Vienna and the School of Architecture of the Academy of Fine Arts, only to find that without a certificate from his Realschule the path ahead was blocked. After running through his share of his father's moderate estate while he enjoyed a Bohemian life on the loose he soon got to know hunger and cold nights without a blanket, the limited security of a poor house and the stimulation of debate with his Jewish friends. But he also got to know the stark contrast between his personal poverty and the opulence of Vienna's wealthy merchants, bankers and aristocrats as he struggled to keep the wolf from his coattails by selling paintings on commission.

By the age of eighteen when his mother died in circumstances that left him grief-stricken, Hitler was rebelling at the social injustice of unearned wealth. During his years in Vienna he read extensively and spent hours listening to debates in the House of Deputies. The last acts of the Dreyfus drama were being played out in Paris with the fanatical anti-Semitic campaign by the Jesuits and the disestablishment of the beloved church which was, in part, a consequence of it (chapter 15). Together with a high proportion of the population he soaked up the rampant anti-Semitism of the Christian Socialist mayor, Karl Lueger, (who almost filled the role of idol left vacant by the Benedictine abbot of his school boy days) and of the press which supported him. It was almost inevitable that he would personally identify with the anti-Semitism which was a way of life for Vienna's gentiles. He did. He associated Jews with atheism among Social Democrats, with prostitution and with every form of exploitation. But so did almost everyone else.²

In spite of the depth of his antagonism towards unearned wealth, his experience of poverty and the breadth of his social reading, Hitler developed an almost equal antagonism towards the "doctrine of destruction" of Marxism.³ He probably picked it up from the same sources as his anti-Semitism and, like many people of the time, associated the two groups anyway. It is problematical whether the Marxist connection was another reason to hate Jews or whether the Jewish connection was another reason to hate Marxists.

Then came the throbbing excitement of the threat of war and confusion over his conscription because he had moved from Austria to Germany. Having been rejected as a conscript on medical grounds by Austria, the nation of his birth, he managed to wangle acceptance as a volunteer in the 1st Bavarian Infantry Regiment, which he preferred anyway, just as war was declared.^{4 5 6 7} The motives which drive young men to volunteer for service in the army of another country when they have been rejected by their own are many and varied. In the case of Adolf Hitler, then twenty five years of age, a bachelor and still facing poverty because paintings were very hard to sell, several stand out. The obvious ones, but the ones he would tend to play down, were security and self-esteem. He would have food, clothing and shelter, he would be working with a definite purpose and with a definite role. Then there was patriotism based on the hatred of things and people Serbian or Slavic in general which he had absorbed along with most Austrians from the House of Deputies and the press of Vienna.

But then came the one which Hitler maintained had driven him on. It was patriotism based on Pan-Germanism, which was still being whipped up in all German speaking areas. Pan-Germanism was little different in its basic thrust to the continuing movement for the reunification of all Italian speaking areas which was the basis of the politicking between the Allies, the Central Powers and Italy over Trentino. It was also little different to the Pan-Slavic movement which was taking hold in the Balkans. And, like anti-Semitism, it was a widespread and highly emotive sentiment being vigorously promoted by political leaders long before Hitler came on the scene. Allied politicians and their propagandists would later attribute them to Hitler as if they were both brand new sentiments – they had to if they were to gain the support of Catholics around the world – but Hitler had simply grasped them both and run like any good relay team runner.⁸

In one respect, however, Pan-Germanism differed from the other movements. Not to be satisfied with unification alone, Pan-Germanist leaders were shouting from the roof tops that all men of German tongues must be gathered into “one Reich and one people (as) an everlasting master race” which would direct the progress of mankind. Actually the Pan-Germanists didn't have a monopoly on that particular conceit, or the shouting that went with it. The papacy (and some other fragments of the church) had long maintained that such a role belonged to it. The Jewish concept of a Messianic Age in which the people of Judaism would play a key role had often been misrepresented as the same thing. The self-sown concept of Americanism, representing the people of the United States as the new chosen people, was rapidly developing the same overtones and was about to get a big boost from the eugenics movement. Nineteenth century Britain confidently believed it had already been endowed with the role and men like Cecil Rhodes had done their best to give it a push along. In addition there had been a number of rulers, both before and after the Messiah, who had asserted the right to dominate the rest of the world just for the sake of power and resources, but without the overtone of a God-given right or responsibility to rule. And lurking in the wings were the Bolshevik Marxists, whose approach had its roots in Karl Marx' particular brand of collective messianism.⁹ But their approach was very different.

Contrary to the steady stream of attacks which issued from anti-Marxist propagandists it is impossible to read into Marx's conception of the flow of history and human development a place for a single class, a single power or a single master race to dominate the social, economic or political structures of the whole of Europe, let alone the whole of mankind. Rather, Marx and his followers envisioned a world-wide system dominated by a new set of principles that would allow people to rule themselves and be relieved of the systemic domination of any vested interest group. The industrial proletariat, in whose name Marx wrote and for whom he fought, were viewed only as the carriers of those revolutionary principles, not as a new ruling class. Moreover, during the long period in which he towered over the workers' movements of Europe and was constantly consulted on methods and tactics as well as on revolutionary philosophy, Marx issued no orders and set no patterns which the expected class wars should follow. Even though he was convinced that real social and economic change would be achieved in continental Europe only through revolution he believed that the idea of commanding an overall European Workers' Movement from his home base in London was absurd and he resisted the urge to develop a plan of action which should be adopted for all countries and for all times. He regarded England as the one European country in which peaceful revolution was still possible because social evolution was taking place through concessions "wrung from" the ruling classes under "pressure from without." Even recognizing that, he was deeply concerned for England. The pressure was gradually being relaxed because the working classes did not understand how to wield the power or use the liberties which were already legally theirs.¹⁰

Unfortunately, however, some such as Lenin's Bolsheviks were impatient with the failure of the proletariat to fulfill Marx's predictions and had sought give the revolution a push from above. In so doing they created a tightly controlled political apparatus that was eventually used to completely overturn Marx's principle of government by the masses in favour of government by a single party. As a consequence, when faced with the profoundly negative response to the Bolshevik Revolution in the Christian Capitalist West, an isolated and embattled Russia eventually assumed the domineering attitude to the international socialist movement which Marx had so strenuously tried to avoid. In due course that development would also become a key factor in the deepening trouble in the triangle.

But back to Adolf Hitler. Although his years in Vienna had drawn him firmly into the Socialist camp, it was not the anti-religious and revolutionary philosophy of Karl Marx which Adolf Hitler was becoming steeped in as he swore allegiance to each of Bavaria's King Ludwig III, Germany's Kaiser Wilhelm and Austria's Emperor Franz Josef at Munich on October 8, 1914 in the presence of Ludwig III.¹¹ It was Pan-Germanism.

During the next four years Hitler threw himself into his chosen work as a despatch runner with courage, determination, skill, reliability in a crisis and Pan-Germanic enthusiasm which brought admiration from his superiors as well as six service and bravery awards during the course of the war.^{12 13} It was largely his wish to stay in a role he knew (and was obviously good at) and to stay in the front line which kept him in the ordinary ranks for the duration of the war and gave the allies their chance to taunt him and depict him in propaganda twenty years later as "the little corporal" who had lacked leadership capacity.¹⁴ There were few chances for commissions in his chosen field. He also became known among his fellows for his puritanical attitudes towards smoking, drinking, prostitution (developed from his experience of Vienna) and personal privation.¹⁵

On leave in October/November 1917 for the first time since enlisting, Hitler made a point of visiting the shrine where Martin Luther had preached his first sermon, where Bach had played the organ for twenty seven years and in which Wagner had been baptized.¹⁶ Seeing the pathetic state of civilian Germany he developed a hatred for trash literature at times "when we are concerned with the fate of mankind." He read history and philosophy extensively, starting with Homer and the works of evangelists. But then the soldier who – if he had been fighting for the other side – could have walked straight out of a picture in a publicity leaflet for the Protestant Ethic, began to read Schopenhauer and soon found that he had no further need for the evangelists.¹⁷ He wrote to a friend that even if Christ was a true fighter the turning of both cheeks was not a very good recipe for the front line.¹⁸

Because Hitler had soaked up the German master race propaganda quite freely (probably more freely than a majority but no more freely than a substantial minority of the population) and because he had withheld absolutely nothing in his fanatical war effort, the appalling conditions and the atmosphere of despair which he found in civilian Germany when he was finally persuaded to take that furlough had a very great impact on him. He had been blindly convinced that there was no possible result except a German victory and it shook him to find that even the sawdust and potato peelings which passed as bread in some areas was in short supply; that cats and dogs were being slaughtered for meat; that morale was at rock bottom because the Kaiser's government had failed to agree immediate peace terms with the Bolsheviks in Russia; and that the effort of the troops at the front was being undermined by industrial unrest and strikes.

He would not have known at that stage that the Allies were adopting a deliberate policy of provoking and supporting subversion through exiles and minority ethnic and political groups in an effort to fill the void left in the Alliance by Russia's peace moves¹⁹ and in particular he is unlikely to have known about Britain's Balfour Declaration leaf drop (chapter 16). However he took careful note that minority political and ethnic groups were prominent in the strife, and especially Jews. The conviction that what he had heard and read of them in Vienna's Christian Socialist press was correct grew stronger.

In January 1918 the nation ground almost to a halt with a national strike. In Berlin alone some 400,000 workers were out for almost a week demanding peace without annexations, representation in negotiations with the allies, an end to martial law, and the introduction of democratic government throughout Germany. The Treaty of Brest Litovsk in March lifted the war effort for a time but in August, (a week or two after he received his second Iron Cross on the recommendation of his Jewish battalion adjutant), Hitler's views on Jewish subversion were boosted by a statement from the German High Command. It was General Ludendorff's excited demand that there had to be discipline on the home front as well as more vigorous conscription of the young Jews who had, according to him, been left pretty much alone until then.²⁰ Lots of Germans and Austrians began to think of "Jew" and "Communist" as interchangeable terms for people with any nasty combination of anti-German characteristics.

Within a few weeks of Ludendorff's intervention the war had really turned sour on Germany, mainly because of the flood of US troops which had joined the Allied offensive. But when anti-monarchist radicals calling themselves "Spartacists" began to openly demand an elected government to negotiate a peace treaty, anti-Semitism began to boil over right across Germany. Everyone knew that Russia's new government and its Jewish Foreign Minister, Trotsky, were backing the Spartacists in a bid for revolution, so whatever one thought of the monarchy there was no better target on whom to vent a bit of spleen than the Jews. Of course, what ordinary people in Germany, Hitler included, did not know at that stage was that Russia was not the only foreign power interested in bringing down the monarchy. The Monroe-Doctrinaire, capitalist republic of the United States of America had been trying to bring down the German monarchy for almost a year while it did lip service to Lenin's call for self-determination for everyone (chapter 17).

AMERICAN POLICY: NO MONARCHY OR NO PEACE

By mid August 1918, with the situation rapidly deteriorating, the Austrian and German emperors had agreed that the end was in sight. Less than a month later, as the Allies' unleashed their massive propaganda and subversion programmes aimed at ethnic minorities and national groups' the Austrian emperor sent a peace note to the US president. But Washington was intent on playing its own game. Notes passed between the three capitals soon made it clear that the United States would deal only with representative governments, regardless of Wilson's much vaunted commitment to self-determination. The German government recognized it had no choice but to bow to the inevitable, and on September 29 Prince Max of Baden was appointed as the minister responsible to arrange a parliamentary regime to make peace. He was quickly informed by army chiefs that the German army could not hold out much longer and that an armistice could not wait for parliamentary backing. So, with the gate to Austria opened to the Allied armies by the surrender of Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, on October 4 Germany and Austria sued for peace on the basis of Wilson's "fourteen points."

But Wilson was not about to let them off the hook that easily. Their monarchies had to go whether the Fourteen Points said so or not. The United States was going to have its way. So from that point the Allies threw everything they could lay their hands on at the German Western front, including vast quantities of mustard gas. However, the deferred cost of that decision to pound hell out of the Germans – and the cost of the mustard gas in particular – was to be far greater than Wilson or any of the Allied leaders could anticipate. The victims of random gas shelling near the village of Werwick near Ypres, on October 14, 1918, included Corporal Adolf Hitler.

Like many others, Hitler suffered temporary blindness. It gave him a few days to lie in bed with nothing to do except ponder the news. He was actually going east on a hospital train on October 16 when Prince Max received President Wilson's formal reply with a demand for the Kaiser's abdication. He knew from first hand contact that the effect in Germany was devastating.²¹ But there was worse to come.

On October 23 the US and Prince Max's German Government agreed to the Fourteen Points plus the Kaiser's abdication. This time, however, it was the turn of Wilson's allies to muddy the waters. On October 27, after Italy, France and Britain each demanded further concessions, Wilhelm dismissed General Ludendorff and directed the German army to keep fighting. Austria quickly announced it would agree a separate peace, and two days later an armistice was signed with the Hapsburg regime. It was too much for the German armed forces. The German navy mutinied at Kiel when the Kaiser ordered them to sea, while the army chiefs simply ignored him and went to their opposite number, General Foch, for an armistice.

Government control in Germany was breaking down everywhere. On November 7 Munich was swept by insurrection. The next day Bavaria was proclaimed a Republic, with the elderly Jew Kurt Eisner in command. It was the signal for a nationwide uprising. Across the country, pre-arranged workers groups and soldiers councils emerged, their factories and barracks to take control of Germany in the name of the socialist revolution. In the middle of the chaos and upheaval the German High Command crossed the French lines for armistice talks and agreed to unconditional surrender. By November 9, courtesy of the United States of America, Germany had a new socialist Chancellor, the Kaiser had abdicated, and a republic had been proclaimed.

HITLER'S MESSIANIC VISION

In the meantime Hitler had been recuperating from his gas attack in the Pasewalk hospital and his sight had recovered. He knew Germany's situation was desperate but he tried to persuade himself that rumours of revolution were false until a delegation of Red German sailors burst into his ward to convert the patients to it. Three of their leaders were young Jews. The "commo-Jew" connection from his years in Vienna and from Ludendorff's outburst were reinforced.²² He detested them both even more strongly. The revolution just had to be put down. When the patients were assembled on November 10 for the local pastor to break the news that Germany was a republic and had surrendered the shock and the distress were so great that his blindness returned. Two nights later, on November 12, overwhelmed by misery after the signing of the armistice the day before, Hitler had a vision.²³ He heard voices summoning him to save Germany, and then his sight returned. He vowed there and then to become a politician and to devote his energies to carrying out the command he had received.^{24 25 26}

Hitler carried that vision with him right to the Berlin bunker in 1945. It drove him on. It dominated every decision he took. It determined the way he interpreted everything he saw, heard and read. But when the church and the world began to hear about it they just turned off. It was a sick joke. The army's consultant psychiatrist²⁷ could find no medical reason for Hitler's second bout of blindness and had treated him as a psychopath with hysterical symptoms. His vision, the medico said, was hallucinations, perhaps deliberately induced by Dr Forster as part of his treatment, or perhaps an effect of syphilis which he was rumoured to have contracted from a Jewish prostitute in Vienna²⁸ and which, if it were correct, would have helped to explain his fixation about Jews and prostitution.²⁹

We will return to the matter of visions shortly, but first a note on Hitler's immediate movements after his recovery in hospital. There is a degree of confusion about his movements for some time, no doubt contributed to by deliberate attempts by the Nazi Party to develop myths around its charismatic leader, but also because the influences under which he fell reflect very poorly on the churches and their cohorts in collusion, the Western powers. It appears that upon discharge following his recovery in hospital Hitler made his way south to Munich.³⁰ He had time to ponder Germany's situation and he was greatly shocked by what he saw and experienced in post-armistice Prussia and Bavaria which were then being ruthlessly moulded into the Weimar Republic under Western pressure. This contributed to a period of uncertainty and confusion in his thinking on social policy. The Nilus version of the Protocols was being vigorously promoted in Russia in a bid to discredit and undermine the influence of the Bolsheviks, among whom there were large numbers of Jews, during the continuing civil war which had erupted following the Bolshevik Revolution, and Russian emigres were now eagerly spreading their message in Germany as well in order to counter the uprisings which were led by the Spartacists. Among the first people to carry a copy to Germany, probably in 1918, was an Estonian student of German heritage, Alfred Rosenberg, who took it with him when he was forced to flee from Moscow by the civil war.³¹ The first version of the Protocols to be sighted in Germany was apparently an edition by Ludwig Muller, under the pseudonym Gottfried zur Beek, and this may have been the version which Rosenberg took with him. However, that edition soon caught the attention of people as eminent as Prince Otto zu Salm-Hortsmar and General Erich Ludendorff – and the Pan-German League – who promoted it in their efforts to influence the course of the Weimar Republic.³²

Within Russia the principal promoters of the Protocols were the reactionary so-called White Armies whose members were mainly Orthodox Christians who wanted to see the monarchy reinstated. In turn, their principal supporters and co-promoters were agents of the British, French and United States governments whose main interest was the defeat of the Bolsheviks by whatever means were available. By its involvement in their promotion the British government continued to plumb new depths of religious cynicism. It had justified the Balfour Declaration partly on the grounds that it would help keep Russia in the Great War by promoting Zionist interests and discouraging Jewish participation in the Bolshevik Revolution (chapters 16 and 17) but now, as if in retribution for Jewish thanklessness, it was party to inciting pogroms against the same people in a bid to negate their political influence and bring down the struggling Bolshevik government. Japan was also supporting the White Russians but its motive was to strengthen its claims to territory in the east, and there is nothing to indicate that it was party to the promotion of the Protocols.

Being unaware, at that stage, of the complex international political machinations behind the Great War, the Russian Revolution, the establishment of the Weimar Republic and anti-Semitism, Hitler was shocked that revolution continued after the proclamation of the Weimar Republic. His sense of shock then deepened progressively when the Spartacists dropped their disguise in January 1919, while he was finding his way south to Munich, and called themselves Communists; and when Socialists, including a number of prominent Jews, seized Munich, most of Berlin and a number of key Federal and provincial posts. He certainly did not want to join the massive ranks of the unemployed. He had retained his much-loved military uniform and, on approaching his former unit he was re-enlisted and continued as if there had been no break in his active army service. He was posted to the 7th Replacement Company of the 2nd Bavarian Infantry Regiment in Munich and his experience there as a guard at a prisoner of war camp with mainly Russian prisoners during February-March 1919 had very mixed influences on him.

The founding congress of the Third (Communist) International was actually convened in Moscow by Lenin while Hitler was doing his term of guard duty. The call by delegates from nineteen countries for workers world wide to unite and rise and take political action to gain better conditions would have struck a responsive chord, but the fact that such a call was linked to a call to support the Soviet Union as the Workers' Fatherland was abhorrent to him. He knew that Hungary was in chaos as a result of Allied efforts to undermine the liberal socialist post war republic and that most of the country was occupied by either Czech, Serbian or Romanian forces and that the country was ripe for revolution. However when the revolutionary Soviet government which Bela Kun, a Jewish Communist, set up on March 21, 1919, was reported by the German press to have 25 Jewish Commissars in a total of 32, he was deeply disturbed. Then in April, 1919, his concerns increased when he witnessed the overthrow of the moderate Social Democrat government in Bavaria in a coup which brought to power another soviet government led by three Russian emigrants, two of whom were also Jewish.

Overall, Hitler's experience during those months aggravated his antipathy towards things and people Russian and Jewish, and in his thinking – as in that of many other people – there was a blurring of the identities of Jews, Russians and Communists. He took note that within weeks the Bavarian soviet was overthrown in a bloody counter-coup in which the even more fanatical and murderous Free Forces butchered their way across Germany massacring hundreds of Communists, Socialists and people associated with them in any way. There seems to have been no logic in his thinking about these contradictory issues, but then there was very little logic in how the great powers and the various revolutionaries and counter-revolutionaries were thinking and conducting themselves anyway. The Free Forces were solidly backed by Capitalists of both Germany and its former enemies, plus some of their governments with their neurotic opposition to Communism combined with deeply entrenched anti-Semitism. It is therefore hardly surprising that Hitler was confused by the anti-Communist slaughter taking place.³³ He had not yet developed, or been indoctrinated with, an absolute antagonism to Communism and because he hated the excesses of Capitalism he briefly dabbled with both the independent Socialists and the Communist. He was arrested for illegal activities but he was released on the intervention of his commanding officer because a staff officer, Captain Karl Mayr, had proposed the establishment of a counter-Communist operation under his command and he saw a role for Hitler in it. He was ripe for his next assignment.

HITLER'S TRAINING FOR PROPAGANDA

In June, 1919, Captain Mayr organized his first course for anti-Communist agitators and Hitler, then attached to the Command Company of the 2nd Bavarian Infantry Regiment, was selected to attend. Then on July 22, having completed that indoctrination course which was conducted by 'nationally minded professors' at Munich University, Bavarian Monarchists and "a pan-German monetary crank" named Gottfried Feder,³⁴ Hitler was posted to an 'enlightenment squad' or a 'propaganda commando' at the Lechfeld demobilization camp to help straighten out 480 returning prisoners of war who were said to be demoralized by Communist agitation. As one of his duties, Hitler was required to act as a 'liaison man' to investigate the host of radical groups of both the right and the left which were springing up across Bavaria and which might be usefully manipulated in the anti-Communist campaign. On September 12, he was ordered by Major Hierl to attend a meeting of one such group, the German Workers' Party, which had been organized at the behest of a shadowy figure, Rudolf Freiherr von Sebottendorff, who believed in the Germanic wave of the future led by Teutons who could establish 'the purity of their blood' for three generations, and who had personally established the Thule Society to promote that concept. Von Sebottendorff had not organized the German Workers' Party personally but had used an intermediary who recruited "a seedy sports writer" named Karl Harrer and the founder of another ineffectual group called The Free Labour Committee for a Good Peace, Anton Drexler, as co-founders.³⁵ On that first night Drexler was so impressed by Hitler's fluency in debate on the need to retain Bavaria as part of the German Reich that he urged him to visit the group again. Hitler was apparently not impressed, according to his report for the army, but he recognized that the embryonic party had the potential to attract masses in the way the Social Democrats had in Vienna and he accepted an invitation to attend a committee meeting.

In the meantime, he prepared a statement, dated September 16, in response to an instruction from Captain Mayr for a position paper on 'the danger Jewry constitutes to our people today' which seems to have impressed the captain.³⁶ A key extract of four sentences indicates quite clearly that he had been influenced by the Dreyfus Affair and the manner in which it had undermined Franco-German relations; the Protocols of the Elders of Zion; the Balfour Declaration, and the Vatican's bid to prevent the granting of the Palestine mandate to Britain.

Hitler had barely started school when Captain Dreyfus was arrested and convicted of selling French secrets to Germany, but he grew up as the fantastic episode unfolded. He was nine when Zola published his pro-Dreyfus exposure of the French army's misconduct and was gaoled for his trouble; ten when the first Dreyfus retrial ended in a second conviction followed by a pardon; 15 when the second retrial was ordered and the Protocols began to circulate widely in Europe, and 17 when that retrial finished with his acquittal, reinstatement and award of the Legion of Honour. When Dreyfus was then recalled after the Great War broke out, raised to Lieutenant Colonel and given command of an ammunition column on the German front – rubbing salt into the wounded German religious psyche – Hitler was 25. He was 29 when the Balfour Declaration was announced and 30 when the Vatican stepped up its politicking to prevent the British-Palestine mandate – and as he sat down to write his statement on the dangers of Jewry.

It was inevitable that the potent bigotry and psychological manipulation which had dominated all of his experience would meld with his instilled nationalism and show in his reasoning and his writing. It certainly did. The key extract reads:

*Anti-Semitism on purely emotional grounds will find its ultimate expression in the form of pogroms. The anti-Semitism of reason, however, must lead to the planned legal opposition to and (the) elimination of the privileges of the Jews. Its ultimate goal, however, must absolutely be the removal of the Jews altogether. Only a government of national power and never a government of national impotence will be capable of both.*³⁷

This has been described as Hitler's first public reference to a 'final solution' of the Jewish question, but it is of the utmost significance that it was not a spontaneous outpouring of anti-Semitism but a considered response to an instruction, a response to the circumstances of the time, and a reflection of the dominant attitudes of the time which have been noted. It appears that he had not met von Sebottendorff at that stage but he was certainly in accord with the 'principles' which the prime mover behind the organization embraced.

Then, having accepted an invitation to join the German Workers' Party and to take responsibility for recruitment and propaganda, rather than to just observe and assist it, Hitler set about his new task with enthusiasm, aiming to lift its numbers from a handful into the big league by careful preparation and publicity for a meeting on October 19, 1919. At that meeting he was supposed to be only a support speaker, but he gave an electrifying and passionate presentation at that meeting which convinced him and his audience that he was going in the right direction, and the impact of his views was reinforced by the fact that the Protocols had just then been published in the German language.

At about that time Mayr was succeeded as commander of Hitler's unit by Captain Ernst Rohm, a homosexual man who had survived major facial battle injuries who has been described as an exemplary officer, a comrade to be trusted in peril but who was, in his own words, "a wicked and immature man" to whom war and unrest appealed more than an orderly life. Rohm and Hitler soon developed "bonds of blood and suffering."³⁸ Over successive fortnightly meetings Hitler's anti-Jewish rhetoric, encouraged by his equally radical anti-Semite-anti-Marxist friend and supporter Drexler, became progressively more strident and he became more demanding in proposing that the committee reconstitute the organization as a formal political party. Rohm encouraged Hitler to take over the organization and ensured that he had no effective opposition by seconding other soldiers into the organization to 'keep order' at rowdy meetings. As attendance at the Nazi meetings grew and more soldiers were seconded to help they became known as the Sturm-Abteilung (Storm Division) or SA.³⁹ Also, about that time, Hitler met the Estonian student-refugee from Moscow, Alfred Rosenberg, who had brought the Protocols with him to Germany and who had been active in von Sebottendorff's Thule Society. Their friendship was not spontaneous but it developed rapidly when Rosenberg realized that Hitler was an orator par excellence and when Hitler saw some of Rosenberg's articles published⁴⁰

By the end of December, 1919, Hitler had persuaded Drexler to support a 25-point political program which they then pushed for the committee to adopt. Some members were reluctant, but on February 24, 1920, at a dramatically successful meeting of 2,000 people at the Festsaal of the Munich Hofbrauhaus – after the other soldiers had helped overcome some opposition and rowdiness – Hitler persuaded the party to change its name to the National Socialist German Workers' (Nazi) Party and to adopt the 'unchangeable' 25-point program. Among the 25 points was the demand that Jews be treated as aliens, that they be denied the right to hold public office, that those who had immigrated to Germany after August 2, 1914, be deported immediately, and that the others be deported also if Germany found it impossible to feed its entire population.⁴¹ Hitler and his 25 point plan gained even greater support next day when the anti-Semitic and anti-Marxist newspaper the Völkischer Beobachter, which Eckart was editing, published the German translation of the Protocols.

On March 13, within weeks of Hitler's success at the Hofbrauhaus meeting, right wing army units which had been ordered by the Socialist Weimar government to disband, marched on Berlin and installed a new chancellor, Kapp, in a bloodless coup. Hitler and another colleague from the Nazi Party, a romantic revolutionary academic and poet named Eckart who believed that Germans who married Jews should be jailed for three years, and who had fallen to become a drunkard, drug addict and vulgar charlatan, then went to Berlin with Captain Rohm's support to determine whether joint revolutionary action could be mounted in Bavaria. However when the deposed Ebert government called for a general strike it was so effective that Kapp was not able to control the government; the nation fell into chaos; a 'red army' of 50,000 workers took control of the Rhur; and President Ebert had to re-commission the disbanded right wing Free Corps forces in a bid to control the new uprising.

Hitler remained in Berlin with Eckart through the peak of the crisis. He was still on the army's payroll, even receiving a special allowance for his party political work, and together he and Eckart met Hitler's hero, the extreme right wing General Ludendorff, and numerous ultra-nationalist and racist veterans' groups who were being financed by industrialists until they returned to Munich on March 31, 1920. That day Hitler ceased to be a member of the armed forces. Whether it was by discharge forced upon him or by his free will is uncertain.⁴²

Up to that day Hitler had put his postwar army training as a political re-education officer to very powerful use but now he was at a loose end. It was work which he enjoyed, which he was well suited to. He had earned a reputation as an outstanding orator, he had a deep personal commitment to his new task, and he was ready to take full advantage of it. He had very faithfully obeyed the instruction of his commanding officer (contrary to army regulations) to help build it up.⁴³ It was one of the workers' organizations which had been picked by a group of capitalists and high ranking army officers (including General Ludendorff) to provide a political power base from which to rebuild Germany's military power which had been dismantled by the Allies in their detested peace treaty.⁴⁴ The formal severing of his connection with the army that day meant that he had become a political organizer cum politician with no other commitments, but with no secure income. But the first part of the vow which he had made under the influence of his blindness on the day after the armistice, and his vision, had been fulfilled. The second part would take a little longer. Life would be a struggle for a while. He had to gather financial support from wherever he could and he moved into a single poorly furnished room only a few doors from the offices of the Völkischer Beobachter.

Only three days later, on April 3, the Free Corps Forces swept through the Rhur, murdering with impunity, wiping out Red strongholds and dealing ruthlessly with any people thought to be associated with them. As he responded to the confused circumstances, social and industrial unrest, and Capitalist intrigue and propaganda Hitler was really little different to those who were shaping his thinking and his responses. The outcome was that his worst fears of a Marxist/Jewish push for world domination seemed confirmed. As his meetings became bigger there were bigger efforts to disrupt them and he needed more Storm Troopers for both defensive and aggressive measures, and in April he used his army contacts to secure one of the leaders of the abortive Kapp putsch, Lt. Klitsch, to organize the SA and to bring it more under his control.⁴⁵ The Allies' crushing peace terms and their sectarian and racist propaganda aimed at ethnic groups, and especially Britain's abuse of the Balfour Declaration and the Vatican's efforts to stop it, had been too effective. Anti-Semitism had become a way of life in Germany. A monstrous disease had been released for which there was no vaccine except love, and that had been out of stock for quite a long time, unlike visions.

Reports of visions were becoming quite widespread. Only eighteen months before Hitler's experience, the first of a series of reports about Mary making six appearances to three children near Fatima, Portugal, had begun to circulate. They fell between May 1917, (shortly after both the lifting of all tsarist restrictions on Jews by the Provisional Government and Nahum Sokolow's visit to the pope), and the announcement of the Balfour Declaration. The reports said that Mary asked the children that the people of Russia be consecrated to her under the title of her Immaculate Heart.^{46 47} Other people could therefore have visions or visits from the Holy Ghost, Angels, Mary or anyone else the church approved of, provided they propped up the Church's view of itself. Hitler was, in fact, doing that very eagerly, to suit his understanding of his role, until his and the church's immediate aims began to diverge as their self-assessments came into conflict.

The experiences of visionaries has been a constant basis for conflict and connivance for the Church, as many and varied interpretations had been applied to the visions of Jewish prophets, the Christian apostles, Constantine, Augustine, Muhammad, Thomas Aquinas, Joseph Smith, Juan Diego⁴⁸ and many other people. As if to highlight and to invite debate on the related issues of Divine intervention, visions and both individual and community predestination, the pope, Benedict XV, canonized another visionary shortly after Hitler's experience but before the Vatican was in a position to understand his future political significance.

The canonization of the French heroine, the Maid of Orleans, as Saint Joan of Arc on May 16 1920, provides a classic example of blatant political opportunism. Relations between the Vatican and successive French governments had remained icy long after the Dreyfus affair and the Law of Separation, but there had been an improvement during the Great War because of the pro-Allied stance of the French clergy. Benedict then built on the conciliatory atmosphere by appointing a French clergyman as bishop in charge of occupied German territories in 1919. There was soon a hint in the air that the Law of Separation might be revoked and it was clear that there was even a chance of a new concordat, if there was a bit more public support. The canonization of a national hero might just do the trick. Joan of Arc had become a national heroine when she led the relief of Orleans and the expulsion of the British from most of France following a vision. She persuaded Charles VII to be crowned at Rheims but she was then betrayed, sold to the British to face a Roman Catholic church court on charges of witchcraft and heresy, and burned at the stake for her trouble.

For a country hard pressed to justify its claims for reparations from Germany and struggling to recover from the war, her canonization was good morale boosting stuff. It also made it easier for the government to send a military 'mission' to support Poland in its Vatican-backed war against the Russian Bolshevik government six weeks later, and the two issues, together, made their task a lot less odious for the French troops who were occupying the German Rhineland. By February 1924 agreement had been reached for a scheme to enable the church to keep control of property which had been vested in non-religious associations. But the combined effects of those things antagonized socialists and antireligious friends of the Bolsheviks so that an anti-Catholic backlash resulted in the defeat of the government only three years later and the introduction of new measures to clip the wings of the Catholic church. These included a proposal to withdraw France's embassy at the Vatican.^{49 50}

It is probable that Hitler saw himself as another Joan of Arc when her canonization was made public in May, 1920. It was just three months after his grand performance at the Hofbrauhaus in engineering a change of name for the infant Nazi Party of which he had been a member for eight months and for which he was now well established as head of its propaganda machine, and it was only two months after he had been discharged and became a full time political agitator/organizer. And the announcement coincided with a report in the London Times to the effect that the Protocols should be taken seriously. This aggravated long standing Catholic teaching about the Jews who killed Jesus and Lutheran teaching that they were "a plague, pestilence (and) pure misfortune" and a blight on Christianity which had to be dealt with peremptorily.⁵¹ The stimulus for another burst of virulent anti-Semitism across Europe and in the Americas was considerable.

Hitler now threw himself into the task of developing the National Socialist Party into a powerful, nationwide organization with fully integrated political and para-military wings, able to identify with the interests of people right through the German social structure and dedicated to their leader to the point of fanaticism. It was only then, when absolute power appeared to be within his grasp and when he realized that a reaction against his anti-Semitism could go against him in the ballot box, that he began to soft pedal that paramount plank of his platform.⁵² Until then he had pressed it flat to the boards and neither German voters nor foreign governments could truthfully claim that they had not been warned.

Hitler launched his first full scale public denouncement of the entire Jewish community at another mass party meeting in the Munich Hofbrauhaus on August 13, 1920. He was certainly under the influence of the Protocols, but he was also taking full advantage of them because by then they were being widely distributed in several languages and actively reported and promoted by Catholic press right across Europe. For two hours he lectured a mass meeting in Munich on the dangers of the international Jewish conspiracy. They eagerly latched onto his battle cry “anti-Semites of the world, unite. People of Europe, free yourselves!”⁵³

Events were ‘conspiring’ in Hitler’s favour. Four months later, in December, 1920, Rohm helped him raise 60,000 marks from General von Epp to help buy the Völkischer Beobachter whose proprietors were on the brink of bankruptcy and to make it the party’s paper. Then, within days of the opening of the first National Congress of the National Socialist Party on January 22, 1921, the Allied Supreme War Council made formal reparations demands on Germany. Payments were to start at two billion marks for that year, to rise to six billion marks a year after eleven years and to total 134 billion marks. Hitler now had an effective vehicle through which to push his extreme anti-Allied, anti-Communist and anti-Semitic views, but he was not alone. In fact he was in very good company. Although within a few weeks, in February, 1921, Herman Bernstein exposed the Protocols as a fraud in “The History of a Lie” the church, its allies or others with an axe to grind were not discouraged from raving about Zionist intentions of world domination. Some were fearful of Jewish prominence in international financial circles and the international communist movement; others were simply jealous of the newfound position of privilege and influence of the Jewish community in international affairs; and others, like the Vatican, were fearful of the political and theological implications of the Zionist presence in Palestine.

THE PROTOCOLS

On May 21, 1921, nine months after Hitler’s big ‘launch’ and a mere three months after Bernstein’s book was published, the august, prestigious and immensely influential London Times carried a major article asserting that the Protocols should be taken seriously because they appeared to be genuine documents written for Jews by Jews.⁵⁴ The Times correspondent was among those who fell into the trap of inverting traditional British ideas of justice and called for Jewish leaders to disprove the authenticity of the Protocols. Many different stories of their origin circulated together with variations in the content of the Protocols which were designed to link Jews with everything subversive, revolutionary or ethically undesirable anywhere in Europe. After praising the credentials of “Professor S. Nilus ... of the Department of Foreign Affairs of Russia” under whose name the document first appeared, the correspondent summarized the supposed Zionist plan in seven paragraphs and then showed situations in which it may have already been put into effect. He asked if Europe was to struggle to blow up the secret German plan for world domination “only to find one more secret and more dangerous” and he then called for an impartial investigation into the Protocols because Jewish denunciations of them had not been convincing.⁵⁵ With backing like that there were few people in a position to contradict Hitler except the former tsarist secret police and clergy who had concocted them some twenty years earlier.

Faced with the threat of the occupation of the Rhur, the German Government accepted the terms and paid the first one billion 'old' marks by borrowing in London. It was the British Government's turn to learn what it was like to have its own financiers preferentially prop up a foreign economy to ensure the security of big loans. But Hitler and other German political leaders could hardly be expected to recognize that prospect. They were more concerned with the national humiliation of the reparations scheme and they did not lose sight of the fact that the bankers servicing the loans included connections of those who had previously controlled both French and German loans in similar circumstances. They just couldn't escape from those former "court Jews."

THE BLACK SHAME

But there was another aspect of the reparations scheme and the threat of occupation of the Rhur which bothered people like Hitler at least as much as economic humiliation. The social humiliation of the "Black Shame." The stationing of black troops from the French North African territories as part of the occupation force in the Rhineland had caused another running sore in relations between Germany and France since the armistice. It was said that the black French troops were routinely raping German women and children, that they were more beastly than white European troops, and that France was using them to humiliate Germany.

In April 1920 the Papal Nuncio in Bavaria, Archbishop Eugenio Pacelli, who was waiting in the wings to become Nuncio to the Weimar republic as well and acting on behalf of the German bishops, relayed these reports to the Vatican Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, and advised that in order to improve relations with Germany, the Vatican should intervene with France to force it to remove the black troops. During the following months a German government enquiry produced a report of "the crimes committed by these troops: a catalogue of sadistic abuse, rapes, and horrendous assaults on women and cruelty to children, among other things."

On December 31, 1920, Cardinal Adolf Bertram of Breslau relayed the German government's report on atrocities by French black troops in the Rhineland to Rome. The French were, he said, planning to send even more black troops to the area, preferring to employ "African troops who, in the savage absence of culture and morals ... inflicted unspeakable assaults ... in a situation that has become known as the 'Black Shame.'" At the same time a rabble-rousing campaign against the black French troops was whipped up overseas to such an extent that the US House of Representatives responded to "patently racist petitions" by commissioning its own investigation.

On January 16, 1921, five days before the opening of the Nazi Congress, the French ambassador to the Holy See sought to quell the fury by explaining that there was only a small number of North African troops in the region and that most of them were from an old civilization “among whom there were many Christians.” He dismissed the “odious propaganda” inspired by Berlin. But the US House committee went further. The United States should take no action on the complaints coming from the German government and the Holy See, it said.⁵⁶ However Pacelli had set himself a twin target: to achieve the maximum centralization of clerical power in the office and person of the reigning pope by means of the recently promulgated Code of Canon Law; and to extend and consolidate the power and influence of the Vatican world wide, starting with Europe, by means of a system of binding church-state concordats. He had completed the drafting of the code in 1917 and he had also succeeded in finalizing a concordat with Serbia – to the great advantage of the Vatican but with equally great disadvantage for Austria – only four days before the Archduke was assassinated and while he was still working on the code. Now he was in the middle of sensitive negotiations towards a concordat with Bavaria which he saw as the first step towards a complex of concordats with each German state and with the Weimar Republic as well. He had generated considerable recognition for the Vatican within Germany by his intervention in the dispute between Germany and France over the “Black Shame”; he could see more ‘mileage’ in that dispute yet, and he was not to be put off by a minor thing like a US House of Representatives report. Either he cared nought about the impact of his actions on international race relations or he had tunnel vision on the matter because, on March 7, as the Ruhr Reparations row approached its peak, he wrote again to the Secretary of State. This time he urged papal intervention on behalf of the molested German women and children. Gasparri declined to pursue the matter or to make any further approaches to the French government. To do so, clearly implying that France could not properly handle race relations questions, and that would have undermined its case in another matter of international relations about which it was about to go public. The controversy therefore raged on. It has been described as a “shaping experience” in Pacelli’s attitude to race and war,⁵⁷ but it is more likely that his attitude was already firmly fixed, because his later actions as pope during World War II were consistent with his actions in 1921. Hitler took very good note of them, too. Blacks joined Jews on his hate list.

Then, only a matter of days after the German government accepted the Ruhr Reparations terms in order to avoid occupation, the Vatican publicly machine entered the act again on the other matter. Some of its advisers had thought very carefully through the political and theological implications of the Balfour Declaration and of Jews settling in Palestine and Jerusalem, and they didn’t like their conclusions. The Vatican was not yet in a position to make a full-blooded push for concordats but it held some hope of forcing the Zionists out of Palestine. While Britain was trying to sort out how to manage its most recent acquisition,^{58 59} the Vatican began to lobby for either direct control over religious affairs in the Holy Land or indirect control through the extension of the authority of the church in Lebanon. When Winston Churchill, newly appointed British Colonial Secretary, visited the Middle East in May 1921 and then reported to the House of Commons in favour of the policy of Jewish settlement the battle appeared to have been lost.⁶⁰ But the pope, Benedict XV, in his final year, tried a desperate long shot.

On June 8, 1921, writing in the official Vatican journal Acta Apostolicae Sedis (XIII 282–283), Benedict appealed to “the governments of Christian nations, even non-Catholics”, to make a joint protest to the League of Nations.⁶¹ It was more than an effort to force Britain to change its policy. It was an effort to have the provisional British mandate withdrawn and to have Palestine added to the French mandate over Syria and Lebanon which had also been agreed in April 1920. As already noted, relations between France and the Vatican, though still somewhat strained, were improving. On one side, France was insisting on its claim to “protect” or have diplomatic responsibility for all Catholic Christians in the entire Holy Land as part of its mandate.⁶² It was therefore calling on every possible reserve to strengthen its negotiating position with Britain, with whom relations were strained because of the problems generated by the Great War and, in this particular situation, by Britain’s multi-faced conduct in the Middle East. On the other side, despite Vatican and Italian opposition to French demands for commercial privileges which went with the long standing Turkish capitulations, the canonization of the Maid of Orleans only weeks after the mandates had been agreed had certainly helped the rapprochement, and French control of Palestine was more welcome to the Vatican than British pro-Zionist control.⁶³

However the Vatican also had its relations with Germany to consider. The government of Chancellor Joseph Wirth, stung by the Allied reparations demands and the French occupation of the Ruhr, was pressing Archbishop Pacelli to conclude the concordat which he knew Pacelli personally wanted, in the hope that this controversial ‘surrender’ would be compensated for by Vatican support for Germany in its other major territorial dispute: Poland had laid claim to Upper Silesia. The plebiscite which had been held on March 20, 1921, in accordance with the League of Nations direction that a plebiscite would decide the future of the region, had resulted in a heavy popular vote in Germany’s favor. However the Poles had secured a majority in the economically important south eastern area and in May the Silesian Poles staged an armed uprising, demanding inclusion of that area in Poland, in line with the Polish government’s claims.⁶⁴ Therefore, because Pacelli also wanted a concordat with Poland, the missing jewel of Eastern Europe (chapter 17), he could not take sides in that territorial dispute and he had to find alternative issues which might provide a springboard to public support for a German concordat. The issue which interested him most was privileges for the Catholic school system, but the government was not eager to negotiate over these. They were not politically acceptable. Perhaps a domestic blast across the border at France over the ‘black shame’ may do the trick. It did not. It merely stirred up more race hatred. Then perhaps the Jewish question may be more effective. It was useful for so many purposes ...

THE CONVERGENCE OF PROPHECIES

Although the Times correspondent may not have known of Bernstein’s book when his report was published in May there can be no doubt at all that Vatican officials were well aware of it when Benedict XV made his appeal for League of Nations intervention. Nevertheless, the venom of attacks in semi-official and church-related papers against Jewish influence and supposed plans for world domination increased. About the same time a Vatican spokesman advised the Zionist Organization that the Holy See did not want to help the Jewish race, "permeated with a revolutionary and rebellious spirit", to gain control over the Holy Land.⁶⁵ Hitler was still in very respectable company.

Unfortunately, however, leading Zionists in Palestine under British patronage had acted in such a manner that when Benedict played his long shot they had given him plenty of ammunition. He was able to base his case on the misconduct of Jews towards Christians coupled with the threat of Zionist ambitions, and he therefore needed to say little about Vatican politics.

Britain had been caught in the net of its own politicking by the need to honour undertakings made to its financial backers, the need to keep faith with the hoards of Jewish recruits queuing up in the United States and the need to maintain its propaganda initiatives in Europe. It had invited a Zionist Commission to leave for Palestine in March 1918. The need to establish the British government's credentials had been so urgent that the appointment of the commission could not wait until the end of the war. The commission's task was to provide a link between the British military administration and the Jewish population, to co-ordinate relief work, to help restore and organize Jewish communities, and to establish good relations with communities of Christian and Muslim faith.⁶⁶

The impact on the Arab population, which was being treated like a useful colonial ally and had still not been advised officially of the Balfour Declaration, was apparently of little importance to Britain.^{67 68} In fact when the commission arrived the British army was still held down at Jericho, barely twenty five kilometers from Jerusalem, and it made no progress until forces could be released from the European Western Front after another six months. Under the circumstances it is hardly surprising that the commission did not see its role in the same light as the British military authorities. The government had not even briefed the hastily improvised and constantly harassed Occupied Enemy Territory Administration on how it was expected to relate to the Zionist Commission. The first of the three Chief Administrators in quick succession was simply instructed to make the Commission welcome.

The tightrope which he and his successors had to walk suddenly went slack every now and then as they tried to wrestle with a series of conflicting facts. They knew that their government had made three commitments which were not readily compatible; that the Palestinians were present as the legal occupiers with long established communities; that the Jews were entering as new settlers with very varied expectations; that Britain had been dependent on Arab support in its war in the Middle East against Turkey; and that Britain was currently heavily dependent in its overall war effort on the goodwill and influence of the Zionist Commission. The Commissioners were not slow to take advantage of the situation. They knew that Jewish communities world wide, whether Zionist or not, were keenly watching them for tangible evidence that the return to Eretz Israel and relief from Christian persecution were achievable. Under such pressure they allowed their enthusiasm to get the better of them.

The majority of the commissioners apparently saw themselves as wartime interim administrators in occupied territory preparing the way for the establishment of a self-governing Jewish State promptly after the war. In any case they were so deeply committed to the Zionist concept and the belief that Palestine was theirs to do more or less as they pleased with it that they were determined to hold Britain to the promise which they believed was implicit in the Balfour Declaration. And there were some very influential names associated with the Commission. Dr. Weizmann was a member together with Edwin Samuel, (son of the future British High Commissioner), and two government nominated Political Officers accompanied the commission. They were Major Ormsby Gore who later became Britain's Secretary of State for the Colonies and Major James de Rothschild.

The Jewish commissioners had probably never paid any more attention to Muhammad's Night Journey and the Qur'anic prophecy about the consequences of the Jewish community transgressing against its neighbours (chapter 6) than any of the Christian cabinet ministers of Britain who had invited them to go to Palestine and who had also arranged for Dr Weizmann to be presented to the Defender of the Faith, HM. King George V, at Buckingham Palace on the eve of their departure.⁶⁹ If they had, they didn't let it influence their actions once they reached Palestine. Although Dr Weizmann talked of joint autonomy for Jews and non-Jews and urged conciliation and a gradual programme to establish a Jewish homeland, the Zionist Commission, as a body, did not see the Palestinian Arabs, whether Muslim or Christian, as their equals. Neither did they see themselves as alien immigrants or refugees seeking a home and security in another land. They regarded Palestine as if it had been left vacant after the destruction of the city of Jerusalem and the expulsion of the Judeo-Christian population. They ignored, or lost sight of, the pastoral and fruit growing enterprises complete with irrigation systems which were well established, and they acted as if the existing community was devoid of social, legal and political structures or a well defined system of ethics based on an intense belief in the absolute authority of God. They acted just like all the other Europeans who had either set out to escape religious persecution or to set up a colony in a non-European country. They regarded Arab Palestinians as subjects in much the same manner as the British going into India or the French going into Algeria. They did not think of what they were doing in terms of transgression. They were well trained by Britain, by heritage, to think in terms of the rights and authority of a colonial power: not the rights of indigenous people. In fact as the early Arab welcome changed to opposition when their colonial policy became apparent, they began to look more and more like Italians in Libya egged on by pulpit and press talk of Holy War against the Muslims in the immediate prewar days of Pius X.

The commissioners would almost certainly have been familiar with Maimonides and his expectations of the Messianic Age, but, apart from his references to the legitimate roles of both Christianity and Islam alongside Judaism in leading humanity to an understanding of God, they would have had little reason to think of specific Qur'anic passages. And the commission also made the mistake of assuming that every Palestinian Jew was a Zionist eager to usher in a new regime in much the same way that Napoleon III had expected Vietnamese Catholics to spring into action to help the French forces. Every Jew was expected to speak Hebrew and to stop speaking Yiddish but many, including some senior Orthodox Rabbis, refused. Every post was to be a winning post and the Commissioners adopted a policy of confrontation with the British authorities to gain as many of their demands as possible. They adopted the name Eretz Israel in place of Palestine and they were soon demanding that the British administration submit its policies to the commission for approval before putting them into effect. One of America's most prominent Zionists, Justice Brandeis, threw his great political weight behind the demand. An effort was made to impose a policy under which the Jewish community could have armed forces, but not the Arabs, and the Commission pressed for a policy of positive discrimination in favour of Jews and against Muslims and Christians in civil court actions.⁷⁰

The Zionist Commission had not simply sought to correct the long-established discrimination against Jews but had begun to reverse the pattern of discrimination. As time passed and the commission strengthened its position, discrimination in such matters as land settlement, employment and political franchise became more marked. In short the Jewish community was in the process of triggering the fulfilment of Qur'anic prophecy. It had transgressed against its non-Jewish neighbours. However its actions had not been spontaneous. It had been driven to transgression out of sheer desperation. Its basic motive was self-preservation but in pursuing that quite natural aim it had deviated from the task which was basic to its self-understanding. To some of its number self preservation and national prestige had taken precedence over a commitment to the task of their faith. They had done no more than the Christians of Europe had been doing for a very long time. In fact they had done a great deal less. But they had transgressed, and they were about to experience the fulfillment of the prophecies of both Muhammad's Night Journey and Maimonides' The Law of Kings and Their Wars.

The responsibility for the situation lay fairly and squarely on the shoulders of Christian Europe but the Jewish community and not the church was about to become the focal point for a reassessment of the Messianic message. People of the three faiths in the triangle were in conflict at their home base and the challenge of the Balfour Declaration was out in the open. Some fragments of the Orthodox and Reformed wings of the church were taking it seriously but the church of Rome, still the most influential wing, was sticking to its well established policy of rejecting all challenges outright. And while Benedict XV was unsuccessful in his immediate aim of ending British control of Palestine, the Vatican was not about to change its mind on how best to respond.

A number of events and trends in other countries during that period had an important bearing on the social and economic environment in Europe and on Hitler's thinking and his subsequent actions. The Bank of England joined the private financiers in helping to boost Germany's economy and thereby reduced the appeal of a revolution by supporting the establishment of a new gold-based German bank.⁷¹ In the United States the Eugenics Record Office campaigned successfully for the introduction of race-based immigration laws and legal sterilization programmes to control human breeding.⁷² In Italy Mussolini had seized dictatorial powers and was in the process of crushing press, union and parliamentary opposition. And in Russia Joseph Stalin, General Secretary of the Communist Party and Commissar for Nationalities, began to consolidate his personal power and to move towards his ruthless dictatorship which destroyed the last shred of Marx's principle of government by a broadly based popular movement. At the same time he came into increasing conflict with Russian Jews. As we shall see, this was not because he was anti-Semitic by nature, but because the Jewish community had suffered more than most in each of the Great War, the Revolution and the Civil War which was a consequence of them, and because its expectations for the future had been inflated by the Zionist movement and the Balfour Declaration. In addition, Stalin was locked in a power struggle with Trotsky and other leading Jewish members of the ruling bodies.^{73 74} So, in September 1921, just two years after Hitler provided his first systematically prepared denouncement of the Jews for his military colleagues, it was a simple step to the first organized physical assault by Nazis on Jews in public in Munich – carried out with Hitler's encouragement.⁷⁵

Then, while the Vatican's anti-Semitic propaganda continued to poison the atmosphere in Europe and provide Hitler with plenty of support, the League of Nations played into his hands again. Being more concerned with honoring subversive favours to the wartime allies than with the economic, geographic and ethnic links which it was placing under greater strain, it ruled in October, 1921, that southeastern Upper Silesia was to become part of Poland.^{76 77} That region to be ceded to Poland produced an estimated four fifths of the resources of the whole of the province of Upper Silesia on which Germany had become heavily dependent. Most important were three quarters of Silesia's coal and two thirds of its steel. That heavy dependence had developed because of French occupation of regions in the West under the protection of the League of Nations. Coming only seven months after the crippling and demoralizing reparations demand, that decision piled insults and injuries onto a nation already humiliated and inflamed by unconditional surrender and the enforced dismantling of its monarchy. The whole lot provided a hothouse climate for Hitler's doctrines.

A PLEA FOR A CONCORDAT

As the uprisings continued and added weight to Poland's territorial claim, Chancellor Wirth was so eager – desperate might be a better word – to gain the Vatican's support that he asked Pacelli to give him in writing "a list of points to which the Holy See attached special importance."⁷⁸ In view of Germany's tumultuous relations with the Catholic Church ever since the Reformation, and especially during and following the Kulturkampf, it was indeed humbling for Wirth to even have to make such a request. He knew that the Vatican's demands would be linked to its self-understanding and its determination to gain and to hold a position of preference or privilege over other wings of the Christian church and other faiths as well as financial and ecclesiastic privileges, and such demands were likely to be politically unacceptable within Germany. When he made his request he was probably painfully aware that Italy had agreed to join the war against Germany on the specific condition that the Vatican was excluded from any peace negotiations, and the Allies were in full accord with that condition. They didn't want the Vatican interfering and playing the concordat game either. But now, with changed circumstances and as leader of the defeated power, he was appealing for Vatican intervention, prepared to make humiliating concessions to it, in the hope that it may have some influence on the powers which had agreed that it should not have any role in the process. Nothing in the contemporary scene could have better illustrated the self-understanding of the Roman Catholic Church and its never ending grab for power to determine the domestic and international policies of the countries in which it claimed to be the sole representative on earth of the Triune God. However the fantastic conflicts of interest and pressures to which it was prepared to subject both its adherents and non-adherents (of any faith) under its policy of Ultramontanism, with all authority in matters religious, social, economic and political centralized in the Vatican in Rome, were largely concealed from the world at that time because, by their devious and dubious nature the negotiations were carried out behind closed doors and with a minimum of publicity. It was power politics of the most undemocratic nature.

The Nuncio's first offering was virtually a draft of the Bavarian concordat "with conditions relating to the schools question that for Prussia constituted an insult," but in December, 1921, he aggravated the situation by reinforcing his key demand at a meeting in the Kultusministerium with both the minister and the Secretary of State. He would assist Germany, he said, by making a rapid appointment of a German bishop to Trier in the Saar region, but only if the government would cooperate on the schools question in the concordat. To apply even more pressure he then added what has been described as 'his usual rider.' The Holy See, he said, would think itself better off without a concordat if it could not get its own way over the schools.⁷⁹ Pacelli had Wirth over a barrel. The Saar was under League of Nations administration but France had effective occupation of the coal producing regions from which it was to be virtually the exclusive beneficiary for fifteen years under the Treaty of Versailles (chapter 17). This led, naturally, to a territorial dispute between Germany and France with which the Vatican was also in the middle of delicate negotiations in which the Vatican had already applied very crude pressure by means of the 'black shame' affair. The appointment of a German bishop in Trier would be seen as a very definite statement that the Vatican considered it to be in German territory, and such an action could prejudice the Vatican's French negotiations. It would not prejudice those negotiations with France by entering an arrangement with Germany unless it was going to be a clear winner.

There was apparently no substantial discussion of the crisis which had prompted Wirth's approach to Pacelli – the dispute with Poland over the future of Upper Silesia – and the German ministers observed at the end of the meeting that the problems of German politics appeared to be beyond Pacelli's grasp. In fact he was both more politically astute and more devious than the German government gave him credit for. He was playing several hands all at once: Germany (the Weimar Republic), its states of Prussia and Bavaria, France and Poland. On January 6, 1922, Pacelli sealed a deal through coercion and collusion between the Weimar government and the state of Prussia which was intended to minimize non-Catholic opposition to a concordat and to condition public opinion generally, and which he believed put him well on track towards his key objective of a concordat with the central German (Weimar) government. He coerced Prussia, the largest of some twenty German states, into signing an agreement that it would discuss the school question "at the request of the Reich" and then promptly appointed a German bishop in Trier.⁸⁰

While Pacelli boasted about his achievement, the two senior Catholic prelates in Germany were aghast at what he had done. One, Archbishop Schulte, wrote to the other, Cardinal Bertram, on January 9, 1922, describing it as a most extraordinary risk which would encourage the French to greater acts of territorial aggression which, in due course, would work against the interests of the Vatican in Germany. Bertram then told Pacelli that the Prussian state's authority in education was sacrosanct and implored him not to overreach himself. However, when Pope Benedict XV died during the course of that correspondence and was succeeded on February 6 by Cardinal Achille Ratti of Milan who took the title Pope Pius XI, both the Secretary of State, Gasparri, and Pacelli as Nuncio were retained in their positions. This meant that there was no change in policy towards the negotiation of concordats and Pacelli's authority increased. He showed "a characteristic mixture of persistence and recklessness"⁸¹ in his continuing dealings with the Weimar government, undermining any chance which he may have had to secure a concordat with it, and, in his desperation to secure one, left himself vulnerable to manipulation by Hitler when he came to power a few years later.

The relentless pressure which the Allies and the US continued to apply to Germany over reparations, the crises with both France and Poland which were linked to it, and the Catholic Church's reactionary manipulation to take advantage of it as well, gave the Weimar government excellent reasons to conclude a treaty with Bolshevik Russia at Easter 1922, but that decision forced Hitler further and further into anti-Semitic anti-Communism and, at the same time, increased his determination to either harness or restrain the church.

Hitler had gradually become a figure to be reckoned with. In November 1922, in the wake of Mussolini's October march on Rome and his consequent appointment by King Victor Emmanuel III as the youngest-ever prime minister of Italy, the United States diplomatic military mission was briefed to interview and report on him. Its officers rated Hitler "a marvelous demagogue" with immense power over the mob; a great leader of men who was working slowly and efficiently along the same lines as Mussolini. They knew that if Hitler idolized anyone it was Mussolini. He took note that the Italian Fascist leader was able to manipulate the constitutional system of government and his team of coalition ministers which still included two Catholics from the Popular party; that the ordinary middle class job seekers were flooding into the Fascist Party; and that the Fascist Black Shirts were incorporated into an official voluntary militia for national security. Hitler told one of the US investigators quite bluntly that the present abuses of capital had to be done away with before Bolshevism could be put down and that the parliamentary system had to be replaced by a dictatorship to put Germany back on its feet.

Their report, noting that Hitler was an extraordinary orator who would play a big part in Germany's future, was calmly filed away in the State Department.⁸²

The French and Belgian occupation of the Ruhr for two months, on January 11, 1923, on the pretext that coal and timber deliveries had been withheld, confirmed Archbishop Shulte's fears about the possible effects of Pacelli's interference. The Weimar government retaliated by halting reparations payments and deliveries, and called for passive resistance through strikes; the resulting unemployment required it to pay the workers compensation; terrorist groups, aided by the army, struck at the industrial infrastructure; chaos reigned; the German mark went into free fall against the US dollar and within months it was worthless. France complained bitterly that the Vatican was favouring Germany and this was confirmed publicly on June 28 when L'Osservatore Romano published an open letter from the pope in which he condemned the French occupation of the Ruhr and the harsh reparation terms. Pacelli claimed that the turmoil was undermining his chances of negotiating a German concordat and prompted by him, Gasparri warned the French prelates that France was playing a dangerous game in the Ruhr.⁸³ Then, sharing Hitler's concerns about Germany's friendly relations with Russia, and claiming that Soviet Russia was about to take advantage of the turmoil to move into Western Europe, he was able to bring German and French government representatives together and to represent the Vatican as the noble-minded peace maker. It was a further – and quite remarkable – extension of the Vatican's manoeuvring to capitalize on the peace processes from which the Allies had very deliberately excluded it. This time it was France which was forced to accept the process. Certainly it was not the first time that it had found it wise to accept Vatican intervention. But, as in the experience of other countries, it was not the expectation of an enlightened contribution by the self-proclaimed sole representative on earth of the Triune God which had encouraged that situation. It was the fear of being placed at a disadvantage either by Vatican-German politicking or intervention by Russia, or both, if France rebuffed the Vatican's overtures. And just at that time the Soviet government's oppression of counter-revolutionaries in the churches had given each of the Vatican, Germany and France cause for concern and reason to seek each other's support.

The Catholic Church was quite small in Russia compared with the Orthodox Church and Islam, but all three, together with Judaism, were suppressed with equal vigour: the Orthodox for its share of responsibility for the pathetic social conditions which prevailed under the former monarchy and which precipitated the Bolshevik Revolution; the Catholic because of collusion between its clergy and the Allied and US forces in supporting the counter revolution; Islam because it was a threat to the atheistic teachings of Marxism; and Judaism for the same reason and because of the political influence which its adherents were perceived to exercise. The level of antagonism within the Communist Party towards institutional religion was such that it had been declared a crime to teach religion to children under sixteen years of age; churches, synagogues and mosques were destroyed or converted to museums or other public facilities; and any pretext was good enough to imprison the clergy. But earlier in the year a series of arrests of Catholic clergy at Mohilev for having fostered the counter revolution, the torture and grizzly execution of the Vicar-General on Good Friday, the imprisonment for life of the exarch of the Byzantine Catholic Church, and an accelerated campaign of deportations to Black Sea labour camps had sent chills down religious and political spines in Western capitals.⁸⁴

However Germany's own turmoil had triggered uprisings in Munich and demands for social and political change in the state of Bavaria which were not being satisfied by the government of the day. Against that background, and encouraged by members of the Wagner family (including the neurotic and racist son-in-law, Houston Stewart Chamberlain) and startling predictions of 'destiny' by the astrologer Frau Elsbeth Ebertin, Hitler began plotting a Bavarian coup at the beginning of October. The result was the abortive beer hall putsch on November 8, 1923, which, at first sight, appeared to do little more than provide the opportunity for Hitler to rest in prison from November 9, 1923 to December 20, 1924 with plenty of time to study both domestic and international politics and economics and to write Mein Kampf. However it shocked members of the Bavarian government into realizing that Hitler and his Nazi mobs may try to strike again and it encouraged them to finally conclude the concordat which Pacelli had been working towards for five years. Such a concordat could be expected to bring the authority of the entire Catholic clergy to bear on the Catholic population and that should provide a security blanket against any further attempts by Hitler to destabilize constitutional government. It was back to Constantinian basics: religious conformity was supposed to be a road to political stability.

Hitler took careful note when the concordat was approved by the Bavarian parliament in January 1924 and then signed into effect in March. Pacelli got everything he wanted: recognition, protection and advancement of the Catholic Church and all its associations and institutions for all time; recognition of the Catholic Code or Canon Law as the norm for the appointment of archbishops, bishops, monsignori and canons throughout Bavaria; and full authority to run religious instruction throughout the entire Bavarian education system as well as uninhibited powers to run religious schools. The only concession he appears to have made was to undertake that because the state was to pay the salaries of all clergy, only persons with citizenship in Bavaria or another German state were to be employed.⁸⁵

In the circumstances it probably bothered Pacelli very little that under the Bavarian Concordat the Vatican could not send (other) Italian clergy into Bavaria. However it did bother him when his negotiations for a Prussia concordat were undermined by his public boasting that he was going to negotiate a Reich Concordat based on the Bavarian model to enable him to impose his will on Prussia, the biggest state. Then on November 27, 1924, while Hitler was still in prison, the Prussian state government told the Reich government that it was no longer acceptable for Rome to be in a position to dictate church-state policies for the largest German state on the basis of the Bavarian model. Prussia therefore intended to negotiate its own concordat so that there would be an office of the church in Berlin with full authority to negotiate instead of only in Rome, it said. The Prussian government either did not understand the over-riding authority which would still lie with Rome because the rigid policy of Ultramontanism was still firmly in place, or it thought that it could circumvent that policy.

However the Prussian declaration still had a sting in its tail: there could be no over-riding Reich Concordat without the consent of the Prussian government.⁸⁶ Pacelli knew that in view of that condition he would have to bide his time to achieve his major objective: a German national concordat. He had (almost) picked off the two main German states, but he did not want twenty or so separate state concordats. He had only wanted one at all in order to put pressure on the Reich government to sign a national concordat.

HITLER'S BLUEPRINT

Volume I of Hitler's remarkable book *Mein Kampf*⁸⁷ was published about six months after his release from prison. Volume two did not appear until December 1926, two years after his release, by which time he had gained absolute authority for the affairs of the National Socialist Party throughout Germany. By then the ecumenical movement had gained strong support within the Reformed and Orthodox wings of the church in Germany, and Pius XI was making his bid to catch up in the numbers race through commercially endowed foreign mission programmes.

The remarkable thing about Mein Kampf is that there was nothing new in it at all. Hitler's "new philosophy" was simply a collection of ideas from both contemporary and earlier writers, politicians, theologians and scientists whose works he had read. Most of them were famous, influential and highly respected. Mein Kampf might therefore have been a blueprint for the ideal society. It could have been a pathway to Salvation. Instead it was a pathway to tragedy, to despair and to the Holocaust. But it was also the means by which the ultimate challenge to the church and the trouble in the triangle (which is the visible consequence of the rejection of the challenge) were brought to a head. It became the trigger which forced the world to accept the Zionist State of Israel when the Vatican was trenchantly opposed to it and when Britain had finally reneged on the Balfour Declaration.

Mein Kampf is a parody on the amorphous gel of early twentieth century Christianity. It was not written as such, and neither was it recognized as such. It was written in deadly seriousness, but until its author was on the verge of power it was not taken very seriously outside the immediate circles of Germany's National Socialist Party. The psychopath who wrote it voluntarily consulted a psychiatrist before he put his "new philosophy" into practice and later said he wished he had not written it.⁸⁸ He had not changed his views. He simply feared that a reaction against his anti-Semitism might prevent him from holding office and thereby prevent him from putting his plan into effect.

It is a damning self-inflicted indictment of the church that it failed to see in Mein Kampf a parody of itself and its connections. Its leaders, its members and its connections, with a few notable exceptions, could identify with some of Hitler's views and proposals so readily that they were either unable or unwilling to recognize or condemn the evil effects of the overall composition. It was not until the consequences of Hitler's borrowed ideas began to shake the world as he put them into effect that the people of the amorphous gel recognized the depth of the evil in them, began to rethink their ideas and began to respond to pressure from the rest of the world to change course.

Mein Kampf reads as if Hitler's eyes and ears acted as selective filters on a slush pump. They filtered out much that was compassionate, sympathetic to the aspirations of mankind at large and constructive in human relationships. They let through much that was cruel, unbalanced, perverse and destructive of human relationships. What collected in the cesspool of Hitler's mind then flowed freely through his pen, often disjointed, inconsistent and contradictory, to be strung together with bitter reactions to Germany's treatment by the Great War Allies and a few fine sounding statements of community ideals, both of which ordinary Germans could readily identify with. The whole lot formed the ultimate in nationalistic and racist propaganda, a blueprint for disaster and a mocking archive for the discredited ideas and misconduct of the Christian West.

After the outbreak of World War II the props on which Hitler built Mein Kampf were knocked away one by one either by disciplined scientific or Biblical study, by simple logic or by the pressure of events around the world. However, in the social and political wake of the devastating consequences of Mein Kampf the church dived for cover behind a rampart of Councils and revised statements, and has tried to parry criticism with the little white lie that "they were Hitler's ideas, not ours." The organized fundamental rethink began but faltered and, especially in the Vatican wing, has been actively discouraged because of that all-consuming fear of the effect on the church's self-understanding and worldly position. And in recent years a number of the props have reappeared, but much of the world has forgotten that they were discredited in the rush to put Hitler down.

SOURCES OF HITLER'S INSPIRATION

To go through Mein Kampf and identify possible sources of the confused ideas, some of which are taken out of the context their originators intended, is useful to help grasp the role of the book in bringing the trouble in the triangle to a head. Some of the sources for the anti-Semitism which obsessively dominated Hitler's "new philosophy" are listed by D. C. Watt in his introduction to Mein Kampf.⁸⁹ They include The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion which Bernstein had shown to be based on a deliberate parody on the earlier papal prop, Napoleon III, for which Maurice Joly spent fifteen months in gaol in the 1860s.⁹⁰ Then there are the Social Catholic journal Deutsches Volksblatt, the Catholic paper Das Vaterland, and the journal Ostara, published by a Cistercian monk, Lanz von Liebenfels, who claimed to have provided the basis for Hitler's thinking and who was (in his later years) rejected by the hierarchy of his order.⁹¹ But there are many other papers, both religious and commercial, including Henry Ford's 'Dearborn Independent'; writers such as Goethe; the intensely nationalist and racist composer Richard Wagner; and even leaders of the Reformation, including theologian Martin Luther.

Hitler's anti-Semitism was closely linked to his beliefs in the German or Aryan master race and the acceleration of its development by controlled breeding. In promoting those ideas he was able to catch the crest of a wave given impetus by Darwin's theories of evolution. Darwin's ideas had not only provided a direct challenge to the church's self-understanding and teaching but, ironically, had prompted widespread social theories which were used to support the racist Athanasian Creed and to establish the science of eugenics.

A seminal influence on Hitler's thinking was Houston Chamberlain, the son of an admiral who renounced British citizenship, took German nationality and (as noted above) married the daughter of composer Richard Wagner. In 1899 Chamberlain published Foundations of the Nineteenth Century. It ran through eight editions in twelve years in Germany and had immense impact there before being translated into English for the American market in 1912. Wilhelm II described it as his favorite book and he had copies distributed to army officers, diplomats, schools and libraries.

Chamberlain set out to reconcile Christianity with German nationalism, racism and anti-Semitism. He claimed Jesus was not a Jew but a "Teuton." He blasted the ecumenical movement and groups like the World Missionary Conference for showing tolerance, humility and sickly humanitarianism. Christ, he claimed, would never have sent an apostle to such a gathering. There was a 'plus' for the Vatican, but with an easy flow of rhetoric he also wrote that Rome presided over "chaotic mongrelism" and that it was among Germans with their uncompromising character, sense of absolute justice and impelling will to triumph over all circumstances that true Christianity flourished.⁹²

Another source of inspiration for Hitler was the Essay on Inequality of Races in which Frenchman Count Arthur de Gobineau had earlier promoted his belief that the decline of civilization was inevitable because of racial interbreeding. Like Chamberlain, de Gobineau's influence was widespread, and had helped to poison the atmosphere in America before the Civil War when the country was struggling to sort out the built-in mess of the slave trade. The influence of his Essay shows in Abraham Lincoln's statement (in debate in 1858) that he was not in favour of "social and political equality of the white and black races ... of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people..." He believed there were physical differences which "will for ever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality (and that) there must be the position of superior and inferior..."⁹³

Those sentiments were shared by a prominent Englishman of the late nineteenth century, Herbert Spencer. In contrast to de Gobineau, however, the 'liberal' Spencer favoured complete separation of the races without imperialist exploitation of one by another. He annoyed a lot of his fellow racists with his incisive overview of the United States in the nineteenth century. "First men are sent to teach the heathens Christianity, and then Christians are sent to mow them down with machine guns ... The policy is simple and uniform. Bibles first and bombshells after."⁹⁴ The lack of reaction from the church was very telling.

But it was the organized systematic application of social Darwinist ideas which was of greatest consequence for Hitler's program, and there was no shortage of examples to follow. A Laboratory of National Eugenics had been established in England in 1904 and the Eugenics Education Society was set up three years later to complement it through the circulation of eugenics propaganda. The first eugenics society on the Continent was formed at Munich in 1910, three years before Hitler arrived there from Vienna. It was the Internationale Gesellschaft fur Rassenhygiene and its honorary president was Francis Galton, the Englishman who had launched the movement with his study paper entitled Hereditary Genius (1869) in which he proposed that man promote his own evolution by encouraging breeding by “better endowed stocks of men” and by preventing breeding by those less well endowed.⁹⁵ Other societies were set up in Scandinavia, France, Austria, Italy, Russia, Japan, South America and the United States and in 1912 the first International Congress of Eugenics was held in London with 800 scientists present.⁹⁶

But although the movement had begun in Britain and several other British writers including Spencer and Chamberlain contributed much of its early “evidence” and philosophy, it was in the United States that its growth was most rapid. It was also in the US that its fantastic beliefs were first written into laws to provide Hitler with models for his racist population control laws.

The New York-based Eugenics Record Office was established by Charles Davenport in 1910, the year the Munich society was formed, and shortly before the translation of Chamberlain's book reached America. His summer schools had already trained 258 field workers by 1912. The nation's racist pot, never allowed to cool down completely, began to simmer again. The Eugenics Research Association was established in 1913 and the Birth Control Movement, led by Margaret Sanger, a year later. There was plenty of organized opposition by the time the discriminatory “Grandfather legislation” went before the Supreme Court in 1915 but it was still declared unconstitutional and Negroes were again officially entitled to vote. Not to be outflanked by the processes of law, a number of bigots, more determined than most and led by Atlanta preacher Colonel William Simmonds, re-established the Ku Klux Klan. Prompted by the Eugenics movement and related racist propagandists the Klan soon adopted not just an anti-Negro stance but an anti-immigrant, anti-Jew and anti-Catholic stance from an Anglo-Saxon Protestant base. By 1923 its membership was being variously estimated at between three and six million out of an adult male population of about thirty million.⁹⁷

With the probability that the United States would get involved and would need to recruit a large army for foreign service, the Great War influenced many people to accept the court's decision on the “Grandfather legislation” with better grace than they might have otherwise. When the war finally engulfed America too, it brought another complete load of propaganda which contradicted the line from Chamberlain and added anti-German racism to the established mix. Then when it passed and a flood of Slav and Russian immigrants, including a high proportion of Catholics and Jews, descended on America just as about 1,500,000 troops were being demobilized, the emphasis lurched again and the Ku Klux Klan had its propaganda ready made.

In the mean time the Stamford-Binet scales of intelligence and tests to go with them had been “perfected” by Lewis Terman and his associates. Without proper regard for educational, cultural and environmental influences, they were used to assess more than 1,700,000 recruits. America’s Anglo-Saxons were delighted by the results. Not only were all non-whites reckoned to be inferior to whites but the army’s chief psychologist reported that the tests “brought into clear relief ... the intellectual inferiority of the Negro.”⁹⁸

Flooded by undesirable immigrants, unemployed soldiers and unintelligent Negroes the Anglo-Saxons eagerly took to The Passing of the Great Race by lawyer Madison Grant (1916), in which he called for race-based immigration restrictions, a race based franchise, laws against inter-racial marriages, and the disenfranchisement and compulsory sterilization of the feeble, sick and criminal. There was little immediate opposition when he said that before the discovery of the truths of eugenics there was a case from a Christian and humane point of view for “indiscriminate charity for the benefit of the individual” but that without a plan for sterilization of the unfit such charity was of “more injury to the race than black death or small pox.” Then came the punch line and Hitler’s selective filter system went into top gear. “The laws of nature (said Grant) require the obliteration of the unfit and human life is valuable only when it is of use to the community or race ... (It is a) ... mistaken regard for what we believed to be divine laws and a sentimental belief in the sanctity of human life ... (which tends to prevent) ... the elimination of defective infants.”⁹⁹

By 1919 the pot was well and truly boiling again. Race riots occurred in many cities, fear of red-rag Bolshevism was being whipped up as the US prepared to join the Allies in bringing down the Russian government through “intervention”, and fourteen states enacted laws to criminalize worker organizations and the expression of critical opinion.^{100 101} Universities began to restrict or to ban Jews and Negroes. Fifteen states made English the sole language for schools and Henry Ford began promoting the Protocols stories through his dealer chain. Candidates for political offices from postmasters to presidents were quizzed on the race control question and Warren Harding, perhaps reluctantly, bowed to pressure and supported changes to immigration laws in his presidential campaign in 1920.¹⁰²

After Harding’s election the clamour increased. Dr Alfred Wiggam proclaimed that God had previously spoken to man through burning bushes, stone tablets, prophets and dreamers but now the instruments of divine revelation were the microscope, the spectroscope, the telescope, the chemist’s test tube and the statistician’s curve. These things, he said, added an enormous range of new commandments and moral codes together with the means of putting them into effect. Advanced, civilized races were plunging backwards, biologically, and efforts to improve man’s lot instead of man were hastening his destruction. According to Wiggam, Jesus did not subscribe to “the facile doctrine that all men are created equal” and if he had been among us he would have been president of the First Eugenics Congress.¹⁰³ In America: A Family Matter, Charles Gould called for the repeal of naturalization laws¹⁰⁴ and Kenneth Roberts claimed that if a few millions more of Alpine, Mediterranean and Semitic stock were poured into America “the result must inevitably be a hybrid race of people as worthless and futile as the good-for-nothing mongrels of Central America and Southeastern Europe.”¹⁰⁵ From Dr H. Laughlin came the news that immigrants made up a disproportionate percentage of America’s insane, criminals and poor. He concluded from that rather obvious circumstantial development that immigrants had “inborn socially inadequate qualities.”¹⁰⁶ And from Dr Charles Josey came a call for the colonial powers to rigidly control their “natives” and for their populations to be held in check by the dissemination of birth control information.¹⁰⁷

With that sort of domestic pressure around it while the echoes of the Allies’ racially provocative and subversive Great War propaganda still drifted across the Atlantic the United States federal government introduced immigration controls in 1921. The maximum number of immigrants from any country was set at three percent of the number of residents from that country already in the US in 1910. It was a deliberate attempt to stem the flood of Jewish and Catholic refugees and immigrants from the Slav states of Eastern Europe and Russia.¹⁰⁸ A number of states either introduced or tightened sterilization laws and expanded institutions and asylums for the feeble-minded, insane, epileptics, criminals, drunkards, drug addicts, syphilitics and prostitutes.¹⁰⁹ The United States was going to be kept Protestant and pure by keeping such people off the streets. The prevailing philosophy was “let’s not worry about understanding the circumstances of such groups, their causes or means of offsetting them, let’s just hide them away and sterilize them.” In the same year the Supreme Court decided that a ‘primary’ for the selection of a political candidate was not part of an election. It could therefore be conducted on any franchise a party determined. This provided an alternative to the outlawed ‘Grandfather Legislation’ and within eleven years all of the southern (former Confederate) states had introduced some form of white primary election which effectively disenfranchised Negroes once more.¹¹⁰

But these moves failed to satisfy the race bigots and the eugenics fanatics, and the clamour for further tightening of the regulations increased. Vice President Calvin Coolidge wrote in 1922 that biological laws showed that “Nordics” (a regionally more acceptable racist term than “Anglo-Saxons”, “Teutons” or “Aryans”) deteriorate when mixed with other races. Secretary for Labour James Davis went even further. He said that the older immigrants to America were the beaver type that built America, whereas newer immigrants were rat men trying to tear it down. Rat men, he said, could never become beavers!¹¹¹

Such was the situation when Hitler paid a visit to the aging Houston Chamberlain on September 30, 1923, and found complete harmony in their ideas. Chamberlain wrote to him a few days later that: “With one blow you have transformed the state of my soul. That Germany, in the hour of her greatest need, brings forth a Hitler, that is proof of her vitality.”¹¹² Hitler was actually working on Mein Kampf in gaol when the US Immigration Act was tightened to restrict immigration to 150,000 persons per year with the limit on migrants from any country set at two percent of the settlers who arrived from it prior to 1890.¹¹³ That threw the balance heavily in favour of the so-called ‘Nordic’ peoples from England, Ireland, Germany and Scandinavia and cut to a trickle migration from Italy, Russia, Poland, Austria and the Balkans. In addition Japanese migrants were totally excluded, in line with the ban on other Orientals which was already being enforced. Secretary of Labour Davis announced triumphantly that American immigration policy had passed through the earlier phases of, firstly, the principle of asylum and, secondly, the economic need into a new phase of the biological ideal.¹¹⁴

The self-styled “new Chosen people of God” were making the White Australia Policy look quite amateurish and Hitler was having a field day. In Mein Kampf Hitler praised the United States’ immigration controls; he declared that citizenship should not be a matter of birth and that women and foreigners should be subjects and not citizens.¹¹⁵ He had absolutely no place for universal suffrage.¹¹⁶ He claimed that pandering to ethnic groups fragmented a society, that a higher race needed a lower race to do its dirty work; that interbreeding was a sin against providence and that eugenics had to be employed to further improve the German master race.¹¹⁷ Henry Ford and Mussolini, he said, were great men.¹¹⁸ And noting the conflict between Britain and the United States for control of Iraq, he showed greater astuteness than many Western observers gave him credit for in stating that the “child of the great mother seems to be growing into a new master of the world.”¹¹⁹

The future Fuhrer devoted quite a lot of space in Mein Kampf to expounding his non-colonial colonial policy. “Never forget”, he wrote, “that the most sacred right on this earth is a man’s right to have earth to till with his own hands, and the most sacred sacrifice the blood that a man sheds for this earth.”¹²⁰ Fine sounding words. He could have been speaking for the American Indians, the Australian Aborigines or the Palestinian Arabs. But it was the other nations of Europe, and the United States, from which he took his inspiration and what he really meant appeared on other pages.

There were immense areas of unused soil waiting to be tilled or to be exploited for their resources; they were not reserved for any particular nation or race; and they existed for the people with the force to take them and the industry to cultivate them.¹²¹ So what he really meant was the sacred right was really only for Germans and the blood sacrifice should be anyone else’s. But all the non-European land had now been grabbed by European colonizers which stood like pyramids upside down, with their “absurdly small” home bases supporting the weight of their colonies and foreign trade. The lessons for Germany from this and “the only possibility for carrying out a healthy territorial policy lay in the acquisition of new land in Europe itself.”¹²² That possibly puts too much order into Hitler’s inconsistent ramblings, but the basic message was clear. Europe’s racist colonial policy was now to be applied in Europe itself. Using such starting points, he quite disarmingly discussed Austria and the Polish, Slav and Russian territories which Germany must acquire to have its colonial pyramid right side up. The inferior peoples of those territories were to provide the labour for the people of the German master race on a greatly expanded home base.

So it went on. Germany would have to remodel its propaganda machine and messages on the lines so successfully used by the Allies during the Great War.¹²³ Democracy was a redundant deception, according to Hitler. Mussolini had the right idea and the ridiculous Marxist concept of equality had to be eliminated. There were to be no such things as majority decisions.

Parliament would be revised so that it became a working institution without votes.¹²⁴ To round it all off, there would be no room in the German master race state for any of the three “poison fangs” of the Jewish supra state: Masonic secret societies, the supranational press and international Marxism.¹²⁵

Having thus left no doubt about his attitude to the fictional Jewish ‘supra state’, Hitler completed his parody with an equally forthright appraisal of a far more real ‘supra state’ – the Catholic Church. The world, he proclaimed, could learn by the example of the Church which, through its doctrinal edifice, resists sacrificing one syllable of its dogmas in spite of collision with exact science and research, stands more firmly than ever and will gain more and more blind support as a static pole amid the flight of appearances.¹²⁶ However, the Church would have to be more dogmatic, more nationalistic and more forthright in its anti-Semitism.¹²⁷ It also had to take full advantage of incredible strength and vigour in the age old institution of celibacy which ensures its spiritual suppleness, iron willpower and “instinctive bond with the emotional world of the people.”¹²⁸ And it had to stop wasting time and money on mission work among Zulus, Hottentots and Negroes in Central Africa where “our ‘higher culture’ turns healthy, though primitive and inferior, human beings into a rotten brood of bastards.”¹²⁹

THE WORLD HAD BEEN WARNED

So: Hitler was out of jail, Mein Kampf had been published and its author was back on the hustings whipping the mob into a frenzy. The message contained in Mein Kampf was clear. But there were too few people alert to the dangers to heed the warning. The tide of the times was flowing steadily in the opposite direction. In fact by the time Hitler came to power, Denmark, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Iceland, and the Canadian province of British Colombia had joined a total of 28 states of the US with sterilization laws.^{130 131}

Fortunately a few consciences were beginning to stir. In the United States, where the tradition of the cultural ‘melting pot’ could be expected to create points of resistance and opposition, organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured People (founded 1909), the National Conference of Christians and Jews, and the American Civil Liberties Union were gradually gaining more confidence and influence. After the adoption of amendments to the immigration act in 1924 while Hitler was studying and writing in jail, they began to campaign strongly against racism. Anthropologist Franz Boas, a Jew, provided effective leadership and many biologists, geneticists and anthropologists also became more critical of the claims of the eugenics movement, but it was the eventual revulsion at Hitler and his parody which really shook the foundations of racism.¹³²

But the institutional church was still slow to react. The Federal Council of Churches in the US took an active interest in industrial affairs but was inclined to falter on the issue of race.¹³³ The churches connected with the council drew the bulk of their membership from conservative, economically and socially stable middle and upper class groups corresponding to Marx’s bourgeoisie. It was to exactly those groups that the main thrust of racist and eugenics propaganda had been directed so successfully and they were caught in a pronged stick. After the Jerusalem Missionary Conference at Easter, 1928 (chapter 17) there was a definite lift in their support for the establishment of colleges for Negroes, slum betterment schemes and evangelical programmes but they were still scratching the surface with marked diffidence. The real effort did not begin until the Great Depression, but it is impossible to apportion credit for that awakening between humanitarian compassion, an understanding of the Gospel, reaction to Hitler's parody and fear of Bolshevism.

Within the Catholic ghetto in the United States the main motive behind social action was still preferential protection of the interests of 'the flock.' This was being stimulated strongly by the change from an Irish/German base as the unwanted and denigrated flood of Catholic migrants arrived from eastern and southern Europe. The Catholic community generally, and the new part of the flock in particular, was affected more than the majority by the changes to social and migration laws from 1921 to 1924. The pressure to accept birth control, the threat of asylums for the feeble-minded and the threat of the sterilizer's knife hung over them more than over the bulk of the community, together with deliberate oppression by some deeply bigoted sections of the Protestant dominated employer groups. Because of that situation the Catholic Church naturally took a more active and more hostile stand against the diabolical laws of that period.

Out of the hypocrisy and bigotry which engulfed America after the Great War a new era in the Catholic Church's attitude to social issues was dawning. It had a hellish history to make up for but a few sparks were flying and they were bound to catch in the tinder-dry grass somewhere. Considering the circumstances in the United States between the two world wars, (especially after the Ku Klux Klan developed its three pet hates and had gained the active support of between one and two out of every ten adult males), it would have been reasonable to expect the Catholic Church to develop some sort of working alliance with the Negro and Jewish communities. At the very least an understanding of their problems and the development of a community of interest could have been expected because of their joint persecution. However no such developments took place. The gulf between the Catholic Church and the largely Protestant Negro community which had been dug deep during the days of the slave trade could not be bridged.

However there was one gulf which could be bridged: the gulf between the Vatican and Fascism. The extent to which the Vatican was prepared to go to impose its will and the manner in which it did not want to share the exercise of power with lay Catholic politicians were plain for everyone to see. It was common knowledge that the two Catholic ministers in Mussolini's cabinet had withdrawn under pressure from the Vatican which said it did not like Fascist policies towards the church. It was also common knowledge that in April 1924, when Mussolini was going through the motions of another election, the Vatican disowned the Popular Party and forced its Catholic leader to resign.¹³⁴ The Vatican wanted total control of negotiations with the government and it did not want mere lay politicians getting in the way. And Hitler's comments during the next three years on the exercise of power by the Catholic Church were to show that the situation was certainly not lost on him. He understood it very well indeed.

Shortly after his release from prison, on February 26, 1925, he wrote in the Nazi Party newspaper that the National Socialist Movement would not be dragged into religious disputes; and in Mein Kampf he noted the importance of drawing a distinction between political Catholicism and religious Catholicism, that there was potential within the Catholic Church for resistance to National Socialism, and that a confrontation with the church in Germany would lead to a catastrophe and was to be avoided. He wrote:

When church dignitaries make use of religious institutions or doctrines to injure their nation, we must never follow them on this path and fight with the same methods. For the political leader the religious doctrines and institutions of his people must always remain inviolable; or else he has no right to be in politics, but should become a reformer, if he has what it takes! Especially in Germany any other attitude would lead to a catastrophe. ¹³⁵

Then in a Nazi circular in 1927 he wrote that there would be no new Kulturkampf in his battle with the Catholic Centre Party. He would, he said, confront the party purely on the basis of political perceptions. And, in response to personal correspondence from a Catholic priest who was a Nazi sympathizer, he avoided any suggestion that the National Socialist Party and the “immense technical apparatus” of the Catholic Church were in direct competition for the hearts and minds of the people. He noted that in all circumstances it was “a misfortune when religion, regardless (of) which form, is joined to political parties” in the pernicious politicization of religion, but said it was not the task of the party to appeal to ‘loyal Christians.’ It simply had to “win back for the nation all the elements of itself and its moral and spiritual culture which were lost.”¹³⁶ However Hitler clearly saw himself as both politician and reformer because he subsequently contradicted that statement in Mein Kampf on the inviolability of religious doctrines and institutions with the same gay abandon with which he saw the Catholic Church interfering in politics to the injury of many nations.

At the same time, Mussolini's ability to cling to power without being confronted by the Catholic Church, in spite of widespread belief that he was implicated in the elimination of a key opposition leader, was not lost on Hitler either. The Vatican was more eager than ever to resolve “The Roman Question” by means of a concordat, and rapprochement with Mussolini – the bridging of the gap – could provide the means. There was nothing to be gained, in the Vatican view, by confrontation with the Fascists over a few ruthless measures which Mussolini took to stay in power. That would only widen the gulf. However the process of rapprochement with them, which was proving too slow – four years too slow – could be helped along a bit by an assault on the Ecumenical Movement which would show that the Vatican did not agree with its opposition to strong, centralized totalitarian government. Mortalium Animos, issued on January 6, 1928 (chapter 17) helped quite a bit.

But the Vatican still had to wait a while. The Italian Concordat was not agreed to until late 1928 when world and domestic circumstances made it advantageous for Mussolini to turn to the church for the prop which was announced on February 22, 1929 (chapter 17). It was music to Hitler's ears and he was able to exploit it to great advantage. In an article in the Nazi Party newspaper the same day he warmly welcomed the concordat and wrote that: "The fact that the Curia is now making peace with Fascism shows that the Vatican trusts the new political realities far more than (it) did the former liberal democracy with which it could not come to terms (and) by trying to preach that democracy is still in the best interests of German Catholics, the Centre Party ... is placing itself in stark contradiction to the spirit of the treaty signed today by the Holy See."¹³⁷ Then the Vatican struggled to justify its contradictory positions and the institutional Church continued to struggle with issues of race and community relations while Italy and Germany, together with the world-at-large, were thrown into chaos as a result of the efforts of the Allies and the United States to extricate themselves from the mess they had got themselves into by prolonging the Great War and moving against Bolshevik Russia.

THE GREAT DEPRESSION

From 1916 onwards, economic stagnation in the United States had been buffered by the growth of its war industries and the mass recruitment of Southern states Negroes to work in them in the northern states. The social patterns of northern cities had changed as a result, and this had contributed to the race problems already discussed.¹³⁸ While they were being worked through, the economy was boosted by continuing high net immigration and by the growth of the motor vehicle, highway and housing construction and chemical industries. It was during the 1920s that the growth of the synthetic chemical industry began to change the petroleum industry from a simple energy supplier to the supplier of vital and complex raw materials as well as energy. And that industry grew up very largely on some 4,500 German patents sequestered and freely applied in US industry through the nonprofit Chemical Foundation after the Great War.¹³⁹

Economic theories and policies were being developed and shattered as the US also became caught by the war loans which it had made and refused to remit, and by the gold standard which it had insisted be adopted. It found itself exporting more capital to Europe and Latin America, competing domestically with the foreign industries it was propping up in order to obtain repayment of loans, and maintaining in power some Latin American and other governments whose ability to achieve stability and to attract the loyalty of their own people was highly suspect.¹⁴⁰ The payoff for that support was further commercial advantage for US operators and the treadmill of political corruption was soon running at full speed.

The US had thus been able to achieve reasonable economic stability during the mid 1920s and it seemed to have overcome the establishment of the Socialist movement in America and the attempted substitution of "Christian Socialism" for the Protestant Ethic.¹⁴¹ However Europe was still under great strain and a conference was convened at Locarno, Switzerland, during the third quarter of 1925 to resolve the major territorial issues. A series of agreements and treaties were eventually signed on December 1. The Franco-German and Belgo-German boundaries and the status of the Rhineland as a demilitarized zone were all confirmed in a major treaty signed by France, Belgium and Germany, and the terms were guaranteed by Britain and Italy. Germany concluded arbitration conventions with France, Belgium, Poland and Czechoslovakia; France signed treaties of mutual guarantee with Poland and Czechoslovakia; and Germany was admitted to the League of Nations about the same time that France and Belgium vacated the Ruhr which they had occupied in 1921 when Germany defaulted on reparations payments. It was also granted a permanent seat on the Council. The reparations and Great War loans arrangements which had been modified by the Reparations Commission under the Dawes Plan only a year earlier were also reworked again during the Locarno negotiations. Under the Dawes Plan a fixed annual rate of reparations payments had been introduced, the government was given until 1988 to complete payments, and the German State Bank had been reorganized. The outcome was hardly more satisfactory.^{142 143} Then, in accordance with a round of disarmament negotiations and in response to demands for financial restraint, Britain continued to run down its navy while the USA, Italy and Japan each increased their overall war capacities.¹⁴⁴

French Foreign Minister Briand, who was given much of the credit for the diplomatic success of the Locarno Conference, was concerned that treaties alone would not be sufficient to prevent a return to the battlefields of Europe as countries sought to improve their positions. He proposed that governments should renounce war as an instrument of national policy and in April 1927 he approached his American counterpart, Secretary of State Kellogg, for their countries to set an example by making a joint declaration outlawing war. Kellogg opposed the idea of a bilateral statement or agreement, but believed a multilateral pact may have some value. Accordingly a Convention was held in Paris and in August 1928 delegates from nine powers signed the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Subsequently 56 more countries agreed to the pact. Its strength was that it included Germany and both the United States and the Soviet Union, neither of which were members of the League of Nations, but it was of limited value because it had no mechanisms for punitive action against aggressors and made no direct demands on the sovereignty of those who signed it. At least it was a step in the right direction.

Unfortunately, while these major treaties and pacts were under discussion, the continuing strains from financing the Great War and reconstruction had begun to tear the Western world's monetary system apart. Since the outbreak of the Great War the United States had changed from being a net international debtor to an international creditor of major importance and in about four years from 1925 some $US5 billion flowed out from its artificially booming economy in foreign loans. To avoid some of the recognized complications from that pattern the US government took a series of steps, the likely effects of which were less well understood.¹⁴⁵ Rash speculation in unsound securities was followed by panic selling of shares on the Wall Street stock market, beginning on October 24, 1929, and continuing until October 29. Many banks failed immediately. The stock market collapsed, businesses closed and unemployment in the United States leapt from 3.2 percent of the 'normal' workforce in 1929 to 15.9 percent in 1931, and 24.9 percent by 1933.¹⁴⁶

In the socio-economic circumstances of 'dog-eat-dog and every man blame the next one for his woes' there was very little prospect of the enormously deep gulf between Rome and the Jerusalem Conference lobby against racism being bridged. Perhaps no real effort was made to bridge it. Certainly Pius XI made a call for racial tolerance and the training of native clergy in his Rerum Ecclesiae in February 1926 but the primary motive behind that has already been discussed (chapter 17). It was to be another forty years or more, plus Hitler's parody, several lesser wars and a series of Latin American dictatorships, before a new era in Catholic social attitudes became well established.

But within weeks of the stock market collapse shock waves echoed around the world as country after country followed the United States into economic catastrophe. The New York Stock Crash and the economic depression focussed attention on the inequality and the potential for exploitation inherent in the Capitalist system even more sharply than the famine which had triggered the round of revolutions of the 1840s. As a consequence the Christian Western World became a social and political battleground at least as traumatic as during the closing stages of the Great War. Tensions between countries and tensions between social groups within countries became profound.

In Germany the situation was especially acute. Its remarkable recovery since Locarno turned sour. Three million people were soon out of work and the repercussions were felt immediately in the adjacent countries, especially France – the main beneficiary of the reparations provisions. These were the countries in which the Vatican's politicking had been a critical influence and in which there could now be a strong backlash against the Catholic Church. The hard-won Prussian state concordat had been signed by the government only four months before the crash, in mid June, after protracted and acrimonious negotiations. Pacelli had been forced to compromise on a number of issues. The government, which agreed to pay the salaries bill, had the right of veto over the appointment of bishops in a very complicated system which involved both the cathedral canons and the Holy See. All clergy were required to have gained degree level qualifications and, as with Bavaria, to be citizens of the German Reich. But, in particular, the concordat contained no reference to schools at all. During the drafting stage, when Prime Minister Braun insisted that there could be no provision whatsoever on schools, Pacelli had replied that he could not go back to the Holy Father in Rome with a draft concordat that did not mention schools. But Braun stood firm: "I can't go to parliament with a concordat that does mention schools without exposing myself to certain defeat." So the draft was agreed and the eventual parliamentary motion to approve the concordat was passed, in mid July, by 243 votes to 171. But Pacelli promptly angered a very large part of the constituency by claiming in an official note to Braun on August 5 that the compromise on the schools issue had been made under pressure, and that he had not renounced the fundamental principles which had been secured in other concordats.¹⁴⁷ The government was under notice that the matter was henceforth a major political controversy, but by November, within days of the crash, it was engulfed by so many social and economic controversies that religious bigotry and the schools question simply merged into the whole complex.

Pope Pius XI recognized immediately that dynamic leadership was needed in the church's international relations and this could no longer be expected of a Secretary of State approaching eighty years of age. He decided that Cardinal Gasparri should retire and be succeeded by Archbishop Pacelli. It can only be assumed that he put more weight on Pacelli's success as a political negotiator than on the extent to which he caused or aggravated ecumenical and social crises. After all he did expect, on the basis of the church's developed dogma and self-understanding, that whatever happened on the world stage the Catholic Church would come out on top and continue as the sheet anchor of Western Christian civilization which would eventually encompass – or engulf – the world. The Nuncio received his summons to return to Rome late in November, 1929 barely a month after the stock market crash; he left Berlin on December 10 to flamboyant and highly orchestrated demonstrations of religious fervour by the Catholic community; he was elevated to Cardinal within a fortnight; and on February 7, 1930, he was in office as Vatican Secretary of State, second only in authority and power to the pope.

In his new capacity Pacelli took unto himself direct responsibility for all concordat negotiations, paramount among them being those with Germany and its states. He even told the new nuncio in Berlin that he would not be involved in the negotiations.¹⁴⁹ Pacelli was the pope's "favourite cardinal" and because Pius XI was plagued with illness and entrusting more and more responsibility to him there was virtually no restraining him.¹⁵⁰ He was determined that he would achieve a national German concordat, regardless of the opposition which had now erupted in Germany. It was only a matter of time. He expected that it would be with the Weimar Republic under its existing constitution. Why should he expect otherwise? He therefore kept the pressure on the government in parallel with moves by the German bishops to isolate Hitler, exactly as he had expected.

With growing tension between Germany and the Allied reparations recipients the matter of discipline and command in the army of the Weimar Republic had become a matter of tension between certain military commanders and the government. One issue concerned whether all chaplains in the army should be responsible to a specially appointed military bishop or to the diocesan bishops of their own churches. Pacelli saw this as an issue which he could exploit in negotiations for a national concordat in place of the schools issue which had backfired on him. On March 9, 1930, he proposed that Catholic chaplains report to their own bishops and sought a meeting to discuss "a concordat relationship with the Reich in order to secure the fulfilment of the modest wishes of the Holy See as a quid pro quo from the Reich." However the economic and political crises in Germany were compounding rapidly; democracy was under threat from parts of the army and powerful industrial interests; the grand coalition government collapsed on March 27 and consideration of Pacelli's proposal was deferred. By the time his request was again under consideration, in June, a devout Catholic from the Centre Party, Heinrich Brüning, had been installed as Chancellor and Pacelli no doubt thought his chances of success were brighter. However his request was brusquely rejected.¹⁵¹ Within weeks the Brüning government had also fallen and a general election was called for September 14.

At that election that the Nazi vote rose eight-fold, from 810,000 in 1928 to 6,371,000, or 18 percent of the total vote and its representation jumped from 12 to 107 in a parliament of 577 members, in spite of Vatican interference of a very vexing kind in support of opposing Catholic-led parties, tinged with encouragement for Italian Fascist style corporatism. At the same time some clergy had run an anti-Nazi campaign and the Nazis were not at all pleased. When the Nazi regional command in Mainz sought clarification of a local priest's ban on party membership the vicar-general confirmed his action. The religious and educational policy of National Socialism is inconsistent with Catholic Christianity, he said, and no Catholic may be a card-carrying member of 'the Hitler Party.' If one was, "he may not be admitted to the sacraments."¹⁵² That was exactly the kind of action and interference which Hitler, as a Catholic of long standing, had anticipated and which he feared could keep him from office.

In the chaotic wake of the election President Hindenberg appointed Brüning, whose Catholic Centre Party had only 68 seats, to form another minority coalition government. Even the Communists had more seats: 77. He was to govern by Presidential decree, thus blocking both the large minority Socialist Democrats (143 seats) and the Nazis (107 seats) from any real influence and leading to even more disruption and confusion in a nation already deep in crisis. As the crisis deepened, support for Hitler increased, and not only among the general public, the army and the right wing industrialists but among the Catholic bishops as well. As a consequence, when they met in national conference at Fulda they failed to agree on a statement condemning National Socialism or its policies. Cardinal Bertram, president of the conference, therefore took it on himself to include in a message for New Year, 1931, a general warning against political extremism and the insanity and wickedness of racism.¹⁵³ But the publication of that message coincided with the release of a much more influential message.

CASTI CONNUBII

Into the international battleground of the Great Depression Pius XI threw another papal encyclical, dated December 31, 1930. It was motivated by the turmoil in race, migration, and population control laws and community standards in the United States during the 1920s. It was the second of the major "social encyclicals" which Pius XI produced as part of the programme to reinforce papal rule throughout the church, to complement the concordat system and to offset the influences of both Protestant and secular voices which had progressively undermined the authority of the Roman Catholic Church. It soon became apparent, however, that the capacity of the papacy to make universal judgements and rules had been overtaxed.¹⁵⁴

Direction and increased regimentation of one section of the world community in questions of ethics could not be carried out in isolation and had to influence the whole world community. That is no doubt exactly what Pius XI intended, but he failed to understand the diversity of situations in which his paramount 'guidance' was supposed to be applied and the increased tensions which he was generating. He was providing further evidence of the unworkability of the Vatican's ultramontaniam. The second of his social encyclicals was praiseworthy in what appears to be its basic intent – to help bring sanity into the eugenics debate. It was courageous in its timing and productive in its immediate effect, but unfortunately the Pope spread his net far too wide. He left both the faithful and the separated, their governments, scientists, social planners, psychologists and a host of others to sort out the consequences. His successors have tried to separate each of the issues which he treated in the long-established, arrogant, inflexible manner which the Vatican had been clinging to. They have treated them rather more sympathetically, but they have avoided changing the main thrust of his pronouncements any more than has been absolutely necessary in an effort to maintain both continuity and their central teaching authority. Three generations later they are still trying to sort out the mess.

But the Pope's encyclical also had more immediate effects. Because of the Great Depression, Capitalist governments around the world were under intense pressure to make concessions and social reforms or be overthrown. It was very convenient for them to be seen as dynamically Christian, responding to the church's leadership, and encouraging (or imposing) the essentials of the Christian faith – strict personal and community discipline – through their education, health and welfare systems. It didn't matter whether a government had a concordat with the Vatican or not. It could still benefit from the spin-off from the Vatican's social encyclicals. There was the Catholic vote to be considered and that was more significant than usual in the volatile political environment of the time. In a stable parliamentary electoral system in which governments were formed from a host of independents and small parties, the influence of the church and special interest groups tended to be relatively small. But when national or regional politics became polarized, or in places where two-party systems were the norm, the ability of the church to influence the direction of policy was greatly increased. Shifting coalitions or small swings could mean gaining or losing seats on government benches. While the consequences of that encyclical are now apparent some three generations after it was issued, and governments of the day can be criticized for the way in which they responded to it, there is little doubt that it had the immediate effect which Pius XI was aiming for.

Casti Connubii was handed down as a follow-up to (and exactly two years after) the pope's first social encyclical, Divini Illius Magistri, which had confirmed and tightened the ground rules for education of Catholic youth and sought to turn the tide or to undermine the state school education system. "A good Catholic," he said, "precisely because of his Catholic principles, makes the better citizen, attached to his country, and loyally submissive to constituted civil authority in every legitimate form of government."¹⁵⁵ Those principles could be received only in a Catholic school and attendance at any other school was forbidden. Adolescents were "as soft as wax to be moulded in a vice", and being surrounded by immorality, corruption and false doctrines they had to be protected lest they succumb to evil passions and the dangers of moral and religious shipwreck through inexperience. "False and harmful" coeducation was therefore prohibited. So also was physiological sex education in the class room "by which some reformers pretended to help but through which adolescents learned the art of sinning rather than the virtue of chaste living."¹⁵⁶ ¹⁵⁷ But that was a mere foretaste of what was to come in the second social encyclical.

Casti Connubii had taken some time to prepare but it was issued at the very time when family life and relationships were under enormous strain at the height of the Depression. Very long and very tedious, it dealt exhaustively with marriage, sex, childbirth and the abuse of human sexuality, but with heavy emphasis on Augustine's theology and discipline in a very narrow sense. In addition, references to other long-dead authorities and the Council of Trent are dotted through it so that there appears to have been a deliberate effort to scorn Karl Barth's call for a rethink and his attacks on the church's claims to have divine teaching authority based on historical continuity. While the encyclical dealt with some aspects of eugenics it had also been prompted, at least in part, by rising interest in family planning and sex education which the church was opposing with great vigour. Ever since 1914 when Margaret Sanger began publishing articles on sex education and family planning the churches had been divided over those issues, with the Reformed Churches generally regarding them as a legitimate step towards logical social policies. But the Catholic Church threw its weight behind the opposition. When she opened the first family planning clinic in 1916 she was arrested. When she organized a three-day conference in New York in 1921 the Catholic Archbishop called the police on the final day – without consulting the responsible municipal authorities first. Amid violent scenes they carried Sanger out to prevent her from speaking and cleared the hall. Over the next few years her conferences for the medical profession and educational programs drew mass audiences across America, and family planning and contraception had grown into a world wide multi-million dollar business by the Depression years.¹⁵⁸

In Casti Connubii Pius XI addressed the world as if there was no valid form of family tie other than the “single chaste and sacred fellowship of nuptial union”, inspired by divine wisdom, which was the “living image of that most fruitful union of Christ with the Church...”¹⁵⁹ He made dogmatic statements about the shape of the box it had to be forced into and confirmed the opposition to civil marriage and to divorce which the church had maintained ever since Austria's Joseph II had introduced them 150 years earlier. (See above, chapter 16, p. 11L). He blasted those who dared say that matrimony was “not instituted by the Author of nature nor raised by Christ the Lord to the dignity of a true sacrament but (was) invented by man.”¹⁶⁰ Propagation of the species was, he maintained, the primary purpose of marriage. Mutual aid and the cultivation of mutual love were secondary. Husband and wife “are not forbidden to consider ... the quieting of concupiscence ... so long as they are subordinated to the primary end and so long as the intrinsic nature of the act is preserved.”¹⁶¹ Those who ignored the prohibition on mixed marriages under both canon and divine law faced a “danger to their eternal salvation.”¹⁶²

Abortion was declared to be murder and the world was reminded of “the precept of God and the law of nature: “Thou shalt not kill!” Pius XI went on to say “We may pity the mother whose health and even life is gravely imperiled in the performance of the duty allotted to her by nature, nevertheless what could ever be a sufficient reason for excusing in any way the direct murder of the innocent?” Two pages later he answered his own question: only for disagreeing with the church! Arguing against sterilization carried out under United States eugenics laws, he referred to the teaching drawn up by Aquinas at the direction of Rome that, though authority exists to inflict punishment in order to prevent future evils (from heresy), “no one who is guiltless may be punished by a human tribunal either by flogging to death, or mutilation, or by beating.”¹⁶³

Contraception was attacked especially strongly with “priests who hear confession and others who have the care of souls ... admonished ... in virtue of Our supreme authority and in Our solicitude for the salvation of souls, not to allow the faithful entrusted to them to err regarding this most grave law of God.” Couples who were “frustrating the marriage act (by) this criminal abuse (because) they are weary of children and wish to gratify their desires without consequent burden ... commit a deed which is shameful and intrinsically vicious.” As a very authoritarian head^{164 165} of an autocratic, celibate clergy showing a definite tendency to be both masochistic and neurotic¹⁶⁶ Pius XI invoked the saintly authority of both Paul and Augustine to bolster his own. Paul, a bachelor, is thought to have been physically handicapped, emotionally unstable and obsessed with the need to be “free” for the imminent second coming of Christ.¹⁶⁷ Augustine, whose personal sexual conduct and marriage were tragedies which greatly influenced his later life and writing, equated sexual intercourse with original sin and his conversion has been described as “a decision against coitus.”¹⁶⁸ Pius XI quoted Augustine as saying “Intercourse even with one’s legitimate wife is unlawful and wicked where the conception of the offspring is prevented.”¹⁶⁹

And concerning adultery, Pius XI did not quote the incident in the Temple when scribes and Pharisees brought a woman caught in the act to Jesus who said, after some debate with her accusers, “Neither do I condemn you, go away and don’t sin any more.” (John 8;311) Instead he turned again to Augustine who had claimed that the binding force of the sacrament of marriage was such that “those who commit adultery carry with them that sacred yoke, although in this case not as a title to the glory of grace but for the ignominy of their guilty action.”¹⁷⁰

Women were in for a tough spin. They had to stoically accept as their divine lot any danger to their health and life from pregnancy, because “no difficulty can arise that justifies the putting aside of the law of God which forbids all acts intrinsically evil.” But they also had to continue to subordinate themselves to men. In an obvious reaction to the movement for women’s rights which had become a significant force under the leadership of Emmeline Pankhurst, a British hunger-striking suffragette who had been imprisoned several times, Pius XI complained that “false teachers” who wanted to weaken the bonds of marriage also wanted to “do away with the honourable and trusting obedience which the woman owes to the man.” “Many of them even go further”, he said, “and assert that such a subjection of one party to the other is unworthy of human dignity, that the rights of husband and wife are equal (and) the emancipation of women ... ought to be effected.” He objected that demands for three-pronged social, economic and physiological emancipation would debase womanly character, debase the dignity of motherhood, prejudice the rights of the husband and children, and provide only false liberty.¹⁷¹

The response to Casti Connubii was predictably mixed, with many horrified sociologists seeing the consequences of it much more clearly than Pius XI. Eugenics lobbyists, and notably the Protestants among them, assailed the pope for playing the numbers game. He was, they claimed, trying to swamp Protestant countries like the United States and Australia through uncontrolled breeding by Catholics of poor racial and physical stock without regard for the effects on either the superior white civilization or the poor families who were supposed to produce the flood for him. He had played into their hands with his statement that "We ... whom the Father has appointed over His field, We who are bound by Our most holy office to take care lest the good seed be choked by the weeds, believe it fitting to apply to Ourselves the most grave words of the Holy Ghost ... 'Be thou vigilant ... Fulfill thy ministry ... Preach the word, be instant in season, out of season; reprove, entreat, rebuke in all patience and doctrine.'"¹⁷²

In fact, on balance, the pope had actually given restrained support to the eugenics movement. He criticized "some who, over-solicitous for the cause of eugenics, not only give salutary counsel for more certainly procuring the strength and health of the future child – which, indeed, is not contrary to right reason – but put eugenics before aims of a higher order, and by public authority wish to prevent from marrying all those who, even though naturally fit for marriage, they consider, according to the norms and conjectures of their investigations, would, through hereditary transmission, bring forth defective offspring. And more, they wish to legislate to deprive these of that natural faculty by medical action despite their unwillingness ..." Sterilization was taboo and "Public magistrates have no direct power over the bodies of their subjects (and) can never directly harm or tamper with the integrity of the body, either for the reasons of eugenics or for any other reason." Then came that quote from Aquinas ...

Just a few paragraphs earlier Pius XI had said that "what is asserted in favour of the social and eugenic 'indication' may and must be accepted, provided lawful and upright methods are employed within the proper limits: but to wish to put forward reasons based upon them for the killing of the innocent is unthinkable and contrary to the divine precept promulgated in the words of the Apostle: 'Evil is not to be done that good may come of it'"¹⁷³ Pius XI must have hoped that people couldn't see across the border into Poland, that they had very short memories and that they couldn't read Aquinas for themselves.

A few years later, when the Vatican was applying strong pressure on Hitler to reprieve the inmates of mental asylums and the physically handicapped who were being systematically fed into gas chambers, (but without any reference to Jews), some churchmen claimed that those sections of Casti Connubii had been aimed at him all along. However the claim fails under scrutiny. Sterilization was on the statutes of more than half the states of the US already, some of them had enforceable restrictions on marriage, and pressure was mounting for the legal execution of the insane. On the other hand Hitler was still more than two years away from power and comparison of Casti Connubii and Mein Kampf, written six years earlier, shows that Hitler was enjoying the best of support on many issues, even though the Catholic political parties were in competition with him on the hustings.

Hitler had in fact spent several pages in Mein Kampf ranting against birth control and any control of procreation at all – among Germans at any rate. His motive clearly was to win the racial numbers game, but from that point he stayed with the eugenics lobby, opting for elimination of the weak and unwanted after birth.¹⁷⁴ He showed some consistency in that he promoted the higher goal of marriage – procreation to preserve the species¹⁷⁵; but he exhorted the church to promote controlled breeding and declared it to be the highest honour for the weaker men in society to renounce their right to breed.¹⁷⁶

On another front, however, Hitler was clearly in closer accord with the sentiments of the Vatican. Pius XI had even been able to wave the Red Bogey in Casti Connubii. As if the moral decline in the countries in which his encyclical was to circulate (and which was the justification for it) was a myth, Pius XI wrote of “the daily increasing corruption of morals and the unheard-of degradation of the family in those lands where Communism reigns unchecked.”¹⁷⁷ In warming to his theme, Pius alluded to some of the practical implications of his social policies and spelled out the political opportunities awaiting those prepared to enlist in the Vatican’s cause.

Taking full advantage of the fear of Communism which was being whipped up in Capitalist-controlled countries he included a section on Christian Charity (as if it were somehow different to any other charity) and linked it with an appeal for closer ties with non-communist governments and political parties. He pointed out that larger and poorer families were subject to a great string of pressures and that “indeed it is obvious how great a peril can arise to the public security and to the welfare and very life of civil society itself when such men are reduced to that condition of desperation that, having nothing which they fear to lose, they are emboldened to hope for chance advantage from the upheaval of the state and of established order.” He called for public authorities to allocate funds for welfare, to make “proper provision for matrimony” and to make laws to protect chastity. Temporal powers should, he said, establish firm harmony and friendship with “this Church of Christ” and take account of divine and ecclesiastical law in laying down ordinances and in fixing penalties. This would enhance the dignity of the state and the Church would be “a safeguard and defence which will operate to the public good of the faithful.”¹⁷⁸

That section can be interpreted in a number of ways. It could have been a tacit admission that the policies which he was promoting would bring the consequences which advocates of birth control and eugenics were claiming, that they would complicate the world wide depression which was already serious and that civil help was therefore needed. It could also have been a thinly veiled threat of political intervention along a well trodden path if governments and political parties did not toe the papal line. At the same time, however, it can also be seen as a clear message to anyone seeking the Vatican’s support. In any case it was capped off with a glorious piece of worldwide propaganda for Hitler’s “great man”, Mussolini, and Fascism as Pius XI bid high for more concordats. He referred to the “recent and clear example ... quite in consonance with right order and entirely according to the law of Christ ... (of) the solemn convention happily entered into between the Holy See and the Kingdom of Italy.” This showed, he said, that the one supreme (religious) authority could be united and associated with the other (supreme civil power) without detriment to the rights and supreme power of either.¹⁷⁹

The pope admitted in Casti Connubii that the worldly would see his programme as “an abstraction (which) cannot be attained without the suppression or dwarfing of the natural faculties” or without renouncing normal activities and therefore as “inimical to social life and temporal prosperity and contrary to all progress in letters, arts and sciences, and all the other elements of civilization.”¹⁸⁰ But he quoted Tertullian, the second century African Montanist who paved the way for Augustine, to back up his statement that his vigilance against the seductions and errors of the world “does not demand that young people be removed from the society in which they must live and save their souls ...”¹⁸¹ Then there was his political sledge hammer again. If such education was opposed by civil authorities or was not aided from public funds “whatever Catholics do in promoting and defending the Catholic school ... is a genuinely religious work and therefore an important task of ‘Catholic Action.’” They were not, according to him, mixing in party politics.¹⁸²

Thus, although it was primarily a social document, the political implications behind Casti Connubii were very important indeed, and its social impact helped those political implications to become complications. Combined with Divini Illius Magistri it aggravated political and social division within all communities where Catholics were present: not only those in Christian-dominated countries. Together, the two encyclicals also compounded the emotional and psychological tensions which were peculiar to Christian communities because of the approach to human sexuality which the whole church had adopted. They encouraged rejection of the church’s authority in all matters of morality and ethics among those who saw the fantastic illogic of them or who simply fell foul of the clergy over them. Rejection naturally led to over reaction in demands for freedom or licence and, just as with the church’s response to Darwin, they led to rejection of the very ideas of God as Creator, of Jesus as Messiah and of any value in personal relationships other than personal gratification. They therefore encouraged a rapid expansion in the problems which Pius XI was trying to suppress (by means of that celibate iron will and resistance to science of which Hitler thought so highly), namely: the exploitation of human sexuality for commercial purposes, the misuse of mass media and the decline in community morality.¹⁸³

Those encyclicals, taken together, provide another classic illustration of an attempt to prevent the consequences of a problem by putting people in straight jackets and chastity belts instead of assessing and exposing the factors behind the problem and attempting to offset them. They also suggest a reaction to the report on socio-political conditions which had been prepared by the International Missionary Council in Jerusalem in 1928 (chapter 17). Perhaps if the Vatican bureaucracy had not been so stubbornly resisting a review of its purpose and authority it may have adopted a different approach to the problems.¹⁸⁴ It seems to have been quite prepared to ignore the fact that people of non-Christian heritage do not generally suffer the sexual inhibitions, consequent frustrations, neuroses and other psychological disorders, which have characterized communities under the influence of the church’s “doctrinal edifice”, (with some regional exceptions such as where traditional male dominance compounds Buddhist teaching). Nor do their communities suffer the high level of violent and sex-related crimes which keep the police, lawyers, prison wardens, social workers and crisis counsellors of Christian communities busy. And yet, in spite of the work of Freud¹⁸⁵, Cupitt¹⁸⁶, Barker¹⁸⁷ and a host of other writers, many Christians continue to regard the sexual morality and discipline of both their partners in the triangle and their neighbours of pre-Messianic faiths as inferior.

But in the depths of the Great Depression the long term effects of Divini Illius Magistri and Casti Connubii were yet to be felt, even if they could be foreseen. Of more immediate consequence was the fact that the Holy See had clearly spelled out the terms by which a right thinking and opportunistic politician might earn its support.

Casti Connubii – and Cardinal Bertram's warning against political extremism and racism – were followed during February and March, 1931, by statements from the Bavarian bishops and the archbishops of Cologne, Paderborn and the Upper Rhine to the effect that on the basis of its current cultural and political opinions National Socialism was not compatible with Catholicism.¹⁸⁸ No more. Hitler knew an opportunity when he saw one, but he had a bit of fine tuning to do and a lot of propaganda to generate if he was to be able to take full advantage of the social encyclicals.

Similarly Pacelli, always a political opportunist, could only see the situation in terms of an opportunity to strike. To him, "Bruning's agonizing responsibilities as chancellor of a great nation in crisis were of less significance than his status as a malleable Catholic whom he could shape to his will in the interests of achieving a Reich Concordat favourable to the Holy See."¹⁸⁹ Thus, in March, at the same time that the archbishops were warning of Catholic-Nazi incompatibility, Pacelli was "badgering Berlin with his concordat demands, including insistence that the Reich should surrender on the schools question" which was central to both the social encyclicals and his dispute with Prussia. His reciprocal gesture, or compromise, was to hint that the Reich could have its way on the issue of army chaplains and their responsibility to the military bishop. The whole proposal fell on deaf ears. With one exception not even the leaders of the Catholic Centre Party would support it, so a group of party leaders was invited to Rome for discussions at Easter. Bruning was not among them and the former chancellor, Wirth, led the group. Pacelli was told firmly that the Vatican's demands were out of the question, and Wirth later stormed out of a bitter meeting with the pope when Pius XI proposed that the Centre Party should sever its coalition with the majority Socialists in Prussia and, by implication, join the move to the right to be consistent with the Vatican's 'understanding' with Mussolini's Fascists.

Pacelli did not see the matter as ended, just stalled again, and his next opportunity to push for his version of a concordat came on August 8, 1931, when Chancellor Bruning visited Rome for economic cooperation discussions with Mussolini and, of course, an audience with the pope. Pacelli pressed for his version of a concordat, complete with the schools provisions, and again offered his reciprocal gesture on army chaplains. However Bruning was already firmly committed to a policy of chaplains reporting to the military bishop. He did not see that as a matter of compromise and he insisted that a Reich Concordat that favoured the Catholic Church in schools was out of the question. There would be Protestant outrage and "total bafflement on the part of the Socialists,” he said. But Pacelli was trying to deal with Germany’s Catholic Chancellor as if he was a parishioner in the confessional – one who was prepared to argue. Tempers flared when Bruning insisted that he had to give equal weight to the interests of both the Protestant and Catholic Churches in corresponding concordats. Pacelli told him angrily that it was incredible for a Catholic chancellor to sign a concordat with a Protestant church. He pressed Bruning to ignore the Protestants and the Socialists and to form a right-wing administration (which could then govern without having to rely on rule by Presidential decree) precisely in order to achieve a Reich Concordat. It should be a condition of the coalition agreement “that the treaty be concluded at once,” he said. If the price of a concordat favourable to the Vatican was to invite the Nazis and Hitler into his minority cabinet then he should seek an agreement at once! Bruning would not hear of it, reminding Pacelli that Mussolini’s Fascists were already riding slipshod over the Lateran Treaty and that Pius XI had denounced the Fascist government for its unfair treatment of Catholic Action in an encyclical (Non abbiamo bisogno) in mid July, only three weeks earlier. But to reinforce his demand Pacelli threatened to undermine Bruning’s Centre Party. He would insist, he said, that Fr. Ludwig Kaas resign from the presidency of the party and accept a minor ecclesiastical post in the Vatican because Bruning’s attitude had destroyed any standing that Kaas (and the party) had with the Vatican. The option was, as he insisted, that the German Centre Party should reach “an understanding” with the Nazis.¹⁹⁰

In the encyclical which Bruning had referred to, the pope had attacked the Fascists’ efforts to monopolize education – the very thing that Pacelli was trying to achieve through his concordats – and by that means to “snatch the young from Christ and His Church” with its “divine mandate ... incommunicably and exclusively commissioned by Jesus Christ Himself (which) extends to the supernatural, the celestial the eternal, and to that order of things which on the one hand is of the strictest obligation for every rational creature and which, on the other hand, must, by the very nature of things subordinate and coordinate to itself all else.” He said that in this way the regime was elevating the adulation of the state to the point of pagan worship or “Statolatry.”¹⁹¹ It seems that Pius XI had forgotten about Mussolini’s trenchant criticism of the church and its view of itself which had led the Vatican to request his expulsion from Austria before the Great War (chapter 17). He seemed hell-bent on describing the church in the most exaggerated, flamboyant and provocative terms that he could. He could not see that what he described as “Statolatry” was a reaction against “Churcholatry” and he seems to have forgotten his own role in forcing the church to support Mussolini’s Fascism just a few years earlier when there had been an alternative.

Somewhat shaken by his confrontation with Pacelli which he was pleased to draw to a close in order to keep his audience appointment with the pope, Bruning was amazed when Pius XI, without Pacelli present, congratulated the German bishops on their “clear and courageous stance against the erroneous tenets of National Socialism.” Later that evening Bruning had a second meeting with Pacelli and, bolstered by the pope’s remarks, told him sharply that he had decided to drop the issue of the army chaplains and the Reich Concordat altogether and leave the matter to who ever succeeded him as chancellor. Then, anticipating the tide of political events in Germany, he said he trusted that "the Vatican would fare better at the hands of Hitler ... than with himself, a devout Catholic."¹⁹² He later noted in an unpublished memoir that:

*All successes [Pacelli believed] could only be attained by papal diplomacy. The system of concordats led him and the Vatican to despise democracy and the parliamentary system. ... Rigid governments, rigid centralization, and rigid treaties were supposed to introduce an era of stable order, an era of peace and quiet.*¹⁹³

Hitler had never had it so good. While the pope and many of the German Catholic bishops were criticizing some of his policies and trying to isolate him, the Vatican Secretary of State was trying to propel him into power in order to secure a Reich Concordat which, in his estimation, was in the interests of the Vatican, and it mattered not at all what the adverse consequences might be for Germany or for the rest of the world. The church's self-understanding and that of the Vatican in particular – and its social teachings – were tying the world up in knots. Over the next four months Pacelli's influence, over and through both the pope and Kaas, was brought to bear increasingly on the Centre Party to coerce it into cooperation with Hitler.

During that time the world economic situation had become so critical that the Allied Reparations Commission stopped all reparations payments. Germany had paid only one eighth of the original demand of 6.85 billion pounds Sterling and it had actually received more in foreign loans to assist its financial recovery so that it might be able to pay reparations than it had paid out. The arrangements were chaotic and waiting on the sidelines, Hitler was handed a marvelous opportunity to take advantage of national discontent. With five million German workers unemployed he played up the personal issues of the depression, played down his anti-Semitism, actively manipulated Christian sympathies instead, and campaigned for national unity. At the same time he adroitly exploited a deep seated fear shared by the newly impoverished middle classes, wealthy capitalists and the Church alike: fear of communism.

In Germany as elsewhere, the battle between opposing ideologies was joined. While Capitalists sought to keep a tight rein on the allegiance of their communities – or to ensure their acquiescence – Marxists sought to transfer those communities' allegiances from Capitalism to Communism. In the propaganda war which naturally dominated the battle the Capitalist lobby was in firm control of almost all of the Western World's mass media. That was especially the case with new-fangled radio systems and cinemas. Communism and Soviet Russia were represented as one and the same thing. Both were represented as the dungeon of human rights, as repressive, as economically inefficient and, of course, as the antichrist. And that lobby had plenty of ammunition at its disposal.

The circumstances in which the Bolsheviks had come to power and the extent of land, law and social reforms which were necessary in Russia made strong internal security forces essential. The extreme nature of Lenin's methods and the manner and extent of Western and Church interference in the nation's affairs in an effort to unseat the Bolsheviks made the transition from dependence on strong security forces to a police state inevitable. The struggle for absolute power which followed was, in its turn, a consequence of all that had gone before. And while Germany's circumstances spawned Hitler, Russia's circumstances spawned Joseph Stalin. As the reforms attempted became more drastic, such as the enforcement of collective farming in an effort to achieve national productivity goals, so the requirement for forced labour and the level of dissent increased together until, in 1933, Stalin set in motion a purge of the Communist Party which cut its membership by about one third in a year or so. In 1935 it was followed by another blood bath, after Stalin's closest associate was murdered, and a series of trials and purges which were to continue until 1938.¹⁹⁴

During this period the Soviet Government had continued to support and to finance Socialist movements and subversion against Capitalist systems in other countries. But the prevailing attitude in the West right from the moment that socialist movements began to develop and Marx began to write had been "let's not look around to see what's wrong in the West and correct it: let's prop up the system to preserve our positions of privilege." The majority of its people of influence therefore assumed that it was quite proper for the West to try to subvert the Soviet government or support governments which might contain or oppose it, but it was quite dastardly for the Soviets to try to do the same. Debate on the old "chicken or the egg" riddle (which came first, Soviet subversion or Capitalist repression?) was not welcome. For anyone who cared to consult the history books, of course, the answer was not in doubt. But now the riddle had become a game and it was being played for very high stakes.

In that environment the church was doubly happy to join the anti Communist front. It had always held to exactly the same attitude in its own affairs and the only strategy it had ever adopted in the face of a challenge (except within the 'new-age ecumenical movement') was that offence is the best means of defence. It was not about to change when confronted by the atheistic and anti-religious philosophy of militant Communism. Apart from that, the church had become so intimately linked into and so dependent upon the Capitalist system, in the ways already traced, that any attack on Capitalism implied or actually involved an attack on the church in the broadest sense. And as a consequence, any defender of capitalism against communism was considered a defender of the Church.

But, also in July, 1931, while the pope tried to avoid losing his grip on the social and educational strait-jacket, and while the churches of the ecumenical movement tried to resolve their approach to world wide evangelism, the Bible Students of the Watchtower Society were doing some thinking, too, looking for alternative approaches to strengthening the kingdom of God on earth. The society had already grown to about 50,000 dedicated adherents with some 'witnesses' active in many countries but, being a laity-based organization which was barely fifty years old and still very US-centric, it had to map out its future. It did so when several thousand witnesses met in Columbus, Ohio, and determined to adopt the name Jehovah's Witnesses and to extend their world wide efforts.¹⁹⁵ They also began to refine their thinking about the ultimate heavenly hosts, the nature of what mainstream Protestant churches called the 'priesthood of all believers' and what they would need to resource their responsibility as witnesses for Jehovah.

The results of that thinking would begin to show a few years later, about the time that Hitler's campaign to achieve what he saw as his divine calling hit rock bottom.

THE PARODY BEGINS TO UNFOLD

But by the end of 1931 the situation, both domestic and international, was ripe for a strong leader who could reasonably claim to be able to save Germany from Communist revolution. Hitler had only to play his cards right and support would flow in from all important quarters. The Vatican, remarkably eager to assist, intervened yet again. Pius XI, constantly prompted by Pacelli, let it be known through diplomatic channels that cooperation between the church in Germany and the National Socialists "perhaps only temporarily and for specific purposes" would "prevent a still greater evil."¹⁹⁶ So while Pius XI and his Vatican colleagues tried to reconstruct the world in their own neurotic image, Hitler prepared to act out his parody. But there was more than two years of political wheeling and dealing still ahead of Hitler before the chancellorship was his and, like every ambitious politician, he took full advantage of a series of parliamentary crises.

In April, 1932, his public standing was boosted enormously when he ran second to President Hindenburg who was seeking re-election. Then a few weeks later, on May 30, Brüning resigned as chancellor and Hindenburg appointed another deputy from the Catholic Centre Party, the aristocratic ultra-right wing "closet Nazi admirer"¹⁹⁷ Franz von Papen, who immediately alienated his own party by the unrepresentative right wing appointments he made to cabinet. Papen then dissolved the Reichstag, called new elections for July 31, and lifted the ban on Hitler's storm troop, the Nazi SA. At those elections many of the smaller parties were decimated, the Socialists lost a few seats, the Catholic Centre Party and its arch rivals, the Communists, both gained a few seats, but the Nazis became the largest single party with 37.4 percent of the vote and 230 seats in a parliament of 608. In spite of that dazzling performance Hitler was kept out of power by the von Papen-led coalition of parties ranged against him, bolstered in numbers but with much discomfort, by the Socialists. Hitler refused the Vice-chancellorship. For him it was to be top dog or nothing.

Many of Germany's Catholic bishops now became seriously concerned about the prospects of a Hitler-led government and, disregarding Pacelli's views, the senior prelates repeated their criticism of Nazi policies immediately after the election. That criticism was followed by the publication of a minute from the August meeting of the Fulda Bishops' Conference indicating that all diocesan authorities had banned membership of the Nazi party because its official program contains false doctrine and declarations which are hostile to the faith. However their attack was blunted somewhat by the simple disclosure of the partisan nature of their concerns. The collective judgement of the Catholic clergy was, the statement said, that if the party achieved the monopoly rule in Germany which it ardently desires "the interests of Catholics will prove extremely bleak."¹⁹⁸

The statement did not suggest that Nazi rule would mean a bleak future for Germans in general. It was quite specific. It was the interests of Catholics which were at risk. The statement therefore cannot be read as an attack against National Socialism in general. And "monopoly rule" was a key phrase. Pacelli still wanted the Centre Party in a coalition with the National Socialists because that "would correspond to their principles" and provide a means of blocking the Socialists and Communists. And Catholic Centre Party chancellor von Papen saw a coalition with Hitler as holding "the best prospect for the survival of his chancellorship."¹⁹⁹ It was obvious that without a substantial partner in the coalition Germany was virtually ungovernable. The Catholic Centre Party held only 75 seats while the Communists held 89, the Socialists 133, and the Nazis 230. The Vatican could not tolerate the thought of a coalition with the Socialists, and Kaas clearly pointed the way ahead in an article he published on the relationship between the Holy See and the Fascist State. He noted the similarities between the ideology of papal primacy and the fascist fuhrer-prinzip (leadership principle), discussed the necessity for withdrawal from social democracy, and noted that "the authoritarian church should understand the authoritarian state better than others." It has been argued, with much authority, by John Cornwell that Kaas could not have written the article without consultation with Pacelli or even under his supervision, and that "Pacelli's spirit, in fact, breathes through every line of this manifesto."²⁰⁰

When the new Reichstag met for the first time six weeks after the elections, on September 12, 1932, von Papen was immediately faced with a vote of no confidence and called fresh elections for November 6. At that election the Nazi vote fell from about 13,700,000 to under 12,000,000 and its number of deputies fell by 34 from 230 to 196. This has often been represented as a substantial drop in the Nazi vote as a result of the Catholic Church's opposition. However, if that were the case it would be expected that support for the Catholic Centre Party would have risen. That was not the case. During the thirteen years since the establishment of the Weimar Republic the size of the Reichstag had been increased steadily from 423 deputies to 608 for the July election, but in the volatile political circumstances the number to be elected in November was reduced by 24, to 584 and there were significant changes in party support and greater polarization between the right and the left of German politics. While the number of Nazi deputies fell, as noted, by 34, the biggest gains were made by the ultra-right wing Nationalists (up 15 from 37 to 52), and the Communists (up 11 from 89 to 100), while the losers included both the moderate Socialists (the Social Democrats down 12 from 133 to 121) and the Catholic Centre Party (down 5 from 75 to 70). The Nazis were still by far the biggest party with 39.6 percent of the popular vote and 33.6 percent of deputies compared with 37.8 percent in the previous parliament, while the Communists had risen from 14.6 percent to 17.1 per cent. The Catholic Centre Party was more or less static with 12.0 per cent, down only slightly from 12.3 per cent. There was therefore very little comfort for the Vatican in the results and the Catholic Centre Party could not find a coalition partner.

A Socialist dominated government was not acceptable to either the army, the industrialists or the Vatican and, being unable to form a stable government, towards the end of November von Papen was forced to offer his resignation but Hindenberg did not accept it immediately. The momentum was building up behind Hitler and it was not only the anti-Semites and the malcontents who then flocked to his banner. The solid middle class had gradually moved in behind him and in a desperate bid to avoid either a Communist victory or a Socialist coalition the mighty industrialists joined forces with him also. They were confident that once Hitler gained power he would drop his socialist tag and be a nice compliant tool for capitalism. Thirty nine prominent industrialists, including Krupp, Siemens and Bosch, signed a letter petitioning Hindenburg to appoint Hitler as Chancellor.²⁰¹ Hindenburg refused but accepted von Papen's resignation and on December 2 he appointed an ultra-nationalist, Schleicher, who declared that he would govern in coalition with the National Socialists, provided that Hitler was not in cabinet. Clearly it was going to be impossible to split the Nazi Party from its leader in that manner and when Schleicher's scheme quickly proved equally unworkable von Papen proposed to Hindenberg that Hitler be appointed chancellor with himself as vice chancellor. Von Papen expected to be the real power in the government. Faced with a strong possibility that if the Communists did not mount a coup beforehand they would gain power at the next election anyway, Hindenberg reluctantly agreed on the basis that Hitler appeared to be the only leader who could stop the Communists.

Hitler was sworn in as chancellor on January 30, 1933. The Catholic Centre Party was now eager for a place or two in Hitler's cabinet but he was not interested in sharing power and it was unwilling to accept his terms. This made it very difficult, as it had been for his predecessors, to lead a stable coalition and gave him the justification to demand from Hindenburg one final election.²⁰² He needed a clear electoral mandate to govern, he said, and demanded that parliament be dissolved for one final election. Hindenberg agreed. The election was called for March 5, and Hitler began to campaign immediately. But now it was different. He was campaigning as Chancellor and with his remarkable memory, presence of mind in discussions and ability to reduce a complex problem to understandable proportions, he set the pace.²⁰³ He quickly imposed his personal dominance on what had been reduced to an interim coalition cabinet so that, in fact, for a few weeks the country experienced the nearest thing to stable government which it had seen since chaos set in shortly after the stock market crash.

Against that background Hitler cast his lines to hook both the Catholic vote and the Vatican fish. The Prussian state government was persuaded to announce, on February 22, the gradual abolition of inter-denominational schools and the reintroduction of religious education in vocational schools. Then on the February 27 seven Catholic feast days were declared to be public holidays.²⁰⁴ The Centre Party's position was undermined by these measures, together with Hitler's Commo-bashing publicity (financed by his newfound Capitalist sponsors), repression against opposition parties and candidates, and the Vatican's widely known interest in having Hitler's National Socialism as a bolster against Communism.²⁰⁵

In the meantime talk of a Communist revolution to abort the election had begun to spread and Hitler's well greased propaganda machine helped it along a bit. Then a young anti-capitalist incendiary who had previously been a member of the Communist Party was caught in the act of burning the Reichstag, quite fortuitously only hours after the Church's feast days had been declared. Hitler took full advantage of the event, declared it to be a Communist plot, coerced the cabinet into declaring a state of emergency and coerced Hindenberg into agreeing to the suspension of civil rights. This ensured that the remainder of the election campaign revolved around the threat of Communism. The status and influence of the SA rose sharply. Known Communists were rounded up and carted off to gaol in droves. Hitler had already promised I. G. Farben that if he came to power his government would support the production of synthetic gasoline. He had also promised the Circle of Friends that he would abolish all trade unions and all other political parties. There would be industrial peace and profitability. The money poured into Nazi campaign funds and 25 industrialists agreed to underwrite the costs of blanket media cover for the last two days of the campaign. Krupp pledged 1,000,000 marks, I. G. Farben 400,000 marks and the others 1,600,000 marks between them.

After the cut in the size of the Reichstag for the November election, from 608 to 584 deputies, it was again increased – substantially – for the election on March 5, to 647 deputies. The big winners were the Nazis whose numbers rose from 196 to 288, (from 33.6 per cent to 44.5 per cent of the house). The Catholic Centre Party also gained four seats, rising from 70 to 74, but it actually fell in percentage again, (from 12.0 per cent to 11.4 per cent). No other party of substance increased its number of deputies and the big losers were the Communists who fell by 19 from 100 to 81 deputies, (from 18.2 per cent to 12.5 per cent), but even so they were still seven seats ahead of the Catholic Centre Party. The net result was that Hitler was firmly entrenched as Chancellor. He was firmly in charge of the evolving pattern of domestic policy in Germany – religious, commercial, industrial and community affairs – but he was also in charge of Germany's relations with its neighbours.

COMPETITORS ON THE WORLD STAGE

At that critical time most people in Europe would therefore have been preoccupied with events in Germany. They knew that the direction of many aspects of life across the continent – everything which could be influenced by a changing relationship between Germany and its neighbours – could be affected by the outcome of the political turmoil in Germany. They probably realized that on the day that Germans went to the polls for their crucial elections a new administration took control of government in the United States of America, after its inauguration the previous day. The man who took office as 32nd president of the United States that day had actually been elected in a landslide victory early in November, 1932, but, under the US system which provided for a change of administration with a lead time of four months, there was a blurring of the change. Outside the US it was widely assumed that the country was running on an even keel with cooperation and collaboration between the outgoing and incoming administrations and that the inauguration was simply a bit of celebratory hoo-ha. In this case they were under a distinct misunderstanding. There were distinct differences in social and economic attitudes and policies between the outgoing and incoming presidents. These would become clear within a few days and the personal authority of the new president – Franklin Delano Roosevelt – would be stamped so firmly on the New Israel that he would remain in office until his death twelve years later. He would make decisions which, sustained by the economic and strategic strength of the nation during the critical period of a war which was still six years in the future, would largely determine the course of the world for generations to come.

From the day that Roosevelt took office as President he served, at the pinnacle of authority in the democratic republican model of the United States, for twelve years and thirty eight days until his death on April 12, 1945. When Hitler was returned to power that day as Chancellor of Germany he was not yet at the pinnacle of authority in his country's US-imposed democratic republican model. He still had the president above him able to exercise restraint. It would take Hitler another eighteen days to reach the pinnacle of authority as dictator in his new National Socialist model which would replace the US-imposed model which he detested so much. From that date he would also serve for twelve years and thirty eight days until his death on April 30, 1945.

The American president who was about to share the role of chief opponent of Hitler's National Socialism with Britain's Churchill and Russia's Stalin was, like the others, a product of the amorphous Christian gel. Roosevelt was born into a wealthy family which traced its roots to a Dutch immigrant who arrived in New Amsterdam (later renamed New York) in the 1640s. It appears that little is known about him but it was one of his sons, Nicholas Roosevelt, who fathered two sons and founded the dynasty which would provide two presidents for the United States within six generations, one from each branch. Both branches of the family accumulated substantial wealth. Franklin's father, James, inherited extensive holdings in coal mining and transport. His wealth was such that even after making substantial losses from speculation he and his family could travel in a private railway car of the company of which he was president, and divide their time between homes in New York and Campobello Island, spending summer holidays there or in Europe, and retain tutors and governesses to educate Franklin at home until he was fourteen.

The family's religious heritage was Calvinist. The southern section of Manhattan Island where their forebear settled was colonized in 1625 as a Dutch trading post, and the first Dutch Reformed minister arrived three years later. However he did not go necessarily to minister to religious refugees. It was in that year that the father of modern philosophy, the French liberal Catholic Rene Descartes, (chapter 12) settled in Holland with its more tolerant society in order to escape religious persecution. Therefore although the small New Amsterdam settlement developed and retained a strongly Calvinistic character it cannot be assumed that the first Roosevelt settler had migrated to avoid the trauma of Europe's religious wars. When James decided that Franklin was ready to move from the secure and perhaps over-protective and dandyish environment of home to school away from home he was enrolled in a privately endowed school established and run on the lines of the great English Public Schools by an autocratic Church of England clergyman, Rev. Endicott Peabody, at Groton, Massachusetts, and thereafter Franklin is described as Episcopalian. It was Peabody's aim to instill Christian ethics and virtues into his students and to imbue them with an understanding of the responsibilities of the privileged and the wealthy toward public service and the welfare of the wider community. The impact of that teaching and Franklin's belief that the upper classes had a responsibility to society was apparent in his early working years but it became quite clear with the policies which he pursued as he ran for, and then began, his first term as president.

But neither the domestic nor the world environment into which Roosevelt was born in 1882 was consistent with the principles in which he was being educated. Religious bigotry was approaching its peak. The controversies are Darwin and evolution, biblical inerrancy and papal infallibility were raging. Bismarck had just ended his Kulturkampf with a Vatican Concordat and redirected his venom from Roman Catholics to Jews. The United States seemed to be awash with oil flowing from Titusville and Roosevelt's extended family was exploiting that situation alongside Rockefeller and others. Japan's reaction to Perry's visit and European adventures had led to the introduction of the Meiji constitution. French officials and businessmen in Indochina were carrying missionary passports. Then, just after the Pittsburgh Platform of Reform Judaism had introduced the possibility of better understanding between Christians, and Jews and while Roosevelt was at Groton, the Dreyfus affair was raging, and Herzl responded with Der Judenstaat and the establishment of the Zionist Organization. From Groton, Roosevelt went to Harvard, gained an arts degree, came under the influence of professors who favoured a move away from laissez-faire economics to more government intervention to steer the economy, and met a distant cousin, Eleanor Roosevelt, who was a niece of the incumbent president, Theodore Roosevelt. They married in March, 1905, moved into a stately home in New York, and Franklin began law studies at Columbia while Eleanor worked in welfare and settlement programs among underprivileged communities in slum areas. Roosevelt passed examinations for admission to the bar then promptly cut short his studies without completing his law degree. However the world of religious affairs and ethics was not standing still, and while he was at Columbia the scurrilous Protocols of the Elders of Zion were put into circulation, the Pontifical Biblical Commission to stop boat-rocking was established, the Oath Against Modernism was imposed on Catholic academics, and the US anti-trust actions to break up Rockefeller's Standard Oil empire got under way. (See chapters 15 and 16 for an outline of these matters.)

Roosevelt had been working with a New York law firm for only a couple of years when. At the age of 28, he was approached in 1910 by local Democratic party leaders to stand as a candidate for a seat in the New York state Senate. They knew he lacked experience, but "he had assets as a candidate: the wealth to finance a campaign, and the best-known political name in the United States."²⁰⁶ He won against the odds in a traditional Republican area. Much of his support was linked to his progressive social and economic policies: workmen's compensation; the setting of maximum working hours for persons under 21 years of age; soil conservation; state development of electricity generation; election of senators by popular vote; and women's suffrage. His first real political battles were then against the domination of his own party administration at Tammany Hall, New York. After he supported Woodrow Wilson for nomination as president against the wishes of Tammany Hall, and Wilson was elected president in 1912, he was appointed Assistant Secretary of the Navy, aged 31, and moved to Washington in 1913. He was in that post when Churchill, as First Lord of the British Admiralty, ordered the conversion of the British Navy from coal to oil, while the Sykes-Picot Agreement and the Balfour Declaration were being negotiated, and during the early phases of the negotiations towards the iniquitous Treaty of Versailles.

In 1920 as the Democratic candidate for Vice President alongside James Cox as candidate for president, he pressed for US participation in the League of Nations which Wilson had proposed, but in the anti-war backlash against the government they were thrashed by the Republicans. Then, having returned to private law practice, he faced the prospect of life after politics and in a wheel chair when he suffered severe poliomyelitis in 1921. But with the support of Eleanor, who had forgiven him an affair with her social secretary, and with dogged determination he accepted a challenge to stand for election as governor of New York State in 1928, and won. Then, a year after his election, when the impact of the speculative stock market collapse became apparent, Roosevelt's commitment to the principles which were instilled into him as a youth – and constantly reinforced by Eleanor – came to the fore. He recruited a brains trust of university professors and with their help he introduced progressive programs of rural and urban reform and support before any other states would consider them. This raised his national profile to the point that key party officials saw him as the candidate most likely to win the presidency from the incumbent, Herbert Hoover, and after a hard-fought party convention battle he gained its nomination. At the election on November 8, 1932, he gained a landslide victory, receiving 59 per cent of the popular vote. During the months which followed, while he selected his administration, developed plans for a new approach to the economic crisis, and waited for his inauguration he refused to endorse the policies which Hoover was pursuing.

Thus, when President Roosevelt read the first of his four inaugural addresses on March 4, 1933, the United States was, indeed, going in a new direction. It was electrified by the belief that “the only thing we have to fear is fear itself – nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyzes needed efforts to convert retreat into advance.” In contrast to the dependence on the financial and industrial far right which Hitler had admitted when he enjoyed its heavy financial support for his election campaign, Roosevelt confronted his fellow elite, saying: “the rulers of the exchange of mankind's goods have failed, through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure, and abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.” Then: “The money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit.” And: “These dark days will be worth all they cost us if they teach us that our true destiny is not to be ministered unto but to minister to ourselves and to our fellow men.” Then, after referring to future safeguards through strict supervision of banking and credit, an end to speculation and provision for sound currency, he turned to foreign affairs. “In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbour – the neighbour who resolutely respects himself and, because he does so, respects the rights of others – the neighbour who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in an with a world of neighbours.” In closing, his one direct religious reference: “In this dedication of a Nation we humbly ask the blessing of God. May He protect each and every one of us. May He guide me in the days to come.”²⁰⁷

During the next three months Roosevelt set about a crash program of New Deal reform which, while it did not solve completely the very deep-seated economic and social crises which were largely the outcome of conduct facilitated by the self-understanding of the New Israel, it did significantly shift the social and economic balance in favour of the disadvantaged, and leaven the national self-understanding. He forced the re-organization of banking, providing stability for the bankers and greater security for their clients, and established the Home Owners Loan Corporation; he approved funding for the Civilian Conservation Corps which eventually reduced the crisis of unemployment by providing work on conservation programs for more than two and a half million men; he removed the social blight of the illegal liquor trade by abolishing prohibition; and he provided a code for the regulation of production, pricing and wage negotiations by establishing two new authorities.²⁰⁸ There was, however, a big question mark hanging over the matter of whether Roosevelt would or could adjust the dominant attitude to foreign affairs either in the United States or in the countries from which its settlers had come. There were many who did not wish him to try, so that when he made his first moves – withdrawing the US from the World Gold Standard, announcing that the US would not participate in international currency stabilization, and extending diplomatic and trade recognition to the Soviet Union – he was not popular either in Europe or in some sections of the United States.

However it is unlikely that either Roosevelt or Hitler gave much thought to the circumstances and the coincidence which brought them to office as world leaders at the same time. They certainly did not see the significance of the roles which lay ahead of them as the Qur’anic Night Journey, Maimonides’ expectation of the establishment of Israel, and the potential for the unfolding of the Messianic Age came together under the umbrella of the parody of Mein Kampf.

Hitler’s first concern when he learned on March 5 that even with the organizational and big business support which he had enjoyed, the Nazis had failed to gain an absolute majority. He knew that without it, although he was firmly entrenched as Chancellor, he did not have the absolute power which he craved, and he would still have to lead another coalition cabinet. Nazi numbers were such that it would certainly be a coalition of his own choosing and he needed only one coalition partner (either the Social Democrats or the Catholic Centre Party would provide the numbers he needed) but Hitler was in no mood to compromise. He proposed that an Enabling Act to give himself effective dictatorial powers by the transfer of legislative authority from parliament to the cabinet should be the first bill to go before the new Reichstag. Thus, within days of the election, wheeling and dealing began between the Centre Party, Hitler and the minor right wing parties. Germany was sick of turmoil. The people wanted a strong, inspiring leader; the industrialists wanted no more elections and no Communists or Socialists in cabinet; the Vatican was not eager for any more elections either but it wanted some of its people in cabinet with Hitler; Pacelli wanted his concordat; and Hitler wanted to silence the critical German bishops. There would definitely be no concordat unless the Catholic bishops reversed their denunciation of National Socialism. Neither would there be a concordat unless the Catholic Centre Party agreed in advance to pass the Enabling Act. And Hitler knew that he could not quell the bishops' criticism and get the Catholic Church out of direct party politics unless he agreed to a concordat and was able to write into it a clause like that in the Lateran Treaty which had outlawed Catholic political action in Italy. And both Hitler and Pacelli knew from the nature and history of negotiations between the Weimar Republic and the Catholic Church that there would be no Reich Concordat without dictatorial fiat, with the Fuhrer dealing directly with the Vatican Secretary of State acting in the name of the pope.²⁰⁹

The political jigsaw puzzle fitted together beautifully. Everyone would get their wishes – if the enabling act was passed. Two days after the elections, when the result and its implications were clear, Hitler told caretaker cabinet members that the Centre Party would be defeated (or its influence negated) only if the Vatican could be persuaded to ditch it. Then, when he raised the matter of the Enabling Act with von Papen, the vice chancellor's response and events and discussions over the next few days made it quite apparent that Pacelli would call the shots from the Vatican, that Kaas would be his mouthpiece, and that a trade off could be arranged. It would be the Enabling Act in return for a Reich Concordat on the basis that the Secretariat of State indirectly endorsed the actions taken by the Reich chancellor and the government against Communism.²¹⁰ Thus, in spite of strong opposition from the German prelates and great unease within the Centre Party, with Kaas acting as a go-between Hitler was able to announce to his cabinet on March 15 that he now anticipated no difficulty in reaching the two thirds majority required to pass the Enabling Act.

Parliament opened in the Potsdam Garrison Church on March 21 – to give an outward appearance of religiosity before shifting to Berlin's Knoll Opera House for its working sessions – and a vote on the Enabling Act was scheduled for March 23. The Centre Party meetings over those two days were emotional, tearful occasions. Kaas briefed his colleagues on the Vatican's position and on undertakings he had received from Hitler; Bruning pleaded passionately against handing Hitler a dictatorship; both Bruning and Wirth threatened to resign as deputies; and a straw vote indicated that 14 deputies would vote against the Act. But Pacelli and Kaas were already at work on a draft Pacelli-Hitler agreement and reference to the constitutionality of Hitler's regime had already been published in L'Osservatore Romano, so fear for their safety and the consequences of a split vote for Catholics who might later resist religious persecution convinced the 14 that they should unite in a disciplined vote.²¹¹

ABSOLUTE POWER: WITH THE HELP OF THE VATICAN

Hitler therefore got the Catholic Centre Party's undivided support, which was all he needed to govern in coalition if the Act did not pass, but he also received more than the additional 70 votes he needed from minor right wing parties to push the Enabling Act through the Reichstag with the required two thirds majority. It passed by 441 to 94. Hitler was Chancellor-absolute with a rubber stamp cabinet. There was to be no comedy in the Opera House plot. Only tragedy. The parody was about to be played out. However Hitler needed three things to put his position above question. They were a decisive demonstration of popular support at home, the blessing of the church, and international recognition. He would achieve them in reverse order.

Next day, March 24, Cardinal Faulhaber wrote to the bishops in his conference in southern Germany urging them to show more tolerance towards the new government which "today is not only in a position of power – which our formulated principles could not reverse – but which has achieved this power in a legal fashion." He said he took this action "after what I have encountered at the highest places in Rome – which I cannot communicate to you now ..." ²¹² Two days later, on March 26, Protestant churches across Germany which were already under pressure to merge into one Reich Church (see below) also acknowledged their acceptance of Hitler and his regime and, having watched the Vatican negotiating for a concordat, they realized that they now had no option but to do the same. Then, on March 28, the Catholic bishops published a conciliatory statement which had been hurriedly compiled on von Papen's initiative, urging "Catholic Christians to whom the Church is sacred" to be loyal to the lawful government and to reject on principle all illegal or subversive behaviour as they conscientiously fulfill the duties of citizenship.

It was "a devastating acquiescence on the part of the bishops," ²¹³ but it was exactly what Hitler wanted. He took full advantage of the turmoil and competition between the Catholic and Protestant wings of the church to move decisively on two matters at once: German-Jewish relations and Christian church-state relations. The Jewish boycott controversy was reaching a critical point (see below, The Jewish Question) and Hitler authorized an immediate retaliatory campaign against them, beginning with a full, page advertisement in the party paper next day, March 29, invoking a counter-boycott and a terror campaign against Jewish businesses throughout Germany. And, with the Catholic Church now eating out of the palm of his hand, at only a couple of days notice he convened a special working committee meeting of representatives of the churches and government authorities for March 31 to consider church/state relations.

The dual move proved to be a remarkable coup against both the churches and the Jewish community. Kaas, who was already closeted away in the Vatican with Pacelli working on the draft of a proposed concordat, returned to Berlin as a matter of urgency to lobby for the protection of Catholic education and other privileges. This ensured that the meeting on March 31 was preoccupied with such matters and the assault on the Jews apparently didn't even rate a mention. It was "the first major test on a national scale of the attitude of the Christian Churches toward the situation of the Jews under the new government” but ... as Hitler deliberated with Christian representatives on future relations between his regime and the Churches, there was no word of protest as a result of this first systematic and nationwide persecution of Jews (under Hitler's chancellorship), neither from Germany nor from Rome.²¹⁴

Within days the attitude of the Catholic Church hierarchy and its policy of non-intervention were confirmed in two separate items of correspondence. In the first, a letter to Pacelli, Cardinal Faulhaber noted that protest against the Nazi attacks on the Jews was pointless since it could only extend the struggle to Catholics. “Jews can help themselves,” he wrote, but it was “especially unjust and painful that by this action the Jews, even those who have been baptized for ten and twenty years and are good Catholics ... are legally still considered Jews, and as doctors or lawyers are to lose their positions.” In the second, a response to a plea for intervention in defence of the Jews, Cardinal Bertram wrote that there were “immediate issues of much greater importance: schools, the maintaining of Catholic associations (and) sterilization ... (and) the Jews are capable of helping themselves.”²¹⁵ Again, Hitler had reason to be well satisfied. By their silence on his anti-Jewish campaign within days of their messages of goodwill in which they implored the faithful to recognize the legality of Hitler's government and to accept his policies, the churches had said, in effect: ‘this is fine, it's all part of the new order and we don't object.’

FOREIGN OBSERVERS

Naturally, every government around the world was eager to find out what direction the new German government would take on sensitive issues. Ambassadors and consuls were besieged for ‘guidance’ and insights. The mandated territory of Palestine was no exception. The Mufti and senior Palestinian colleagues had two meetings with the German Consul, Heinrich Wolf. The first was in March, possibly before the post-election meeting of the Reichstag, and the second was in April, a couple of weeks after the passing of the all-important Enabling Act. The Mufti “spoke approvingly of the Nazi's Jewish policies, particularly of the anti-Jewish boycott in Germany” and at the second meeting “tried to impress upon the German Consul the Palestinian demand for the termination of Jewish emigration from Germany to Palestine.” Germany was not yet seen as a reestablished major world power, nor as a possible anti-British ally, but the Palestinian delegation was concerned that the rise of the Nazis had led to a significant increase in German Jewish immigration to Palestine. They received no encouragement. Not only did they learn that Germany was disinterested in supporting the Palestinian Arabs, but Wolf was personally strongly pro-Zionist.²¹⁶

Whether the Palestinian delegation knew of discussions which Wolf had already had, early in the year, with the Jewish owner of a Tel Aviv Citrus export firm named Sam Cohen, is uncertain. Cohen had proposed to the Consul a scheme to expedite Jewish emigration to Palestine. Under his proposal German Jews emigrating to Palestine would be allowed to purchase German goods prior to their departure for shipment to Palestine. The goods could then be sold in Palestine and the cash paid to the purchaser on their arrival. Wolf quickly grasped the value of the idea, writing to Berlin "In this way it might be possible to wage a successful campaign against the (planned) Jewish boycott of Germany."²¹⁷ Cohen also assured the German Consul that he would act behind the scenes at a forthcoming boycott conference in London to weaken or defeat a boycott resolution.²¹⁸

Also on the international front, Britain, France and Italy were pursuing three objectives. They wanted to show that they had buried the hatchets with which they had dismembered the German and Austrian empires; they wanted to strengthen their trading ties with the resurgent Germany into which their bankers and industrialists had poured a great deal of capital; and they wanted to secure a strong buffer between themselves and Russia's Bolsheviks. Negotiations towards a four power pact opened in March, very soon after the elections. The pact was initialled on June 7 and signed by the three Allies and their former enemy on July 15, the day after Germany became a one party state. Hitler was wasting no time at all!

A CONCORDAT IN THE MAKING

At home in Germany the Catholic hierarchy and the Centre Party politicians were all well aware that Pacelli was determined to negotiate a concordat with Hitler. However, consistent with Pacelli's instructions to his successor as nuncio that the Vatican Secretariat of State would conduct all negotiations with the Weimar government, they were not told that discussions and drafting were already underway. In Rome on the Monday of Holy Week, April 10, Pacelli and von Papen agreed a schedule by which von Papen and Kaas would complete a basic draft by Holy Saturday, April 15. Working at a furious pace they completed their task and Pacelli and Kaas then spent Easter Sunday and Monday, April 16 and 17, going through the draft point by point. Next day, Tuesday, April 18, Cardinal Bertram, in his capacity as president of the German Catholic Bishops' Conference, "petitioned Pacelli with a series of anxieties about the rumoured negotiations." Pacelli did not respond.²¹⁹ Perhaps he was waiting to hear from von Papen who, after returning to Berlin that same day and having a general discussion with Hitler, advised Pacelli that the Fuhrer was ready to grant far-reaching guarantees in the matter of schools, but the wording of the depoliticizing article was "quite inadequate."²²⁰

A week later, because of the obvious fears among the Catholic bishops about the undisclosed political wheeling and dealing which was proceeding between Pacelli, von Papen, Kaas and Hitler, and their eagerness to secure the church's interests under the new regime, Hitler agreed to meet Bishop Berning and Monsignor Steinmann on April 26, while the bishops were actually in conference in Berlin. It was a month after the passing of the Enabling Act. Berning and Steinmann asked for assurances on the church's independence, the freedom of church schools, the rights of Catholic organizations and the future of Catholic civil servants. After telling them that neither a personal life nor a state could run without Christianity and that he was going to help them fight liberalism, Socialism and Bolshevism, Hitler turned to Judaism and the Jewish question. There was "fundamental agreement" between National Socialism and Catholicism, he said, reminding them that the church had banished the Jewish parasites into ghettos. He was merely going to continue what the church had done for 1,500 years.²²¹ There was certainly nothing new in that advice.

About the only really consistent theme in Mein Kampf was that the elimination of the Jews is God's will and that he, Hitler, was going to complete the task in which the church had failed.²²² Christ, according to Hitler, "took to the whip to drive from the temple of the Lord this adversary of all humanity (and) in return ... was nailed to the cross, while our present-day party Christians debase themselves to begging for Jewish votes at elections." The greatness of Christianity, he wrote, lay not in negotiations for compromise in philosophical positions but in its "inexorable fanaticism in preaching and fighting for its own doctrines."²²³ It was only from the "fanatical intolerance" which was its "absolute presupposition" and which forced it to "undertake the destruction of heathen altars" instead of being content to build up its own altar that its clearly established faith could take form.²²⁴ Hitler believed that Protestantism was "a better defender of the interests of Germanism" when matters of "inner purity or national deepening as well as German freedom are involved ... but it combats with the greatest hostility any attempt to rescue the nation from the embrace of its most mortal enemy, since its attitude towards the Jews just happens to be more or less dogmatically established."²²⁵ He had written that religion could not be amalgamated with the scheming of political parties. Rome's entry into parliament had therefore made the Pan German movement impossible and made a struggle against the Catholic Church necessary, but the Kulturkampf had little practical result.²²⁶ The churches could overcome their conflict by a joint attack on Jews²²⁷ but the nation could not be made free by prayer. Sacrifice was needed.²²⁸

Yes, Hitler told the Catholic delegation, their schools would be quite safe, because character could only be built on religion. Devout, believing soldiers were the most valuable because they would risk everything. Trouble with Poland was on the horizon, he said, and therefore the church and the state had to cooperate in running confessional schools to bring up good devout soldiers.²²⁹ The parody was already turning into a farce. The church could never claim that it had not been warned, but apparently Berning and Steinmann deferred to the chancellor without debating the matter. Perhaps, like Bertram, they believed there were more immediate issues that might be prejudiced if they debated the Jewish question with him. Perhaps they agreed with him anyway. A few days later, about May 2, Bertram received a response from Pacelli to his petition of a fortnight earlier, before the bishops' conference. "Possible negotiations had been initiated," he said.²³⁰

Following those meetings there was still a bit of work to do to tidy up the concordat and the negotiating process took a couple of months but, as Hitler was so eager to get it signed promptly, the Vatican asked for, and got, a few extra concessions.²³¹ Drafts passed formally between Rome and Berlin, and eventually Pacelli took two German prelates into his confidence during their obligatory five-yearly visit to Rome on May 18. Archbishop Grober of Freiburg and Bishop Wilhelm Berning of Osnabruck, both Nazi sympathizers, were told that the time had come for all the German bishops to "consolidate their view of the concordat." A few days later, in the third week of May, Hitler tired of Pacelli's delaying tactics and manoeuvring to get around the depoliticization issue by simply changing canon law to require episcopal approval for a priest to hold office in a political organization. He penned a note on the draft concordat insisting that all political activity by the Catholic clergy was to be categorically forbidden. But in spite of that, late in May, Pacelli still hedged and "patently lied when he told Cardinal Faulhaber of Munich that there had been merely talk of concordat, but nothing concrete."²³² He wanted to leave it to the two emissaries he had briefed in Rome (Grober and Berning) to persuade the bishops, in conference again at the end of May, that he had everything under control. A concordat was virtually complete, they said. The remaining focus of negotiation was the depoliticization issue; the Cardinal Secretary of State wanted their support and speed was of the essence.

Bitter disagreement erupted. Cardinal Schulte of Cologne insisted that no concordat could be concluded with a government under which law and right were nonexistent, and Bishop Konrad von Preysing wanted a pastoral letter addressed to all German Catholics telling them of conflict which was probable and the dangers for faith and morals which emerge from National Socialist ideology. However the objectors were a minority and the bishops, although suggesting revision of the depoliticization clause, were influenced by their confidence in Pacelli and endorsed the signing of a concord.²³³ The bishops obligingly resolved to lift the ban on Catholic membership of the Nazi party and a pastoral letter, drafted by Grober, was published on June 3.²³⁴ A few days later the concerns of the minority were confirmed when the SA violently broke up a rally of 25,000 Catholic apprentices from all over Germany and a giant open mass planned for the following day was cancelled.²³⁵

Negotiations had also begun by then for the four power pact and Hitler helped both negotiations along a bit by telling the Garrison Church gathering that his government saw in Christianity the unshakable foundation of the moral and ethical life of the German people and therefore attached the "utmost importance to the cultivation and maintenance of the friendliest relations with the Holy See."²³⁶ But the industrialists who had planned to have Hitler as a puppet soon found that it was he who was pulling the strings through a party-controlled chamber of commerce and industry, and farmer and worker organizations were brought to heel by similar means. On June 22 the Social Democrats joined the Communist Party in the history books and the Catholic Centre Party was not far behind. That day von Papen received from Hitler his final requirement for the depoliticization clause. It included the words "the Holy See will ensure a ban on all clergy and members of religious congregations from party political activity" and a note acknowledging that the Holy See had the power to control and coerce Catholic clergy in Germany with efficient sanctions through canon law.²³⁷ Any lingering doubts which Catholics world-wide had about the meaning of the Vatican's policy of Ultramontanism should have been promptly dispelled!

Von Papen personally took the revised clause – in effect an ultimatum from Hitler – to Rome on June 28 "for Pacelli, the Curia, and the Pope to ponder." The pondering gave way to acceptance on Sunday, July 1, when Pius XI and Pacelli went over it together, except that the pope, noting the endless round of “alternating abuse and negotiation,” pressed for “guarantees of restitution for acts of violence,” without which there would be no signature.²³⁸ Von Papen was happy to write them in, knowing very well that they were only words which would never be applied in practice, and being impatient for the dissolution of the sole remaining democratic party – the Catholic Centre Party – so that the concordat could be signed and sealed. The dissolution took only three days to determine. Kaas, acting at the behest of Pacelli, blasted a left wing leader of the Centre Party over the phone on July 2 with: “What! Haven’t you dissolved yourselves yet?”²³⁹ Bruning, as leader, resisted but on July 4, faced with the defection of many Centre politicians to the Nazis, he reluctantly agreed to ‘voluntary’ dissolution rather than liquidation enforced by more direct Vatican intervention.²⁴⁰ His prompt acquiescence apparently distressed Pacelli who would have preferred him to hang on so that the existence of the party could still be used as a bargaining chip until the concordat came into force.²⁴¹

THE SEAL OF APPROVAL

The concordat was initialled in the Vatican Secretariat of State in a tense atmosphere on Saturday, July 8, and announced to the world on Sunday, July 9, 1933. Then on July 14, just four months after he was elected to head a coalition government, Hitler’s cabinet had a memorable day. It accepted a one-party plan without dissent; it announced the dissolution of all political parties except the Nazis; it approved a constitution to organize the Protestant churches into the Reich Church (Reichskirche) which was to be cleansed of all baptized Jews; and it also approved ghastly sterilization laws modelled on the pattern of those in the US. These were not announced immediately. Hitler chose to withhold that news pending the actual signing of the concordat.²⁴² Of course cabinet formally approved the concordat as well, and with his astute understanding of the church, domestic public opinion and world political sympathies, Hitler told his colleagues that the concordat had created an atmosphere of confidence that would be “especially significant in the urgent struggle against international Jewry.”²⁴³ Five days later, on July 19, the Catholic bishops announced the decision they had taken some time earlier to lift the ban on party membership and called for loyalty and obedience to the new regime with its dictatorial powers. Next day, Thursday July 20, Vice Chancellor von Papen, (the former Chancellor and Centre Party leader), and Minister Göring arrived in Rome with the concordat for the official signing. They were received at the Vatican with great honours.²⁴⁴ Pacelli signed for the Vatican and von Papen signed for the Reich government.

Events continued to move at a great pace. It was as if Catholic organizations across Germany were competing to decorate the Hitler bandwagon. The once-independent Centre Party had been destroyed in the interests of church aggrandisement through the Reich Concordat which Rome had been working towards ever since the peace treaty but which it could not achieve while the Weimar Republic existed. That concordat was considered second only in importance to the linked Lateran Treaty and Italian Concordat. Hitler had the blessing of the church which he wanted. He was legitimate in the eyes of the world,²⁴⁵ and he had the pope's undertaking that the Vatican would stay out of German politics. That was probably just as important.²⁴⁶

The Vatican had forced its supporters out of German party politics so effectively and so ruthlessly at that critical time in history that its apparent lack of concern had several very important consequences. It imposed another intolerable conflict of interest on its adherents by implying moral approval of Hitler's policies, and by enabling Hitler to play one wing of the church against another. It compromised the Protestant wing also, but that was a fact which would not have concerned it in the least. It not only bound the German church hierarchy and the faithful to political silence and inaction on any issue the Nazi regime deemed 'political', especially the persecution of the Jewish community. It also involved them directly in that persecution when, on April 25, the day before Hitler's meeting with Berning and Steinmann, its priests became part of an anti-Semitic attestation bureaucracy which provided details of 'blood purity' from marriage and baptismal registries. By treating the Jewish community with such continuing, self-centred and nonchalant disregard it ensured that the trouble in the triangle would roll on relentlessly towards the final act. In doing so, it also compromised the contemporary concept of cultural and institutional Christianity as a system on which to base community life and as a vehicle for humanity's salvation.

The linchpin in a series of interlinked situations was a secret annex to the concordat with Hitler. It was known to only a handful of German officials, German bishops and Vatican negotiators. It was so secret that Germany's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at the outbreak of World War II did not know of it until advised by the papal nuncio in the hurly-burly of final preparations for the invasion of Poland which was launched two days later.²⁴⁷

The secret annex provided exemptions and privileges for Catholic clergy and students studying for the priesthood in the event of Germany introducing universal military training or general mobilization.²⁴⁸ Its significance lies not in the fact that students were exempt from training except in a general mobilization, and not in the fact that most diocesan clergy would be exempt from service while the balance were to be inducted only for pastoral work with troops, ie, as chaplains, or in the medical corps. Its significance lies in two facts. Firstly, that it existed as a secret annex instead of as an integral part of article 27 of the concordat which dealt with the relationship between the Catholic Church and the army.²⁴⁹ Secondly, that it was added to the concordat at the request of the Fulda Bishops at their conference in May 1933.²⁵⁰ We know that Hitler disclosed his intention to do battle with Poland in his conversations with Bishop Berning and Monsignor Steinmann on April 26, but it is doubtful whether that was sufficient basis for a secret agreement. The conclusion is therefore inescapable that the Vatican and probably the bishops' conference were privy to even more details of Hitler's plans than have been disclosed progressively over the years.

The Vatican's self-understanding, its view of the church and its determination to keep a soft spot for its clergy were more important than peace. Having entered into that secret agreement the Vatican could not disclose or denounce Hitler's plans for war, (or his later genocidal programme), even while Britain was continuing to disarm and its gullible prime minister was waving misleading pieces of paper at his voters. If it had done so it would have forfeited those privileges. For the same reason it could not, if it had actually wanted to, take decisive action against Hitler's anti-Semitic programme and his ultimate attempt at genocide. If the Vatican had disclosed and denounced what it knew of Hitler's plans in the way that Karl Barth, Dietrich Bonhoeffer and a number of others attempted to do, firstly, it would have lost its privileges and its German clergy would have been in some degree of danger, along with those others, but secondly, the course of history may have been significantly different.

Therein lies a major piece in the jigsaw puzzle of the parody. At that critical stage the Vatican did not have the courage to say "we want a concordat with Germany but we are not prepared to commit ourselves to a racist warmonger who is about to withdraw from the League of Nations, flout the Allied-imposed peace treaty and re-arm in preparation to invade Poland." If it had done so, the stance of the rest of the world would have changed and Hitler may have been prevented by combined domestic and foreign pressure from acting on the policy to which the Vatican knew he was committed. Instead it acquiesced in Hitler's withdrawal from the Disarmament Conference and the League of Nations, and the dissolution of the Reichstag, all of which he announced on October 14, 1933 only five weeks after the concordat was ratified on Sunday, September 10, by the ceremonial official exchange of signed documents. Brüning had mounted a vigorous personal campaign to persuade the bishops to reject it but, not surprisingly in view of the senior hierarchy ranged against him, he had failed.²⁵¹ The Catholic Church in Germany celebrated the ratification with great enthusiasm, a highlight of which was a rousing service of thanksgiving in St. Hedwig's Cathedral, Berlin, on Sunday, September 17, presided over by the papal nuncio. With the cathedral draped with Nazi flags and Catholic banners, the service, complete with the singing of the Nazi 'anthem' the Horst Wessel Song, was relayed by loud speakers to thousands outside.²⁵² The church then threw its immense weight and prestige behind Hitler in both the single-party election and the plebiscite on the matter of withdrawal from the League which he called for November 12, 1933, and which was his method of engineering his other vital need: a show of public support.

Certainly the church was in good company. On the day before the election and the plebiscite – the anniversary of Armistice Day 1918 – Hindenberg broadcast a call to all Germans to show national unity and support for the government. His call was to "Support with me and the Reich Chancellor the principle of equal rights and of peace with honour, and show the world that we have recovered, and with the help of God will maintain, German unity!" The show of unity and public support for Hitler was so overwhelming that it shocked international observers. Ninety six per cent of all registered voters cast their ballots. Of those, 95 per cent approved of Germany's withdrawal from the League, and 92 percent voted for the National Socialist single-party slate of candidates.^{253 254}

On the surface, or from the things which the general public could see and hear, the new marriage between the Catholic Church and the Nazi regime which had been engineered by Pacelli and Hitler appeared to be a brilliant success. However even during the honeymoon period it had been difficult to conceal the tensions and the relationship would very quickly become somewhat stormy. And while that relationship was a key aspect of the trouble in the triangle it was intimately woven into the enormous web which was being stretched further and further, and two other aspects – Hitler's relations with the Reformed Churches and the Jewish Question must be examined before we look further at the stormy Catholic-Nazi relationship.

HITLER AND THE REFORMED CHURCH

In the meantime Hitler had not ignored the Reformed wing of the church but, as he had indicated in Mein Kampf, his problem with them was somewhat different. He either had to coerce or cajole them into line on the Jewish question or suppress them. Although German theologians had been active in the ecumenical movement and although the booming voice of Karl Barth had shaken the church out of its lethargy, his task was made surprisingly easy by the confusion and fragmentation which afflicted the Reformed wing in the wake of the Vatican's support for the Enabling Act. His amazingly quick success depended on a combination of all three approaches as his hacks, armed with a carrot, a whip and then the Vatican Concordat, set about playing one group against another.

Even before the second edition of Barth's Epistle to the Romans went into general distribution many younger Reformed theologians had begun to feel nagging doubts about the church's basic doctrines. There was the challenge of Zionism on one hand, given credibility by the Balfour Declaration, and there was the Papal Oath Against Modernism on the other hand, striking chords of sympathy in a surprising number of Protestant ears. Intellectuals debated "common grace", "predestination" and "determinism" (explaining cause and effect patterns in a way which added confusion to ideas about humanity's free will and God's incomprehensible authority) against a backdrop of scientific progress, a world war and international discord. It became clear that if there were "religious absolutes" then some theologians were right and others were wrong. That called into question the correctness of the church's simplistic black and white creeds. That, in turn, called into question the relationship between Christianity and other faiths, especially Judaism and the third partner in the triangle, Islam, which was just beginning to be forced back into Europe's narrow field of vision by the Great War and the consequences of the Balfour Declaration.

The theologians could still largely ignore Islam because of Europe's physical isolation from the immense regions of Muslim influence, and because of the relative military and economic weakness of its people. They could also try to make believe that the Balfour Declaration was purely a matter for political consideration but, try as they might, they could not ignore its consequences or its implications. Efforts to prop up the creeds led to the study and teaching of Apologetics, (the defence of doctrine against non-Christian criticism by reasoned argument), from a Reformed point of view whereas since the Reformation it had been a peculiarly Catholic activity. Some theologians saw Apologetics as a means of recovering the lost spiritual militancy of the early Reformation years while others saw it as a defence against secularism and as an asset which the church “needed ... desperately if it was not going to lose its power among the intellectuals.”²⁵⁵

In the near fantasy world of bigotry, ethnic division, conflicting propaganda, deflated national pride and crushed personal aspirations which the Allies, the Vatican and Wilhelm had combined to leave for his successors to sort out, there was a quite natural keenness among churchmen to use the Gospel and the church as vehicles towards national cohesion and reconstruction. There were many who were searching for a theological justification for their country's aspirations and some of them were very ready to follow Bismarck's Court Preacher Adolf Stocker. They used much the same distortions of both Paul's letters and Luther's anti-Semitism and anti-democratism in efforts, firstly, to prepare a base for a federation of Germany's churches organized on a regional basis and, secondly, to remove Jewish influence. They were quite prepared for a confrontation with Karl Barth over his interpretation of Romans. They took literally Paul's words that the people of the church must all obey the governing authorities, since all government comes from God and since the civil authorities were therefore appointed by God. Paul had said that “anyone who resists authority is rebelling against God's decision, and such an act is bound to be punished.”²⁵⁶

These tensions surfaced from time to time in the wider arena such as at the ecumenical conference in Stockholm in 1925 when a German theologian shocked delegates with his claim that the Christianization of the world was impossible.²⁵⁷ He was reflecting the sentiment which was common in Europe at the time (and which had been evident in the call for unity issued by the Lambeth Conference) that Christianity was a cultural phenomenon. It had evolved with a particular character in Europe; it had to be fostered there; its impact on the rest of the world would be indirect and it would be expressed through the activities of European governments, enterprises and individuals. It had to be cleansed of all non-Christian or pre-Christian influences including that of Judaism. Volume I of Mein Kampf, with most of Hitler's general discussion on the two wings of the church, had been published just one month before the Stockholm Conference. Volume II, with his attack on foreign mission work and most of his discussion on race and culture control through Eugenics, was published sixteen months later.

Prominent among churchmen who promoted the European culture concept of Christianity was Otto Dibelius who, as General Superintendent, sent a blatantly anti-Semitic Easter message to the clergy of his diocese in 1928.²⁵⁸ Thuringian German Christians were quick to demand a complete commitment to politics through an intimate alliance of the church with the Nazis. They promoted the idea of “One people, one God, one Nation, one Church”, they marched behind the motto “we put our trust in the Godsent Fuhrer”, and they took full advantage of Hitler's temporary gas blindness and his vision, relating it to Paul's temporary blindness and his vision on the road to Damascus. In a similar mould the extreme right-wing “Faith Movement of German Christians” provided chaplaincy services for Hitler's paramilitary “Brownshirts.” Their support for the dictator helped to offset his antagonism to Protestantism which was partly a reaction to its "soft" attitude to the Jewish question. ²⁵⁹

The Guiding Principles of the Faith Movement represented a fundamental repudiation or contradiction of generally accepted interpretations of the Gospel which are supposed to be the basis of the life and teaching of the Christian Church. The Movement criticized weak Christianity, parliamentarianism in the church and ecclesiastical political parties as well. It was the example par excellence of the historical stream which saw religion as the prop with which to preserve national political stability and the interests and privileged position of the elite of the day. Although it had no time for multinational churches and was vigorously anti-papal there are remarkable similarities between its platform and the thrust of the pope's remarks concerning the purpose of the Feast of Christ the King. Its Guiding Principles were dated June 6, 1932, just six months after Pius XI had instituted the new Solemn Feast.

The Faith Movement demanded a "reawakened German sense of vitality respected in our church" and an all-out fight against the reactionary Center Party, against atheistic Marxism "which is the enemy of religion and the nation, and against its Christian social fellow travellers of every shade." It said the way into the Kingdom of God was "through struggle, cross, and sacrifice, not through a false peace." Race, folk and nation were "orders of existence granted and entrusted to us by God (and) consequently miscegenation is to be opposed." Mere pity is charity and becomes presumptuous, coupled with a bad conscience, and makes people soft, it said, demanding that the nation be protected against the unfit and the inferior with home missions organized to avoid adding to "the degeneration of our people." It claimed that mission to Jews was "an entrance gate for alien blood into our body politic" and a grave danger to nationality. Holy scripture spoke of "holy wrath and a refusal of love." Marriage between Germans and Jews was therefore to be forbidden to avoid the danger of "racial camouflage and bastardization." Finally, throwing Peter's vision of the unclean food out the window it said "We repudiate the spirit of a Christian world citizenship. We want the degenerating manifestations of this spirit, such as pacifism, internationalism, Free Masonry, etc., overcome by a faith in our national mission that God has committed to us"²⁶⁰ It was more than a continuation of the German Protestant belief that German history was a unique and most significant part of revelation and that the mission of Imperial Germany was to exercise world domination as an expression of divine will, as reflected in the Declaration of the 93 in 1914. (Chapter 16) It was an extension of it.

From January 1933, and Hitler's rise to the chancellorship, moves to unify the 28 provincial Evangelical Churches into a single Reich Church under a Reich Bishop were stepped up. Five months of deep division and politicking followed as Hitler eased and forced his nominees into key church posts and while a constitution for his unified Reich church was prepared. It was completed to his satisfaction only two days after the initialling of the Vatican Concordat and approved by 'cabinet' on July 14, 1933, together with the Concordat. He was then in a position to play one church against the other with the clear threat that if either the Roman Catholic Church or the Reich Church stepped out of line the appropriate document could be annulled on some suitable pretext. Such action would have left the field clear for Hitler to demonstrate his version of the old claim that political stability came through theological conformity.

But a small minority of Evangelical Christians refused to accept the new situation. Among them was Dietrich Bonhoeffer who tried to put his preaching into political practice and was later hanged (only weeks before Hitler's death) for his part in attempts to assassinate the Fuhrer. In 1930–31 Bonhoeffer, having completed his doctorate and already under the influence of Barth's reforming zeal, spent a year at Union Theological Seminary, New York, and developed a close working relationship with black American students and their congregations. He soon realized that any form of nationalism or claims for one nation to have a mission to enforce its culture on the world could not be reconciled with Christianity. Then a few months after returning to Germany he was asked to attend a joint meeting of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Life and Work Movement in Cambridge, and his commitment to ecumenism deepened when he accepted appointment as one of three regional secretaries to the new joint Youth Commission (chapter 17). He developed a strong theology of ecumenism and against war, arguing that war could no longer be regarded as an order of preservation because it resulted in the destruction of all belligerents, destroying both the body and the soul, and it therefore had to be denounced by the church. Then, presumably without being conscious of doing it, he picked up the thrust of each of Islamic understanding of religion and state, the debate in Palestine between the Zionist Movement and the Ultra-Orthodox Jewish community (see chapter 17), and one aspect of Augustine's City of God. He said that Christianity and the world, church and state, were all standing together under the revealed word of God in Christ and for this reason there was no longer any separate sphere of political life in which the state operated according to its own laws of being.²⁶¹

It was then a very logical and profound step, but personally dangerous, when Bonhoeffer responded to the establishment and policies of the Reichskirche with a paper entitled The Church and the Jewish Question. He said that if a church wanted to exclude members on racial grounds then it was no church.

*What is at stake is by no means the question whether our German members of congregations can still tolerate church fellowship with Jews. It is rather the task of Christian preaching to say: here is the church where Jew and German stand together under the Word of God; here is the proof whether a church is still a church or not.*²⁶²

Battle lines had been drawn. In September, 1933, while Bruning was campaigning against the ratification of the Reich Concordat, Bonhoeffer had the World Alliance pass resolutions condemning the Jewish policy of the German government and protesting against those church synods which applied the Nazi-inspired 'Aryan paragraph' within the church. Moves to establish a 'Confessing Church' picked up pace.²⁶³

But perhaps principal among those opposed to Nazi racial and religious policies was Karl Barth, by then a professor at the University of Bonn, who, together with Eduard Thurneysen, a colleague from his days as a village pastor at Safenwil, established a journal²⁶⁴ which kept up a stream of opposition to the linking of Christianity in Germany with National Socialism. It provided a means for others of like mind to keep in touch and enabled the Pastors' Emergency League, (founded by Martin Niemoller about the same time), to expand into the Confessing Church, for which Barth drafted the Barmen Confession. The Synod of Barmen was held from May 29 to 31, 1934, and included representatives of the Evangelical Congregations of the Lutheran, Reformed and United Churches in Germany. It was convened "to withstand in faith and unanimity the destruction of the Confession of Faith, and thus of the Evangelical Church in Germany." It declared that "In opposition to attempts to establish the unity of the German Evangelical Church by means of false doctrine, by the use of force and insincere practices, the Confessional Synod insists that the unity of the Evangelical Churches in Germany can come only from the Word of God in faith through the Holy Spirit. Thus alone is the Church renewed." It went on to repudiate the constitution of the Reich Church, to condemn the theological errors and false doctrines which were devastating the church, and to contrast, by clear implication, the roles and influence of Christ and Hitler.

While Barth worked on his monumental Church Dogmatics from the relative security of Switzerland's neutrality the world slowly and painfully dragged itself out of the depression and Hitler built his new German Reich at a fanatical pace. He was driven on by the fear that he might not live long enough to see his plans fulfilled and he used vast amounts of British and American capital in industrial development. He was the darling of the industrialists, being the European leader best able to maintain growth and industrial peace, and he was the arch enemy of Communism. While he built concentration camps for his opponents, gas chambers for the mentally and physically handicapped, sterilization clinics for those who were not to be permitted to breed and an army which the Great War Allies were not in a position to say 'No' to, the Reich Church's Evangelicals and the Roman Catholic Church competed for the privilege of keeping his persecution of them to a minimum by a strong display of support.²⁶⁵

Pastor Niemoller was another who spent some years in a concentration camp for his trouble but he survived. Barth, being a Swiss subject, was more fortunate than his German colleagues. Deprived of his university post and expelled from Germany in 1935 he accepted a post at the university of his home town, Basel, and continued the theological rethink which he had started while the Balfour Declaration was still only an idea in Dr Weizmann's mind.

THE JEWISH QUESTION

While Hitler's relations with both the Catholic and Reformed wings of the Christian Church were vital to his political plans, they were nevertheless of secondary importance. As much as both institutions may have wished to think otherwise, they were for the most part merely means to an end. Dealing with the Jews, on the other hand, was primary. However, although Hitler's intention and aim to 'solve the Jewish Question' – to eliminate all Jewish influence within Germany and within his sphere of influence – was one of the central points of the political philosophy which he had expounded ad nauseam until his appointment as Chancellor on January 30, 1933, he had not taken office with any clear plan prepared on how that aim was to be achieved. As a result, action against the Jews at first was left in the hands of local Nazi Party groups or officials who were all eager to fulfill their understanding of the Fuhrer's intention, and such action, mainly against Jewish traders and businesses, was haphazard, brutal and degrading. The increase in anti-Jewish activity which followed the election of March 5, 1933, has been described as a 'revolution from below.' Hitler knew that he had to put some order into his fuzzy plan to exclude the Jews from the economic life of Germany and to expel them from the country, and provide some guidelines or a channel for the energies of the party radicals, or he would fail in both objectives, the country's reputation would suffer, and he would lose the support of the country's conservative elite who had financed his political campaign.²⁶⁶ He also knew that while he retained the confidence of Germany's conservative elite – and basically that meant steadily increasing economic activity and their profits because those were the only matters which concerned most of them – he would face a minimum of opposition from their foreign counterparts and the Jewish community would find it very hard to secure a base for anti-Nazi propaganda in the foreign media.

The percentage of Jews in the total German population was about 5.4 percent but, as with any ethnic group in any country, they were not uniformly represented throughout the community or in all sectors of employment. About 16 percent of the country's lawyers and public notaries were Jews, 15 percent of brokers and commission agents, 11 percent of doctors and 9 percent of dentists. However the Jewish profile was highest in the commerce and trade sector in which one half (48.9 per cent according to the census of June 16, 1933, three months after the passing of the Enabling Act) of the total number of Jews in regular employment were involved, compared with under one sixth of the non-Jewish population. (The figure for the number of people involved in the trade and commerce sector as a percentage of the total population, including Jews, was 15.6 percent.)²⁶⁷ A boycott against Jewish traders and business houses would therefore have the most immediate and most visible impact of any action which could be organized. It would be the most easily organized, using the Nazi party machinery which was already in place and, because it would have some impact on the ordinary shopping or commercial habits of almost every person, it would have the most immediate 'educational' or indoctrinating influence as it drew everyone into an official political or ideological activity of the state. A successful boycott would also serve to show to the outside world who the 'real' rulers of Germany were and demonstrate that they were strong enough to maintain quiet. Julius Streicher, editor of the anti-Semitic weekly Der Stürmer, was appointed to head a committee of dedicated Nazis in organizing the boycott.²⁶⁸

THE ANTI-NAZI BOYCOTT ...

Before it could be implemented, however, forces outside Germany began counter-measures against the new regime's treatment of Jews which threatened to sink the plan. Early in March, when it was apparent that the election was consolidating Hitler's authority in Germany, an anti-Nazi boycott movement formed in Poland and took hold in a number of other east European countries. In Britain a spontaneous boycott of German goods by Jews and non-Jews also coalesced into an organized boycott movement.²⁶⁹ On March 19, New York's Jewish War Veterans announced a trade boycott of Germany and organized a protest parade for March 23, the day on which the Enabling Act was due to be voted on by the Reichstag and when the German Centre Party, under pressure from the Vatican, capitulated to Hitler. In the meantime, in response to mounting public pressure, leading Zionist Rabbi Stephen Wise of the American Jewish Congress, an organization strongly aligned with the World Zionist Organization, organized a mass rally at Madison Square Garden scheduled for March 27.²⁷⁰

The prospect of an international anti-Nazi boycott which had been widely canvassed posed a significant problem for the new regime. Jews were prominent in the retail trade in US and Europe, and an organized boycott of German goods could badly damage Germany's balance of trade just as Hitler began to implement measures designed to pull the country out of the Depression. Fearing retaliation against their own companies, Hitler's capitalist backers urged him to call off his action. In response, the Nazi leadership decided to use German Jewry to head off Wise. Immediately after the passage of the Enabling Act, Göring called a meeting with four prominent Jewish leaders, including representatives of the assimilationist Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith (CV) and the Zionist Federation of Germany (ZVfD). Göring flatly told the gathered Jewish representatives that unless the Rally was stopped, he could not vouch for the safety of German Jews. He proposed that a delegation go to London to contact world Jewry and pass on the message. The Assimilationists declined the offer. The ZVfD representative accepted.²⁷¹

On March 27, while the German Catholics and Protestants were competing with each other to show their loyalty to Hitler, after prevailing upon CV member Dr Ludwig Tietz to join them in the mission, ZVfD officials Martin Rosenbluth and Richard Lichteim arrived in London. Meeting immediately with forty Jewish leaders at a gathering chaired by World Zionist Organization president Nahum Sokolow, the delegation gave stark evidence of the situation of German Jews. Later, after meeting with British officials, Rosenbluth called Wise in New York. Rosenbluth later claimed in his memoirs to have conveyed a cryptic message to Wise to proceed with the rally. No independent evidence exists to support this claim. On the contrary, only hours after speaking to Wise the ZVfD officials cabled the Jewish Agency Executive in Palestine in the name of the Zionist Executive in London requesting that they immediately dispatch to the Chancellery of the Third Reich statements declaring that they did not condone an organized anti-German boycott. When the London Executive learned of this several hours later they sent another cable to Jerusalem to head off the first.²⁷² That night, March 27, despite the efforts of Rosenbluth and the ZVfD, the rally went ahead as a large assembly of politicians, churchmen and trade unionists gathered at Madison Square Garden to denounce the Hitler regime.

... AND A RAPID RESPONSE

The Nazi response was immediate. At a meeting between Goebbels and Hitler next day, March 28, an official decree was approved for publication as a front page full-page notice in the official Nazi newspaper Völkischer Beobachter (VB) on Friday, March 29, instituting a general boycott against all Jews in Germany with effect from 10am on Saturday, April 1, the day after a specially convened meeting with all of the German Churches which Hitler had ordered to take advantage of the capitulation by the Catholic Centre Party under pressure from the Vatican. The headline read 'Let Jewry Know Against Whom It Has Declared War.'²⁷³ It was, in effect, the implementation of the previously, but rather loosely, planned anti-Jewish boycott. The boycott against Jewish goods, shops, doctors and lawyers was intended to "hit the Jews in their most sensitive spot", their commercial activities, and it was intended to continue indefinitely. Local action committees were to organize SA and SS guards to prevent shoppers from entering Jewish premises, and propaganda and mass protest meetings to demand that the number of Jews in any trade or profession should be reduced to not more than the proportion which they represented of the total population.²⁷⁴

Among the first to learn what it meant to be a Jew in the new Germany was the Director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Research Institute for Physics, formulator of the Theories of Relativity and 1921 Nobel Prize winner, Albert Einstein, who was in the United States as a visiting professor at the time. In his absence Hitler seized his house and his bank accounts and had his books and writings publicly burned in front of the Opera House-cum Parliament.

However the immediate public response to the Nazi boycott was poor. Many shoppers ignored the guards. Many were apathetic or openly antagonistic to the program, trouble was caused in some cities, and it became apparent that there would be a generally negative impact on the economy and that trade would not automatically increase for non-Jews at the expense of Jews. The boycott in that form was therefore called off with an official announcement on April 4 that the "boycott has achieved its purpose and is over"²⁷⁵ and attention turned to reducing the number of Jews in the professions and the public service by legislation rather than by using Nazi party machinery. Measures had already been taken in Prussia before Hitler gained the Chancellery to prevent Jews camouflaging their presence by changing their family names, and these were now tightened.²⁷⁶ In addition, in a matter of only days, the first formal anti-Semitic legislation was drafted and introduced on April 7. It was the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service under clause three of which, the 'Aryan Clause', officials of non-Aryan descent were to be retired. President Hindenberg insisted that exceptions be made of those who held office on August 1, 1914, those who had fought at the front during the war, and those whose fathers or sons had been killed on active service. Four days later, on April 11, the Law Concerning Admission to the Legal Profession took effect with the same 'Aryan Clause.'

Hitler had directed that medical doctors were to be exempted from the 'Aryan Clause' but in a clear case of the 'Revolution from Below' which showed that he did not always set the pace,

Nazi local authorities banned Jewish doctors from health insurance panels and the Reich Minister for Labour found it necessary to ratify that action and to include dentists and dental technicians as well.²⁷⁸ Similarly, immediately Hitler came to power and without waiting for legislation or consulting the new central government for guidelines, some states had begun to exclude Jewish students from popular courses on the basis that they were avoiding over crowding for non-Jewish students. It was therefore necessary to put some order into what was happening (and what Hitler intended anyway) and the Law Against the Overcrowding of German Schools was introduced on April 25,²⁷⁹ together with the establishment of an anti-Semitic attestation bureaucracy which was to provide details of 'blood purity' from marriage and baptismal registries to facilitate the enforcement of the major laws. The number of Jewish students in any course, school or university was limited to five percent, but another clause setting the total Jewish enrolment at a maximum of 1.5 percent gave radical Nazi authorities the opportunity to exclude Jews altogether so that the national average would not be exceeded. It was this boycott program, or the early stages of it anyway, to which the Mufti and members of the Palestinian delegation referred during their meeting with German Consul Wolf later in the month.

The acceptance of Göring's mission by the German Zionists was not an isolated event. On the contrary, it represented the first major step in a campaign by a major part of the world Zionist movement to secure the cooperation of the Nazi regime in their program of emigration to Palestine. To the German Zionists, and later the World Zionist Organization, the equation was simple: Hitler wanted the Jews out of Germany, and the Zionist movement could help take them off his hands. Cooperating with the regime to undermine the anti-Nazi boycott would not only help establish the proper relationship with the Nazis necessary if emigration to Palestine was to be allowed, it would also undermine the positions of those Assimilationists, both in Germany and abroad, who did not support the Zionist solution to the Jewish question. There was, of course, the problem of those Jews who wished to stay in Germany or who were not able to emigrate, but that was evidently of secondary importance. The primary issue was Palestine. And, it may well have seemed, once the proper foundation was established and a practical solution to the Jewish question in Germany was seen to be achievable, Hitler would perhaps listen to reason and moderate his approach to those left behind.

As already noted, Sam Cohen had already proposed, through Consul Wolf in Jerusalem, a trading scheme to assist some settlers to reach Palestine. In spite of the Nazis' measures against Jews in Germany his scheme was now approved by the German authorities and early in May Cohen signed an agreement for 1 million Reichmarks (US$400,000) in Jewish wealth to be shipped to Palestine in the form of farm machinery.

A memorandum sent by ZVfD to the Nazi Party less than three months later, and the German response, provides a revealing insight into the thinking of both parties. The memorandum sought to solicit the cooperation of the Nazi Party in the solution to the Jewish question in Germany. It stated in part: "...For its practical aims, Zionism hopes to be able to win the collaboration even of a government fundamentally hostile to Jews, because in dealing with the Jewish question no sentimentalities are involved but a real problem whose solution interests all peoples, and at the present moment especially the German people.” That blunt statement was followed by one less direct, but nevertheless just as clear in intent: “The realization of Zionism could only be hurt by resentment of Jews abroad against current German development. Boycott propaganda – such as it is currently being carried on against Germany in many ways – is in essence un-Zionist, because Zionism wants not to do battle but to convince and build...Our observations, presented herewith, rest on the conviction that, in solving the Jewish problem according to its own lights, the German Government will have full understanding for a candid and clear Jewish posture that harmonizes with the interests of the state.”²⁸⁰

The pitch was simple if tactfully presented. In return for favoured treatment the Zionists would downplay the issue of Germany's treatment of Jews and work to undermine the international anti-Nazi boycott movement. The German government would gain a ready-made propaganda counterweight to anti-Nazi sentiment abroad, while the Zionist movement would benefit from a reduced focus on assimilationist issues while at the same time being allowed to advance its program for Palestine.

Equally important as the terms of the proposed bargain, however, was the reasoning by which the ZVfD sought to persuade the Nazis of the merits of their case. According to the ZVfD memorandum, Zionism could foster a practical working relationship with Nazism because of the affinity between the two movements. Zionism was in fact akin to Nazism because both were based on the nationalist/racist community ideal. The memorandum stated in part:

“...an answer to the Jewish question truly satisfying to the national state can be brought about only with the collaboration of the Jewish movement that aims at a social, cultural and moral renewal of Jewry...a rebirth of national life, such as is occurring in German life through adhesion to Christian and national values, must also take place in the Jewish national group...”

...On the foundation of the new [German] state, which has established the principle of race, we wish so to fit our community into the total structure so that for us, too, in the sphere assigned to us, fruitful activity for the fatherland is possible...Our acknowledgment of Jewish Nationality provides for a clear and sincere relationship with the German people and its national and racial realities. Precisely because we do not wish to falsify these fundamentals, because we, too, are against mixed marriage and are for maintaining the purity of the Jewish group...”²⁸¹ (Emphasis added.)

Those statements may not have represented the thinking of mainstream Zionism. They may well also have been designed to play upon National Socialist prejudices. Nevertheless, they were quite consistent with the published views of a large number of Zionist writers of the time, German and otherwise. The fact that representatives of the Zionist movement could plausibly make such claims demonstrates that Zionism, no less than Christianity, was deeply infected with the distorted thinking at the heart of Hitler's parody. Both groups had lost sight of the reality of the historical expansion of Judaism and the extreme dilution – complete severing in some regions – of the direct link between racial origin and religious faith for the majority of the European Jewish population many hundreds of years before. The church's fight was actually against its parent religion which challenged its origins and its theology. The people called Jews were the vehicle for that religion and they were persecuted and isolated accordingly. Hitler's fight was against the people called Jews as a consequence of their perceived influence, communal characteristics and conduct. These were the product of their persecution and isolation in their role as the vehicle for that parent religion. Neither the church nor Hitler seemed able to comprehend the difference.

But it is equally important that, as the peak body of the international Zionist movement and perhaps the most influential representative of the interests of international Jewry, the World Zionist Organization severely undermined the morale and effectiveness of those groups, both Jewish and otherwise, who sought to oppose Hitler's racial policies when it later supported the ZVfD's line. At a time when the new regime was most vulnerable to challenge, the Zionist movement was so intent on fulfilling its aspirations for a Jewish return to Palestine that it chose not to confront Hitler but to cooperate with him.

However, opposition to the anti-Nazi boycott movement within the worldwide Jewish community did not come only from those who wished to collaborate with Hitler. Agudas Yisrael, the political arm of the Ultra Orthodox movement, opposed it on religious grounds, arguing that the Talmud forbade Jews to revolt against Gentile authority in the Diaspora. Others had political reasons. Fearful of the negative domestic consequences of a noisy public campaign, the British Council of Jewish Deputies refused to support the British boycott movement. Similarly, despite the fact that he had organized the Madison Square Garden rally and later opposed cooperation with Germany, Rabbi Stephen Wise also opposed a boycott. Along with many others he preferred instead the traditional Zionist approach of behind the scenes contacts with high-level policy makers and politicians. Writing to a friend he complained, "You cannot imagine what I am doing to resist the masses. They want tremendous street scenes."²⁸² Public protests would not only jeopardize the successful results of years of painstaking effort in establishing networks of influential contacts, they might also provoke even worse persecution in Germany.

Unfortunately for the advocates of the traditional approach, the State Department, like the British Foreign Office, at that stage saw Hitler more as a means to bottle up the Soviet Union than as a threat to human rights and was not likely to be persuaded by quiet diplomacy. Similarly, American politicians wanted German markets to offset the effects of the Depression and they were not going to be easily convinced to make a fuss about the situation of Germany's Jews if that meant fewer jobs for their constituents. Nevertheless, Wise and others maintained their stance. So with a large proportion of the American Jewish public demanding action, a serious rift was caused among American Jewry when Wise's American Jewish Congress and B'nai B'rith tried to muffle public protest and quash the boycott.²⁸³

The pace of events in Germany was such that even Mussolini was eventually moved to urge Hitler to soften his approach. However, it did little to blunt the efforts of those seeking Hitler's cooperation. Sam Cohen was soon superseded by more authoritative figures. Chaim Arlosoff, the Political Secretary of the Jewish Agency in Palestine, was also interested in finding a way to take advantage of Hitler's anti-Semitic posture. Arguing that world opinion would support a "constructive treatment of the Jewish question in Germany", his ambition was to eventually see established an alliance between the Zionists, Germany, Britain, and other European states, such as Italy, to organize the evacuation of Jewry from Germany. As a first step Arlossoff envisaged the setting up of a special bank along the lines of Cohen's scheme which would enable the gradual liquidation of the property and capital of German Jews, which could then be used as a means of stimulating the economic development of Palestine. Jewish property in Germany would be sold, the money put into a bank which would buy German goods to be sold in Palestine and other countries, and the money would then be available at a discounted rate to German immigrants to Palestine. In May, shortly after the signing of the Cohen contract, Arlossoff and the Nazis came to a preliminary understanding to extend Cohen's arrangements. However, Arlossoff's involvement was cut short brutally on June 16, when two days after returning to Tel Aviv from a trip to Berlin he was found murdered on a Tel Aviv beach.²⁸⁴

Arlossoff's death signalled the emergence of deep divisions within the international Zionist movement. In part these were motivated by developments in Palestine itself. In early 1933 the new British Administrator, General Wauchope, had revived a plan which had been dropped in 1930 for a Legislative Council with representation related to community numbers which would have therefore favoured the Palestinian Arabs. This had antagonized radical Zionists, who in response stepped up both legal and illegal immigration which reached a peak in 1935. In the meantime, however, their anger was increasingly directed against the British and against those 'soft' Zionist authorities who cooperated with the British. Arlossoff, a Socialist moderate who understood the aspirations of the Arabs, was a prime target, and his murder was generally believed to have been committed by extremist Revisionists.²⁸⁵ The fanatically right-wing Revisionists and their leader Vladimir Jabotinsky also favoured the anti-Nazi boycott and strongly opposed any dealings with the Nazi regime. The timing of Arlossoff's murder therefore strongly suggests that may also have been a factor in his assassination.

However, Arlossoff's death did little to stop the contacts. Negotiations were immediately taken over by the director of the Anglo-Palestine Bank in coordination with the ZVfD.²⁸⁶ Soon afterwards a letter was sent by the ZVfD to the World Zionist Organization requesting that the upcoming World Zionist Congress in Prague be called off. Fearful that the Congress would be used to denounce the Nazi regime, the ZVfD argued that their lives could be at stake at a time when "our legal existence has enabled us to organize thousands and to transfer large sums of money to Palestine."²⁸⁷ In the meantime, however, in an indication of the seriousness with which the Nazi leadership took the boycott threat, Germany's Finance Minister, Helmut Schacht, on a visit to the United States in May, met with a number of Jewish leaders to urge them not to carry out the boycott.²⁸⁸ At about the same time a confidential report was prepared for the American Jewish Congress about the precarious situation of the Jews in Germany which stressed the boycott's likely impact. By August, with Rabbi Wise in Europe preparing for the Prague Congress, militants in the American Jewish Congress called for a boycott to be implemented.²⁸⁹ The stage was therefore set for confrontation when the delegates to the Congress met on 21 August.

Business turned quickly to a resolution on the treatment of Jews by Nazi Germany. The WZO's leaders were in a difficult situation. They knew that the Nazis were interested in a deal and that they had to avoid offending Germany by limiting discussion of the situation there to a bare minimum. The regime was therefore not explicitly condemned. In addition, though the League of Nations was asked to help in the fight for the recovery of the rights of Jews in Germany, the request was buried in a lengthy discussion of emigration and Palestine. No plan was proposed to put pressure on the League, nor was any specific action called for on the League's part.²⁹⁰

THE TRANSFER AGREEMENT

Next on the agenda was a resolution on the anti-Nazi boycott. Before the proposed resolution could be debated, however, the German government announced that an agreement on Jewish migration had been signed with the Zionists. Under the so-called Transfer Agreement, or Ha'avara, German Jews would be allowed to ship 3 million Reichmarks worth of Jewish wealth to Palestine in the form of German export goods. The news fell like a bombshell among the delegates. When the Congress realized that the announcement was not a propaganda stunt, pandemonium broke out. Ironically, when business resumed the next day, it was the pro-fascist Revisionist leader Vladimir Jabotinsky who presented the argument for the boycott. However, as several of his Revisionists had been arrested by the British for Arlossoff's murder there was little chance he would get a hearing. The situation was made worse when several of his Brownshirts accompanied him into the hall in full military formation, compelling the Congress organizers to ban the uniforms for fear of provoking a riot from Arlossoff's Labour comrades. Consequently, despite the behind-the-scenes urgings of German CV members not to abandon the boycott movement,²⁹¹ Jabotinsky's motion of support for the boycott and opposition to the Transfer Agreement was dismissed by an overwhelming majority of 240 votes to 48.²⁹²

Nevertheless, opposition to Jabotinsky's motion did not mean that all delegates were in favour of the Ha'avara agreement. Wise, despite his opposition to the boycott, demanded that the leadership explain 'how to prevent German ... propagandists from utilizing the agreement.'²⁹³ Similarly, supporters of the boycott argued that the prospect of saving Germany's Jews through the boycott was neutralized by the readiness of the Zionists to enter into an economic agreement with Germany.²⁹⁴ In the face of such opposition the WZO executive committee was eventually forced to deny responsibility for the Ha'avara, claiming instead that it only bound Germany and the formal signatory, the Anglo-Palestine Bank. However, since that was its own bank its protestations rang somewhat hollow.²⁹⁵

Following the Congress the controversy raged on across the world Jewish community. In Poland, Jews feared that if there was no resistance to anti-Semitism next door their own anti-Semites would start demanding that the Polish Government imitate Germany. A movement opposed to the Ha'avara and favouring the boycott even arose in Palestine, mainly comprised of youth. Non-Zionists demanded that the Ha'avara be denounced, accusing the Yishuv of abandoning moral and political principles for the sake of economic gain.²⁹⁶ In America, prominent Zionist Rabbi Hillel Silver as well as Rabbi Wise spoke out in opposition. In a speech at a World Jewish Conference in September 1934 Wise stated the matter forcefully: "One leading Palestinian put it over and over again at Prague: Palestine has primacy. This conference must clearly state, that while Palestine has primacy over all other factors in the equation, its primacy ceases when it comes into conflict with a higher moral law."²⁹⁷

That argument had little impact on Ha'avara's backers. In 1934, Weizmann had clearly reflected the reasoning behind the ZVfD's memorandum of June 1933 to the Nazi Party when he stated: "We, being a Zionist Organization, should concern ourselves more with the constructive solution of the German question through the transfer of the Jewish youth from Germany to Palestine, rather than with the question of equal rights for Jews in Germany."²⁹⁸ Nevertheless, due to the sensitivity of the matter and the split within the WZO Executive, the Jewish Agency Executive continued to avoid a clear public stand on the issue. The World Zionist Organization tried to defend itself by insisting that the Ha'avara agreement did not really break the boycott since Germany did not receive foreign currency for its goods as they were all purchased inside the country for marks. However the basis of that tenuous argument was undermined when Berlin soon demanded part-payment for some commodities in foreign currency.²⁹⁹

One vital factor which the Zionists did not wish to take into account was the impact which the Transfer Agreement had on the Arabs of Palestine. It confirmed to them that even Hitler's Germany was largely disinterested in Arab affairs. It simply wanted to be relieved of its Jews. The German administration was not concerned where the Jews went or what problems their presence caused when they arrived there, as long as they went somewhere. Nazi racist ideology combined with its twin foreign policy strategy of seeking advantage in the Soviet controlled East European Steppes (rather than the Arab East) and reaching an understanding with Britain to add more burdens for the Palestinians.³⁰⁰ This situation left the Palestinians with little option except to appeal to Britain and, when their appeals were ignored, to apply whatever pressure they could to seek relief from the progressively worsening transgression.

In the meantime Hitler continued to tighten the legislative restrictions on Germany's Jews, in the process revealing his extreme sensitivity to adverse reactions both at home and in the foreign press. On September 29, 1933, the law to establish the Reich Chambers of Culture was introduced and this was followed only five days later by the Editors' Law. These effectively excluded Jews from any influence through the media and performing arts and ensured a minimum of public criticism of existing or future laws. It was at this point that Bonhoeffer and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches condemned the Jewish policy of the German government and protested against those church synods which applied the Nazi-inspired 'Aryan paragraph' within the church, and moves to establish a 'Confessing Church' were accelerated. At this point also, October 4, 1933, much to the displeasure of von Papen and Grober, Cardinal Bertram took "a catalogue of protest" to the Vatican listing many of the consequences of “the totalitarian claims of the state” including the sterilization laws and widespread discrimination against Jewish converts to Catholicism. Although the pope was inclined to issue a public protest he was restrained by Pacelli because of the delicate stage of his negotiations to have the definition of Catholic religious and political organizations refined.³⁰¹

However not all of their colleagues agreed with the Pacelli-von Papen-Grober approach, and during November-December Faulhaber preached and published a series of five sermons as a qualified protest on behalf of all German Christians including those who were converts from Judaism.³⁰² These were monitored by Himmler's security officer and among his ‘offences’ were noted the statement that “we extend our hands to our separated brethren, to defend together with them the sacred books of the Old Testament”, implying that National Socialism's denial of those books was a heresy. But Faulhaber's criticism became more direct as the series progressed. Over Christmas-New Year he said the Nazis were threatening to abandon the Old Testament because its books were Jewish; that Christ rejected “ties of blood” and replaced them with “ties of faith”; and that “We may never forget (that) we are not saved by German blood ... (but) by the precious blood of our crucified Lord.”³⁰³ However his protest was tempered by his own admission that his sermons were directed mainly against “theological anti-Semitism”; that he was not defending all Jews but only those who became Christian; and that he did not “take a position in regard to the Jewish question of today” nor comment on “contemporary aspects of the Jewish issue.”³⁰⁴

Himmler's security officer noted that Faulhaber was “generally considered the spiritual leader of the Catholic resistance to the National Socialist state, especially for the foreign press ...”³⁰⁵ and on January 14, 1934, the Reich Minister for the Interior issued a circular to national and regional authorities noting that the limits set by the Reich Government had to be heeded if Germany's ‘Aryan legislation’ was to be correctly judged at home and abroad. He said it was ‘especially improper’ for the application of the Aryan Clause to be extended beyond the fields set by the Reich, particularly in the economic sphere.³⁰⁶ The Nazi propaganda machine was cranked up appropriately.

That circular appears to have prompted – or perhaps it coincided with – the introduction of a resolution in the US House of Representatives for the establishment of a committee to investigate Nazi propaganda and Nazi activities in the United States. The resolution was introduced by Representative Samuel Dickstein of New York, an Eastern European-born Jew, and during the rancorous debate which followed several Congressmen objected that it was essentially a Jewish Bill. One representative declared that most Germans thought Hitler was doing a fine job and that German Americans would resent the investigation. However when the debate ended the Bill was carried overwhelmingly by 168 votes to 31 and the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) was formed.³⁰⁷ It soon became apparent that because of the perception that HUAC was a Jewish-sponsored Committee and because of vigorous opposition from “America Firsters” including industrialists such as Henry Ford, the committee would be able to do very little constructive work. In due course, in 1937, the committee was hijacked, and reconstituted with a new chairman with strong anti-Semitic and racist connections, including leaders of the Ku Klux Klan. The new committee's work was re-directed, with its thrust becoming anti-Communist and anti-Jewish rather than anti-Nazi. The chairman was Texas Democrat Martin Dies who, on his first day in Congress, had moved to suspend immigration for five years. He defended his position on the grounds that he was restoring "Christian influence" in America then proceeded to appoint as the committee's first investigator a prominent speaker for the Nazi Bund.³⁰⁸

In the meantime, in 1932 Jack Warner of Warner Brothers film studios, one of the Hollywood Moguls, had become chairman of the motion picture industry's division of the "Roosevelt for President" Committee and chairman of the Los Angeles division of the "National Recovery Act."³⁰⁹ Then in 1933, just as Hitler was gaining absolute power, and at the height of the Depression, the Moguls were involved in collusion resulting in most industry employees having to take a 50 per cent pay cut. This antagonized the left wing members of the industry and it has been said that "Louis B Mayer created more Communists than Karl Marx" because of that action.³¹⁰

By that stage the plight of Germany's Jews was getting desperate and Hitler was enjoying the respectability which his papal concordat provided. The protests of people like Faulhaber and Bonhoeffer had little influence compared with the positive supportive statements and actions by people like von Papen, Grober, the various bishops' conferences and the suppression of dissent by Pacelli in spite of the fact that he was moved to advise the bishops on September 2, 1934, that the concessions made by the German government were "below the degree of religious freedom guaranteed by the text of the concordat."³¹¹ By August 1935, after Hindenburg's death, Hitler's power was virtually beyond challenge. The repressive measures which had been taken in quite quick succession in Germany during that period should have been taken as a very strong warning that even tougher times lay ahead. In Palestine the situation also continued to worsen. Following the Prague WZO Congress, the Revisionist military wing, Irgun Zvai Leumi, split from the mainstream Socialist-dominated Hagana and stepped up terrorism against the Arabs and, later, the British. However, at the same time that anti-British feeling was increasing among the Zionists, so it was among the Arabs. They had decided that because Britain was responsible for the imposition of Zionism upon them that the British must be the prime target of their attacks if the situation was to be reversed and their interests protected. They stepped up their boycott against Jewish traders, and demonstrations against British policy were organized in Jerusalem, Jaffa and other centres six months after the murder of Arlosoroff. The demonstrations were put down ruthlessly by the British and 25 Arabs were killed.³¹²

In the circumstances it is somewhat surprising that when they met in Rome a few weeks later on February 24, 1934, Dr Weizmann rebuffed an offer of help from Mussolini who was prepared to support and to try to arrange the partition of Palestine. Such was their preoccupation with total control of Palestine that, even in the light of Hitler's domination of Germany and the Passfield White Paper of October 1930 which had set restrictions on Jewish emigration to Palestine, Weizmann suggested to Mussolini that any discussion along the lines of a Jewish State should be deferred until the population of Eretz Israel had reached half a million.³¹³ The Jews' return to Palestine was paramount, according to mainstream Zionist leaders, and they would not support anything which prejudiced their chances of gaining maximum control of its territory. But for the same reason, neither would they support anything which may have jeopardized their favoured position in Germany.

It is not clear to what extent the Zionist leadership realized the threat which their stated position posed to Vatican self-understanding, but it was very substantial indeed. As we have noted, the Vatican had insisted – to the point of generating major political and social discord in Italy which had culminated in the signing of the Lateran Treaty and the Italian Concordat – that temporal rule over a papal state was essential to confirm and to demonstrate the status of the pope as Vicar of Christ on Earth and the sole representative of the Triune God. The challenge to that position which would be generated if a Jewish state, ruled in a theocratic manner by a religious authority subsisting in Judaism, gained recognition by the world-at-large was simply unacceptable. Thus the flamboyance with which the Vatican set out to establish an aura of regal grandeur around the papacy, implying the divine, became increasingly extravagant. Pius XI, already too frail to undertake extensive international travel personally, asked Pacelli “to travel in his name and to present himself as the representative of Christ’s Vicar on Earth abroad.” Pacelli was therefore “dispatched” as the papal legate for an International Eucharistic Congress in Buenos Aires, Argentina, where “traditional Catholicism under a benign military president with a semblance of republican democracy (was) the true voice of Church-State harmony” It was to be the first of a series of overseas appearances in quick succession. When he sailed from Genoa on September 24, 1934, the extravagance and the pomp were extraordinary³¹⁴ and his greeting by the president, General Agustin Pedro Justo, on board the battleship 25 de Mayo bears all the hallmarks of having been scripted in the Vatican Secretariat of State. “Your Eminence”, he said, “I salute in the person of a papal legate the foremost sovereign of the world, before whose spiritual authority all other sovereigns prostrate themselves in veneration.”³¹⁵ The influence of Constantine, Augustine, and Pope Leo III hung heavy as if the Holy Roman Empire had never been dissolved or was about to be reinstated.

The prevailing view in Germany is indicated by an SD (Internal Security Service) Situation Report on the Jewish Question prepared in May/June 1934 and summed up in an article which its chief, Reinhard Heydrich, wrote for the official SS journal, Das Schwarze Korps, of May 15, 1935. The report included a proposal for a solution through mass emigration then concluded that “... in its treatment of the Jews the regime should distinguish between the Zionists, who should be encouraged, and the Assimilationists who should be persecuted.” Then in his article Heydrich noted that the Reich racial laws introduced “after the Nazi seizure of power” did in fact “curtail considerably the immediate influence of the Jews,” but in their tenacity they saw that as a temporary restriction and they were then (mid 1935) seeking ways to win back their old position and “again work to the detriment of Germany.” He said that Jewry had to be separated into two categories based on the way the individuals worked. There were “those who work openly as Jews and those who hide behind international Jewish welfare agencies and the like.” Germany’s Jews, he said, fell into two groups: Zionists and those who preferred assimilation. “The Zionists adhere to a strict racial position and by emigrating to Palestine they are helping to build their own Jewish state. The assimilation-minded Jews deny their race and insist on their loyalty to Germany or claim to be Christians, because they have been baptized, in order to overthrow National Socialist principles.”³¹⁶ What hope did they have? Like the Zionists, the Assimilationists had been forced into their position by the long-running abuse of the church, but now they were condemned for it by the Nazi regime, a product of the same long-running pressures.

It was in that context that the Zionist movement met again for its Nineteenth World Congress in Lucerne, Switzerland, from August 20 to September 4, 1935. Weizmann’s position was again made clear in the weeks preceding the Congress. Writing to a colleague in Palestine he stated, “I know very well that the Congress in Lucerne can bypass and take no notice of the German Jewish question just as did the Prague Congress...I dare to doubt if anyone, especially the German Jews and the German Zionists, will gain advantage from the German Jewish question being treated in all thoroughness...It will not achieve a positive useful effect especially today, in view of the readiness in the world to come to terms with Germany. On the other hand, I believe it is very possible that such a report may become dangerous to the only positive thing we have in Germany, the intensified Zionist movement.”³¹⁷ As Weizmann expected, the Congress proceeded to finally endorse the Ha’avara agreement, though only after strong resistance from a Revisionist splinter group which had remained loyal to the WZO. In contrast, numerous speakers disparaged the boycott as ineffective,³¹⁸ despite the fact that German economists had attributed to it Germany’s decline in exports in 1934.³¹⁹

THE NUREMBERG LAWS

In the meantime the Nazi regime continued to apply the pressure. On the basis of the ‘facts’ in its 1934 report the SS began to encourage organizations which asserted their Jewish identity and which aimed to strengthen Jewish self-awareness. At the same time they set out to establish detailed records of all Jews and their organizations.³²⁰ Then on September 15, within two weeks of the end of the Lucerne Congress, the persecution reached a new level with the passing of the Nuremberg Laws. The Nuremberg Laws were designed to achieve two primary purposes: to separate the Jewish and German races and to define the rights of a citizen of the Reich. The Reich Citizenship Law removed German citizenship from Jews and dramatically curtailed their political rights. Reich citizenship was preserved for those of “German or related blood”, who were to be “sole bearer(s) of full political rights in accordance with the law.” The Law for the Protection of German Blood and German Honour, on the other hand, was intended to preserve German racial purity. It forbade marriages between Jews and people of German or related blood, and prohibited sexual relations between these two categories of people out of wedlock. In addition, Jews were forbidden to employ German female domestic servants under the age of 45 and were forbidden to fly the Reich Flag. They were, however, permitted to display the Zionist flag.³²¹

The Nuremberg laws provided the basis for much subsequent anti-Jewish legislation. But since the laws used the term Jew without defining it, the German experts were left to grapple with an age old problem. Who was a Jew? On November 14, after much internal debate, a definition was finally published as part of the First Implementing Order to the Reich Citizenship Law. Once again it was stated that a Jew could not be a citizen of the Reich, had no right to vote, and could not hold public office. However, despite their insistence that Jewishness was a racial characteristic, the Nazis could not avoid using religious and cultural factors as a means to identify a Jew. Once again, as it had so many times before, the issue of children of mixed marriages (mishlinge) and converted Jews complicated the picture. The law stated in part:

1. A Jew is a person descended from at least three grandparents who were full Jews by race...
2. A Mischling who is a subject of the state and descended from two full Jewish Grandparents is also considered a Jew if:
 - a) he was a member of the Jewish religious community at the time of the promulgation of the law, or was admitted to it subsequently;
 - b) he was married to a Jew at the time of the promulgation of the law, or subsequently married to a Jew;
 - c) he is the offspring from a marriage with a Jew in accordance with Paragraph 1, contracted subsequently to the promulgation of the law for the protection of German Blood and German Honour of September 15, 1935;
 - d) *he is the offspring of extramarital intercourse with a Jew in accordance with paragraph 1, and will be born illegitimately after July 31, 1936...*³²²

The Nuremberg Laws were enforced ruthlessly, with severe penalties including property confiscation enforced on those found to be breaking them. In their wake it is therefore hardly surprising that popular support for the anti-Nazi boycott intensified. In 1936 the American Jewish Congress finally resolved its internal wrangling and joined with the Jewish Labour Committee to form the Joint Boycott Council, which led to greater support from American trade unions. About the same time the Hollywood anti-Nazi League was formed and became a major vehicle for anti-Nazi and left wing publishing and other activities. This was not lost on the Communist Party. Neither was the fact that there was a high proportion of Jewish writers and producers among its members. The Party therefore joined forces with the Hollywood anti-Nazi League and other left-wing groups and began actively recruiting Jews. It has been estimated that for the next few years well over half of the members of both the Hollywood anti-Nazi League and the Communist Party in Los Angeles were Jews. They not only campaigned against Hitler and Nazism but also against Japan after its invasion of China, and in support of Roosevelt's Federal Theatre Project. About September 1936 some of the "more conservative Hollywood Jews began issuing tentative attacks on the Hitler regime", Mayer urged the United States to merge forces with Britain because war in Europe was imminent, and four hundred well known figures from the motion picture industry gathered at the Hotel Roosevelt to openly fight any cause which threatened America. Although both Fascism and Communism were included in the threats, all of this antagonized the political right wing and the anti-Jewish lobby even more and the motion picture industry became the primary target for investigation by the reconstituted HUAC.³²³

On March 15, 1937 another mass rally was held at Madison Square Garden, this time with the belated support of Rabbi Wise and the participation of prominent non-Jewish figures. By then, however, it was too late. The movement had failed to attract the necessary early support to give it momentum, the German economy had stabilized, and Hitler had consolidated himself in power.

In contrast to the ill-fated anti-Nazi boycott, Ha'avara grew rapidly to become a substantial banking and trading house. The original agreement was extended several times, and at the height of its activities it employed 137 specialists in its Jerusalem Office alone. The top limit through the scheme was 50,000 Reichmarks, equivalent to US$20,000 or 4,000 pounds per emigrant. This made it unattractive to the richest Jews and partly as a result, only $40 million dollars went to Palestine compared to $650 million to the US and $60 million to the UK. Nevertheless, Ha'avara's impact in Palestine was considerable. Of the 51,700 German Jews who emigrated to Palestine between 1933 and 1939 (representing a quarter of all Jewish emigration from Germany in that period, and one fifth of all emigration to Palestine), 37.1 percent made use of the Ha'avara, which also helped to finance other emigration to Palestine. In addition, funds channelled through Ha'avara between August 1933 and September 1939 represented approximately 60 percent of all funds invested in Palestine. And, since immigrants bringing in over 1000 pounds were allowed by the British to enter Palestine over and above the annual Jewish immigration quota calculated on the basis on Palestine's 'economic absorptive capacity', the approximately 19,000 'capitalists' who used the scheme were a bonus. The fund was therefore of considerable importance to Zionism. In the midst of the world-wide Depression, Palestine experienced a Ha'avara-induced boom.³²⁴

For Palestine's Arab community, however, those developments were less welcome. Inevitably, as both Jewish migration and economic power increased, so did the pressure to respond. A second Arab rebellion rocked Palestine in April 1936. It began with sporadic attacks on Jews but erupted right across the country into open rebellion aimed mainly at the British and coincided with the start of a planned general strike. The strike was organized by an Arab Higher Committee involving four Muslim and two Christian parties, led by the Mufti of Jerusalem, but was called off by the Higher Command, in response to appeals by the Arab leaders in Iraq, Transjordan, Arabia and Yemen. However hard-line rebels outside the Arab Higher Command gained control of the situation and kept the rebellion-cum-strike going for many months. By the end of the year when it was finally suppressed there were 300 deaths and about a thousand other casualties. In November, by which time the rebellion had spilled beyond Palestine into neighbouring Arab countries, Lord Peel arrived to lead a British commission of enquiry into the causes and prospects for settlement of the conflict and the future of the mandated territory.

For the British, Zionism was increasingly becoming a liability. Its grip on the Middle East – vital to its oil supplies and lines of communication and supply to the Far East – was becoming endangered. The Zionist movement, however, was not about to diminish the pressure generated by its commitment to Palestine, despite the increasingly troubled Palestine situation or the divisions within its own ranks over methods and tactics. And despite the worsening circumstances in Germany, neither were its leaders willing to work against Hitler for the betterment of the situation of German Jews if that aim conflicted with the primary goal of establishing control of Palestine. As a result, the Zionist movement was unknowingly playing its part in the Qur'anic Night Journey just as surely as was Hitler. Indeed, the realization of the Palestinian dream had become so important to Zionism that nothing could be allowed to interfere with it – not even the betterment of the situation of Jews in Russia.

THE SOVIET-ZIONIST RELATIONSHIP: A LOST OPPORTUNITY

During this period, the mid 1930s, there was a distinct contrast between official attitudes towards Zionism in the Soviet Union and in Germany, resulting from the circumstances of the Jewish communities in the two countries. The roots of that contrast reached back to the Revolution and the changes it had wrought.

As British strategists had anticipated, the majority of Jews in Russia welcomed both the Revolution and the Balfour Declaration. Coming together, they seemed to be ending the long era of oppression under Christian Tzarist regimes. The first decree issued by the revolutionary government on March 17, 1917, after the toppling of the monarchy, abolished all discrimination at law based on national, ethnic or religious grounds. Then came the Declaration of Rights in November when the Bolsheviks seized power and that coupled with the Balfour Declaration to produce an upsurge in Zionist influence and to encourage the proliferation of Hebrew newspapers.

In January 1918 the People's Commissariat for Nationality Affairs was established and out of recognition for the special position and problems of the Jewish community a special Commissariat for Jewish Affairs was set up within it. Its head was Joseph Stalin. Four months later a Zionist Conference was held in Moscow to discuss the implications of the Balfour Declaration and shortly afterwards special Jewish Sections (Yevseksii) were set up within the Communist Party. They were to implement party policy among Jewish workers and to arrange propaganda in Yiddish so that the Jewish community would be able to satisfy its intellectual needs in its own language. These moves were quite in accord with the views which Lenin had apparently accepted in 1913 and 1914 that Jews had a common national character and that the equality of all national groups had to be recognized.³²⁵ They were certainly in accord with the realities of the situation into which the Jewish community had been forced by the complex pressures of European Christianity. And they were also in accord with article two of the 1918 constitution which guaranteed the rights of minorities.

Unfortunately the vision soon turned sour. The Jewish community was caught in another pincer movement. The very things which it took to be the dawn of a new era, and the actions which the new government took to support it, each served to highlight the division within the new nation in a time of crisis. In 1918 the poverty-stricken Jews of the border areas suffered another round of pogroms at the hands of the Orthodox elite which tried to bring down the Bolshevik regime while the Western powers and the Vatican stoked the fires of civil war. Then in August 1919, as part of its policy of equality through assimilation which was taking shape, the Bolshevik government dissolved all of the separate Jewish institutions which were a carryover from the days of the Monarchy and which had been intended to keep the Jewish community in abject isolation. But they had become a prop for the community and they appeared to be consistent with the special programs which the Bolsheviks had set up. The act of dissolving them was therefore widely seen as an attack on both the Jewish people and the rights of minorities. It also coincided with anti-Zionist crusades by the Bolsheviks in the Crimea, and later in Leningrad also, in an effort to counter Denikin's British sponsored uprisings. It therefore provided another excellent supply of propaganda material for the Western powers to use against the only real Communist power.

Out of the maelstrom of European religious bigotry, the Great War and the twin Russian Revolutions, two distinct policies or philosophies affecting Jews in Russia had emerged. One proclaimed absolute equality for Jews along with all other groups in the Russian nation and was characterized by measures to compensate for the oppression which they had suffered. The other was also a consequence of belief in the absolute equality of all branches of the family of man. It proclaimed the fallacy of Zionism which sought a preferred position for one segment of that family of man, and it was characterized by anti-Zionist propaganda and increased persecution against Zionists.

That distinction is crucial. The persecution was anti-Zionist and not anti-Jewish. However there were many people who were either blind to that distinction or whose interests were served, in the narrow, short-term sense, by blurring it. They included propagandists for the Capitalist system in Western countries, Zionists and their sympathizers, and apologists for the traditional Christian doctrines both inside and outside of Russia. Those people used the terms "Jew" and "Zionist", (and also "Judaism" and "Zionism") as if they were interchangeable.

At the same time two authority patterns were being slowly reversed. But it was very early days in the manmade process and it seems that even Karl Barth did not grasp the full significance of it. He was actually working on The Epistle to the Romans when the Bolsheviks swept into power and set about a new deal for Russia's Jews while Britain attempted to bribe them with the Balfour Declaration. During the following generation, while the process was evolving, he was rather too preoccupied with Hitler's Germany to pay close enough attention to events in Russia to identify all the trends.

From the moment the young Christian Church had joined hands with Constantine its aberrant doctrines had been used to secure privileges and a position of superiority for those under its umbrella and to isolate its older mother-partner in the community of that era. The Jewish community had, as we have seen, accepted that authority pattern. However after contemporary Zionism had evolved as an aberration of Judaism and after the Jewish community had joined hands with the British government because of essentially the same motives, it began to tread the same path. Looked at in retrospect, the time span required for it to achieve a level of political power, to seek a position of privilege and to develop its own version of the isolation game, relates very well to that taken by its daughter-partner.

In spite of the anti-Zionist crusades of the western intervention years in Russia, (or perhaps stimulated by them), Zionist organizations continued to multiply. In fact in 1921 things looked distinctly brighter because of the New Economic Order. Jewish small businessmen, showing that industriousness and capacity for self-preservation which had been fostered by generations of persecution, were among the groups who benefited most. But, alas, that inevitably emphasized their distinctiveness and drew attention to the group self-interest implicit in Zionism even more. In those areas where private business ownership came under increasing attack between 1921 and 1928 it was often Jewish businessmen who took the brunt of the attack. Internal migration increased and it was easy, for those who wished, to portray the attacks as anti-Jewish rather than as directed against exploitation through private business. Coincidental with that situation a campaign was mounted by the Commissariat for Nationality Affairs from 1922 to 1925 to exterminate Zionism from the Soviet Union for ever. Again deliberate misrepresentation and confusion were simple matters.

THE GESERD PROGRAM

While that anti-Zionist campaign was still rolling in the Commissariat for Nationality Affairs an important organizational change was made. The subordinate Commissariat for Jewish Affairs was abolished and the Society to Settle Working Jews on the Land in the USSR, known as 'Geserd', was established in its place.

The settlement policy which Geserd adopted involved assimilation and did not provide for the exclusive Jewish settlement of large regions. This was fully consistent with the basic Soviet anti-Zionist view that Jews did not constitute a nation but it was therefore in conflict with the policy which Britain was under pressure from the World Zionist Organization to adopt for Palestine. With a touch of verbal gymnastics it could also be shown to conflict with Lenin's pre-revolution statements of 1913 and 1914. When 40,000 families, involving a total population probably in excess of a quarter of a million immediately applied to settle in the Ukraine and the Crimea under the Geserd program its success seemed guaranteed. This meant that the claims of the World Zionist Organization were in danger of being exposed as ill-founded and that its plans for Palestine could fall apart. It also required an enormous budget which, if it were to have been met entirely from Soviet Government revenue, would have been politically unacceptable. The government therefore resorted to the long accepted Jewish practice of an appeal to world Jewry to help raise the necessary funds and an agreement was signed with the American Joint Distribution Committee³²⁶

The strains which this generated between Zionist Jews and non-Zionist Jews both inside and outside Russia were such that the Geserd scheme, introduced and greeted with such high hopes, was doomed to a miserable end. Pressure from Zionist quarters for Russian Jews to migrate to Palestine instead of settling under Geserd increased. So did demands for the establishment of an autonomous Jewish region in Russia along similar lines to that which Britain was under pressure to agree to in Palestine. The conflicts of interests and the contradictory arguments became so enmeshed with fears and aspirations, and also with politics and economic planning, that a Zionist propagandist could turn the situation to advantage in various directions. It could be used either to attack or to support Marxism, Leninism, Communism, Capitalism, Colonialism, Imperialism, Nationalism or virtually any other ism including Orthodox Judaism.

By 1927 Jews had become the third largest community group in the Communist Party and the search for alternative areas for Jewish settlement began in earnest. But as the heavy emphasis in the search was for an area in which autonomy might be achievable it is difficult to discount the notion of concerted Zionist infiltration. Zionist activity had increased strongly, mainly in Western Russia, and it had continued to trigger anti-Zionist reaction. In fact conflict had reached such a level that the special Jewish section of the Communist Party was seen by both Zionists and anti-Zionists as a tool of the other, to have outlived its usefulness, and to be strongly counter-productive. It did not meet in conference after 1926 and it was officially disbanded in 1930. By that year all overtly Zionist organizations had either been driven underground, crushed or persuaded to disband in the interests of national unity by the Communist Party.

BIRABIDZHAN

In the meantime the region at the confluence of the Bira and Bidzhan Rivers had been selected as suitable for assisted Jewish settlement. It had a severe climate but potential for development so it was favoured by government agricultural authorities. It also had immense strategic importance because it straddled the vital Trans-Siberian Railway which linked Europe to the Sea of Japan and it was adjacent to Manchuria. Its accelerated settlement was therefore also promoted by defence authorities.

BiraBidzhan was formally declared an area for Jewish settlement by the Supreme Soviet, at the request of Komzit, (the Committee to Settle Jews on the Land), in March 1928. That was at the very time that the International Missionary Council was struggling with the impact of Karl Barth's theology in Jerusalem. It was also at the same time that Britain was trying to weave its way through the unholy maze it had thrown up in the Middle East; the oil companies were within four months of their notorious Red Line Agreement; and Ataturk was throwing the Muslim community into further confusion with his decision to sever the connection between Islam and the Turkish constitution. (see chapter 19 below)

BiraBidzhan was to be administratively and territorially a Jewish national unit but it was not to be a Zionist state. That distinction was quite clear in the minds of the members of the Supreme Soviet but although overt Zionist organizations were being eliminated rapidly the authorities did not bargain for deeply-entrenched Zionist influence and widespread sympathy for it. Neither did they bargain for a resurgence of anti-Semitism among the Christian populations of the Ukraine and Crimea. Those Christians were being spurred on to bitter and intense jealousy of their Jewish neighbours who again appeared to be getting favoured treatment. They were being flooded with anti-Semitic propaganda by both Hitler and the church, and the effects of Western intervention in an effort to bring down the Communist government were still quite serious in those regions.

The Supreme Soviet therefore faced several conflicting but equally urgent tasks which complicated its programs of social and economic development. It had to offset the anti-Semitic propaganda in the Ukraine and the Crimea, and it had to disentangle the twin Zionist webs around BiraBidzhan which were like a replay of the intrigue over Jewish settlement in the Ukraine and the Crimea. There were those people who promoted BiraBidzhan as an alternative to Palestine and as a Russian Zion. But there were also those who sought to undermine it because they saw it as undermining their chances of securing Israel. The Supreme Soviet set about all of its tasks with equal vigour and ruthlessness. It got them all mixed up with Stalin's purges against political and economic deviants and it handed both the West and the church another ready-made propaganda program. Its 1927 law against religious involvement in politics was obviously unenforceable and unworkable, and it was made to look ludicrous alongside the Vatican with its growing string of papal concordats in Western Europe. It took the easy way out and gave anti-religious propaganda equal status with religious propaganda. It had played into the hands of Western Capitalist propagandists and the church yet again. Communism and Russia were both branded as atheistic rather than as antireligious and both the party and the people naturally drifted in that direction.

The situation became more complex with the Soviet passport reforms of December 1932. The long-established practice of each republic in the Soviet Union issuing its own passports was scrapped. A common passport was introduced for the whole union. It was to serve a number of purposes. Firstly, it provided ease of identification and every person aged 16 and over was required to carry one. Secondly it helped to simplify the provision of many services which had become a public responsibility. In particular it streamlined the allocation of apartments under the public housing program. But there were some services which were only available to designated groups in the community and a note in their passports provided a simple confirmation of their entitlement to those services. The assisted settlement scheme for Jews was such a service. At the same time, in order to recognize the level of autonomy enjoyed by each republic within the Soviet Union, it was decided that the nationality of the holder would be shown in each passport.

Confusion reigned. The church had tried for centuries to identify Jewishness as a national or racial characteristic. Hitler had eagerly taken up the cause and now a Communist power, the arch enemy of both, seemed happy to confirm it. The passport identification system let everyone, whether Zionists, anti-Zionist Jews, Christians or atheists, take up their chosen cry. It could be “persecution”, “favouritism” or a call for autonomy based on national identity because no other religious group was required to be so identified. The question “who and what is a Jew” had echoed down the ages and had been brought into prominence by courtesy of both Communism in Russia and Hitler in Germany. In Russia the debate was basically directed towards support but in Germany it was towards oppression.³²⁷ For the next fifteen years the passport identification system became an all-consuming obsession in some quarters while in others it was blurred beyond recognition by the cacophony of conflict. Then it took world centre stage while the privileged members of the United Nations tried to resolve it once and for all by establishing the Zionist State of Israel.

But during the 1930s the Capitalist community was more interested in deriding Russia's experiments in forced collectivization of agriculture, and of the control and utilization of resources, than in the settlement of Jews. Collectivization of grain regions began in earnest in 1930; basic laws for collectives were issued in 1932; and by the end of 1933, when Stalin ordered the party to take control of the program, 85 percent of productive land and about two thirds of all peasant farmers had been organized into collectives.³²⁸

Planned and carried out against such a backdrop of social and economic upheaval the BiraBidzhan scheme was doomed just as surely as the Geserd scheme in the Ukraine and the Crimea. Jewish settlers arrived and left in almost equal numbers during its first six years. Migration targets became little more than a sham and most of the settlers were simply escaping from anti-Semitism in the Geserd areas. But neither the government nor the Jewish community were prepared to admit the scheme was another failure and in a very bold last ditch attempt to get it moving the Soviet Government declared BiraBidzhan to be an autonomous Jewish region in May 1934.

An unfortunate but natural consequence of the Zionist preoccupation with raising the Jewish population in Palestine was that Jewish migration to BiraBidzhan was given only a minor fillip by the decision to grant Jewish autonomy within the region. The major effect was to make relations between Jews and Non-Jews in the region very precarious. At the end of 1935, seven years after the scheme had been launched, the net increase in the Jewish population was still only 14,000 and Jews made up a mere twenty three percent of the population. That level was not passed until after the war.^{329 330} The position was distressing for both the Jews who tried to make a go of it and for the non-Jewish majority.

Then came a new constitution for the Soviet Union. The decision to prepare it was taken in February 1935 but it was not ready until November 1936, when Stalin delivered a major policy speech to introduce it, and it was adopted on December 5 that year. It is best remembered in the West for the dominant role of the Communist Party and the “Dictatorship of the Proletariat” which it confirmed. Little is ever said about the equity provisions which led the world in their intention and in their scope. The fact that the Soviet authorities fell short of Article 123 of their constitution is a reflection of complex world circumstances, the trouble in the triangle and Joseph Stalin's progressive dictatorial paranoia. It is not a reflection of lack of sincerity or will on the part of those who framed it. It read, in part, that:

*equality of rights of citizens of the USSR, irrespective of their nationality or race, in all spheres of economic, government, cultural, political and other public activity is an indefeasible law. Any direct or indirect restriction of the rights of, or conversely, the establishment of any direct or indirect privileges for citizens on account of their race or nationality ... is punishable by law.*³³¹

Seen against that background the gradual change in the attitude of Soviet authorities towards BiraBidzhan and preferential Jewish settlement is readily understandable. The failure of the scheme was grudgingly recognized and talk of autonomy gave way to talk of freedom of organization. Stalin gave notice of the harder line to come in his policy speech. He mentioned neither BiraBidzhan nor the Jewish community by name but he stated three conditions necessary before an autonomous region could become a constituent Soviet republic. It had to be a border region which was not surrounded on all sides by Soviet territory; the nationality which gave it its name had to constitute a more or less compact majority in the planned republic; and it had to have a population of at least one million.

Taking their cue from Stalin the Soviet authorities continued to denounce Zionism while they continued their unsuccessful efforts to encourage Jewish settlement. In the meantime, prompted by world economic conditions and the need for trade, the United States had finally recognized the Soviet Union in 1933.³³² Stalin's government had then ceased its trenchant criticism of the League of Nations as a "mere mask to conceal from the broad masses the aggressive aims of the imperialist policy of certain great powers or their vassals"³³³ and accepted an invitation to join the League in 1934. This gave it an excellent platform from which to try to expose the links between some of its problems and western interference. It was, of course, keenly aware of the links between the failure of its BiraBidzhan scheme and collaboration between Britain and the World Zionist Organization in Palestine and the surrounding region. It is therefore no surprise that from 1936 the Soviet Government mounted a consistent campaign (in both the international and domestic arenas) against "Zionist imperialist oppression of the Palestinian Arabs."³³⁴ It cannot be denied that there was a valid basis for that campaign, but Western powers and the church have consistently tried to turn it back towards a supposedly anti-Semitic Soviet Union. They conveniently forget that the Vatican had launched attacks in the League of Nations against the Jewish community in Palestine for oppression of Palestinian Christians about fifteen years earlier and that the Jesuit press in Europe was continuing its steady stream of anti-Semitic propaganda.

THE SD JEWISH AFFAIRS SECTION: A NEW PHASE OF CRISIS

So while the Soviet Union struggled to untangle the web of competing interests surrounding its Jewish community, Germany continued to deal with the Jewish question in its own fashion. In autumn 1936, while Russia was busy finalizing its new constitution with its guarantee of the rights of ethnic minorities, the SD established a separate section for Jewish affairs with Adolph Eichmann as deputy head. Another year on, in December 1937, that section announced the provisional objective of National Socialist Jewish policy as the pushing back of Jewish influence in all aspects of public life and the encouragement of Jewish emigration. It also proposed to centralize all Jewish affairs in the hands of the SD and the Gestapo.³³⁵

Those developments marked a crucial new phase in Germany's treatment of its Jewish population. With the benefit of hindsight, it is evident that from that point onwards Hitler had decided that the time had come for a comprehensive solution to the Jewish question in Germany. Seventeen years had passed since Hitler had conceived of a 'final solution' to the Jewish Question when a new member a German army political education unit, but now that idea was to be realized. There was no longer to be any place left for Jews in the new German Reich. Jews were to be squeezed and persecuted until the trauma and upheaval of leaving their homes and livelihoods was simply outweighed by the cost of staying put. However, for contemporary observers of the international scene Germany's new policy towards Jews was far from the most pressing issue on the agenda. The lack of international reaction was telling. Well before 1937 the world's attention had been increasingly rivetted by other developments emanating from Berlin.

In January 1935, only six months after the signing of the German Concordat, the Catholic-dominated coal-rich industrial region of the Saar had, with Vatican support, voted overwhelmingly in favour of annexation by the Reich. As a consequence Germany's industrial capacity had expanded enormously, and military strategists across the continent were quick to calculate the likely effects on Germany's war making potential. Soon afterwards Hitler's protestations of peaceful intent were seemingly confounded when Germany enacted a law of compulsory military service in clear contravention of the Treaty of Versailles imposed after World War I. That news was quickly followed by the revelation that Germany had an air force, also forbidden under the terms of Versailles. However, in June of that year, in an evident display of unconcern, Britain effectively abrogated its commitment to the Treaty when it signed a maritime agreement with Germany securing conditions for the rebuilding of the German navy at a strength of roughly one third the size of Britain's. In March 1936, gambling on the acquiescence of Britain and France, Hitler took the last step himself. In a definitive repudiation of the detested Treaty he denounced the League of Nations and reoccupied the Rhineland region. Demilitarized and excised from Germany under the terms of Versailles, the return of the Rhineland boosted Hitler's domestic popularity to dizzying heights.

However, there was far more at stake than just the repudiation of a peace treaty widely seen as excessive and unjust. Hitler had taken the first steps in his much vaunted plan to integrate all German speaking peoples into a greater German Reich. It was no secret that Austria was to be the next target, with parts of Czechoslovakia and Poland also on the agenda. It was all in line with the program he had outlined in Mein Kampf more than a decade earlier. It should therefore have been taken as a warning of things to come. But much of the rest of Europe simply looked on. Many could sympathize with Germany's sense of injustice and its desire to have Germans united in a single nation-state, and they willingly believed Hitler's proclamations of peaceful intent. And with the horror of the First World War still a vivid memory, more bloodshed was the last thing anyone wanted. The popular mood was for disarmament. After all, hadn't World War I been the war to end all war? Hopes still rested on the humanitarian ideals of the League of Nations which had been set up to ensure that it would never happen again. Confrontation with Hitler might wreck the new system before it had even had a chance to prove itself.

Others, of course, had slightly less idealistic motivations. Seemingly powerless to affect low levels of consumer demand in their own economies, many international capitalists and financiers were more concerned with protecting the profits to be had from a miraculously resurgent German economy. That interest was also combined with the conviction that a strong and re-armed Germany was Europe's dike against the Bolshevik tide. Sir Henry Detering, who had outmanoeuvred Sir Marcus Samuel, (the Jewish Lord Mayor of London and Britain's first oil knight), to become chairman of Shell, was a prime example. Even before the 1933 elections Detering had begun to openly proclaim Hitler and the Nazis as the only solution to the Communist menace. Then, being an embarrassment to his fellow directors, he was eased out of the chair, took up permanent residence on an estate in Germany, became intimate with the Nazi leaders and worked to develop closer ties between the Nazis and Britain.³³⁶ Others were more straightforward in their admiration for Hitler's brand of fascist dictatorship. In Rumania Octavian Goga formed a short lived but avowedly anti-Semitic government which set about emulating Hitler.³³⁷ Throughout Europe, the hothouse environment of economic unrest, church-sponsored anti-communism, pseudo-scientific racism and anti-Semitism spawned a plethora of local Nazi parties.

In the midst of all the confusion and conflicting motivations, however, there were a few who recognized the seriousness of the Nazi threat. For Britain in particular, as the chief guarantor of European peace and stability, Germany's intentions were of considerable interest. For hundreds of years Britain's foreign policy had aimed at preventing a single power dominating Europe. From the point of view of Britain's security, despite its utility in preventing the spread of Russia's influence westward, the consequences of Germany's rise could not be predicted. But in contemplating a response even the hardest-headed and most clear sighted of British strategists had serious reasons for pause. On the one hand, post-war disarmament had seriously diminished the war making potential of all European powers, Britain included. On the other hand, the Depression – for which only Germany seemed to have a solution – meant that comprehensive rearmament programs were an economic burden that could not be afforded. And there were other storm clouds massing.

In 1933, largely in response to Christian Europe's meddling in Asia's affairs, a newly militarized Japan had occupied Manchuria. Its subsequent struggle with China for primacy in the Far East was looming as a threat to all European colonial powers with interests in the Far East. That had been an important factor in Britain's decision to sign a naval agreement with Germany, since by limiting Germany's navy to a strength only 35 percent of Britain's, the bulk of the British fleet would be free to defend its naval base at Singapore, vital to the protection of its Far Eastern interests. But in October 1935 the increasingly fragile strategic situation had been dealt a further sharp blow. In a bid by Mussolini to restore the former glory of the old Roman Empire, Italy invaded Abyssinia. Italy's actions not only threatened Britain's lines of supply and communication through the Mediterranean and Suez to the Far East, they upset the delicate balance of alliances on the continent which had been set up after World War I to contain the German threat. Then in June 1936 the increasingly unstable European situation was complicated even further when civil war erupted in Spain following a coup against the elected leftist government by right-wing forces led by General Franco. With Europe polarized along ideological lines, and Germany and Italy lining up with the new pro-fascist regime in Spain, Britain was forced into a delicate balancing act in a tangle of criss-crossing interests and alliances. Britain's interests were now threatened by three powers, and it was feared that a war with any one could conceivably draw attacks from the other two. Even with the support of its colonies and dominions, it was clear that Britain had barely enough military resources to go around. Europe was fast approaching crisis and the strategic situation of Britain's Empire was approaching breaking point.

Then the Arab revolt had erupted in Palestine to shake Britain's complacent hold on the Middle East. What at first appeared to be a purely local issue had soon spread to engulf the entire region, as support for the uprising spread in response to the perceived Zionist threat to Arab and Islamic interests in Palestine. Anti-British sentiment was further fueled by the Arab world's increasing resentment of its derisory treatment at the hands of its European imperial overlords. In Egypt, British manipulation entered a new phase with the elevation of sixteen-year-old Farouk to the throne on the death of his father Fuad I, and the introduction of a new constitution. In Britain that was quite easily portrayed as a constructive move because Italy, taking full advantage of papal concurrence, was in the process of absorbing Abyssinia into its possessions after its advance from neighbouring Eritrea. In the Middle East, however, the perception was different. Already Hitler's influence had showed up directly in the region when Mein Kampf was translated into Arabic in 1936 for distribution throughout the Middle East and North Africa³³⁸, and it was therefore hardly surprising that many now began to look to Britain's chief rival as a means to deliver the Arab world from its overbearing and self-interested imperial masters and their Zionist allies.

Faced with the threat of German expansion in Europe, Britain was paralyzed. It had no more room to manoeuvre. Its own security was at stake, its economy was depressed, its interests in the Far East were under challenge and its Empire was under threat at its vital Middle Eastern nexus from both within and without. Despite the fact that the Palestine situation was draining a large proportion of its available troops, neither the security of its shipping through Suez or its land routes through the Middle East could be guaranteed. In addition, even India, the jewel in the imperial crown, was increasingly wracked with turmoil and division as agitation for independence became entangled with growing hostility between India's Hindu and Moslem populations in reaction to British divide-and-rule policies. That in turn was feeding Britain's crisis, since neither Hindus nor Moslems could now be counted on to bolster the British army's strategic reserves. So with its out-dated system of imperial defence simply stretched beyond its limits, Britain could not commit itself to opposing Hitler in Europe without placing its entire Empire at risk. Unfortunately, as we shall see in later chapters, due to deliberate policies of misinformation and deception being pursued by those in power, the British public did not and could not fully understand the gravity of the situation into which Britain had stumbled. But those in power did know, and they were soon to give a name to the policy they adopted in response. Appeasement.

The dilemma was in large part of Britain's own making. In its greed and arrogance it had spread its empire to cover all corners of the globe, supremely confident that its power and reputation were sufficient to thwart the misplaced ambitions of any nation or people who deigned to challenge it. Its ability to hold the 'inferior' races it had subjugated and exploited firmly in their place, along with its moral right to do so, had never been questioned. To do so would be to question the very 'superiority' of the Christian civilization which it represented, and the 'superior' Christian ethic that went with it. But there was never any need for that. If its combination of military, economic and technological superiority weren't enough to keep the local heathens in line, there was always recourse to a bit of religious manipulation. After all, they were only savages and idol worshippers, or the barbarous followers of fakirs and false prophets. And as for the threat of foreign competitors, hadn't generations of British children had been taught that the British Empire was the greatest the world had ever known? Anyone who dared to challenge it could soon be put in their place. Just call in the colonials to do the dirty work, or the Scots guard or the Gurkhas.

But the very greed and arrogance that had inspired the fantastic growth of Britain's empire had inevitably brought forth the reactions which now threatened to tear it down. The anger and resentment of the subjugated and exploited, the litany of shattered hopes left in the wake of a long list of double-dealings and betrayals, and the envy of younger and less prosperous nations who looked to emulate her example, had finally combined to destroy Britain's overweening confidence. A hydra-headed monster had been created, with little prospect that it could be controlled or faced down. And unrecognized at the heart of the monster lay Hitler's parody of the attitudes and actions which had led to the growth of empire in the first place. It had only ever been a matter of time, but the actions of the former corporal and one time rabble-rouser had now brought that reaction to a head.

But Hitler's parody represented more than just a threat to the British Empire. It was a key factor in a deepening crisis between the long-standing triangle of Semitic faiths – Judaism, Christianity and Islam. An aberration of one of those faiths – Zionism – was the focal point of the crisis. The continuing Zionist transgression against the Arab population of Palestine was fueling Islamic Arab hostility to Christian Britain, and thereby undermining Britain's ability to resist Hitler's anti-Semitic and expansionist policies in Europe. However, it was long the established tradition of Christian anti-Semitism which had led to the development of Zionism, and it was also the latest and most intense manifestation of that anti-Semitism, personified in Adolf Hitler, which was fueling Zionist actions in Palestine. Moreover, it was the doctrinaire anti-communism of the Christian capitalist West which had allowed Hitler to flourish. It was also the racist colonial mentality of Western Christian civilization which had created the environment in which the crisis had developed. Thus, despite the role of Zionism as the focal point of the crisis, responsibility for the deepening trouble in the triangle rested squarely with the attitudes and actions of traditional Christianity. If disaster was to be averted, what was required was inspired leadership from the Church.

THE CHURCHES FAIL TO RESPOND

In the early 1930s, writing in the shadow of Hitler's ascension to power, Karl Barth had wrestled mightily with the issues at the heart of the crisis. His Doctrine of the Word of God, the first volume of which was published in German late in 1932 and in English early in 1935, had given the theologians much to think about. Following the same line of reasoning which had led him to reassess Paul's Letter to the Church at Rome, Barth had decided it was time to reassess the whole field of Christian dogma. He believed that all human knowledge of God, including that contained or proposed in the creed or confession of the church depends on the revelation of God for its validation. In other words he wanted to scrub the lot and start all over again. But he could not quite bring himself to do it. His years caught up in the church's self-perpetuating teaching system and the world situation during those years had perhaps blunted the cutting edge of the brilliant mind which had produced the vital and refreshing commentary on Romans.

True to his intention, Barth had gone back to the issue at the centre of the crisis. He pointed out that the doctrine of the Trinity "is not to be found in the texts of the Old and the New Testament witness to God's revelation" and suggested that the Biblical root of the doctrine could be that God revealed himself as the Lord three times in a different sense. He then asked what need and what right the church had to formulate the doctrine and discussed the circumstances at the time of the Council of Nicaea and the Council's motives. He suggested that if we saw the Council's decision as being determined by the politics of the time then "we credit her with having ... lost her theme, so that in what she really aimed to be, namely, the Church of Jesus Christ, she need no longer be taken seriously, that her work is therefore no concern of ours, save as an object of such observation from without." He then suggested that by seeing her "as at worst" we would be dealing with a heresy or an alien religion and we could not enquire seriously, "in sympathy with her, into the meaning of her intention." We would have reached "an exceedingly risky and dangerous verdict (which) is indeed not impossible, but at least involves a great responsibility, especially when, as here, there is in question the line of history of dogma, along which, ever since the great and decisive struggles of the 4th century, all Church theologians of any importance, including the Reformers and their successors in the 17th century, have unswervingly advanced." He was not prepared to reach such a verdict. He recognized that "if in the Church a man is determined to look upon and regard others in this purely external fashion, he must submit to the interrogatory as to whether on the contrary he himself is not perhaps the outsider, as being the adherent of a heresy or of an alien religion.”³³⁹

His lengthy discussion of the matter in both his Doctrine of the Word of God (Vol. I) and his earlier commentary on The Epistle to the Romans give strong grounds to believe that Barth agonized over the problem of whether “to let drop ... the Church of (the) early period during which the doctrine of the Trinity took its rise.” Perhaps, as he implies, he could not convince himself that there were sufficient grounds. In Doctrine he posed the question: “Are the reasons in favour of such a course so cogent in the case of the church’s early period during which the doctrine of the Trinity took its rise?” Then, after further discussion, he wrote: “The possible grounds for an attitude towards the Church of the 4th century particularly, and so also towards her dogma, so mistrustful as to lead to dropping the question of its meaning, seem to us to be unconvincing. But it is clear that if anyone wishes to assert them we cannot meet them with counter-arguments. The formal possibility, that that Church might be an apostate Church which does not concern us and has nothing to say to us, cannot be contested.” This was quite consistent with two of many statements in Romans. First (as already noted, chapter 17), “...the Church seeks to live: it struggles to preserve its life by turning its back on its veritable tribulation, by engaging in a tenacious defence of its traditions and customs, by attempting to galvanize itself into life or by setting out to erect new religious societies. This unwillingness to die is the real tragedy of the church.”³⁴⁰ Second: “Only when the end of the blind alley of ecclesiastical humanity has been reached is it possible to raise radically and seriously the problem of God.”³⁴¹

As he became more engrossed in both teaching and writing on one hand and the Ecumenical Movement on the other, Barth felt constrained to soften his denial and “out-and-out attack on the existing historical church.”³⁴² In Doctrine he discussed some possible negative attitudes and noted – without reference to the existence of Unitarian churches and others which do not adhere to the doctrine of the Trinity – “We ought to take account of the fact that to this day this decision is not just that of the Roman and the Orthodox Churches, but is fundamentally also that of all the great Evangelical Churches. Not one of them has actually revoked what is implied in the fact that an express confirmation of the ancient Church symbols which give expression to the dogma of the Trinity was in the sixteenth century made an integral part of the Reformed Confessions.”³⁴³

At the same time, Barth was painfully aware of the consequences of rocking the church boat even more when it was already in disarray, when both the Nazis and the Communists were on the rampage, and when Hitler, pressing for the Chancellorship at the time that Barth was completing volume one, was barely camouflaging his well known intention to ‘harness’ the churches which he feared could keep him out of office. Barth’s foreword to volume I is actually dated August, 1932. That places it shortly after the July elections in which the National Socialists rocketed to 38 per cent of the Reichstag, bigger than the next two parties combined. The Fulda Catholic bishops had placed a ban on Nazi Party membership, but Cardinal Pacelli was lobbying hard for a Nazi-Catholic Centre Party coalition government, and Kaas had published his paper showing the close relationship between papal primacy and the Fascist fuhrer-prinzip. It was already clear that von Papen's government could not survive, that a new election was in the offing, and that in all probability Hitler would soon become chancellor. Barth also knew that although he was a Swiss citizen he would not be immune from persecution and in due course, in 1935, two years after Hitler achieved dictatorial power, his refusal to take the oath of unconditional allegiance to the Führer cost him his chair in Bonn. By then it was nearly three years since he had completed the first volume of his Church Dogmatics, Doctrine of the Word of God, in which his doubts about the Doctrine of the Trinity appeared, but he was still working on the later volumes.

With his towering intellect he could not have been blind to the probability that theologians in a more settled period would pick up the threads at the point where he left a half hitch, and it is surprising that in the circumstances he did not return personally to that theme during the post war years. He seems to have skirted round the proposition that the basic aim of the early church was consistent with its role but that its Christology, formed on the basis of spurious reasoning, and its actions, taken on the basis of that spurious reasoning, were quite inconsistent with that role. But also, after the war it could have been devastating to the struggling ecumenical movement if he had taken up that theme immediately.

In his lengthy, complex and convoluted justification for the doctrine of the Trinity which was written during that period of crisis, Barth drew heavily on the reasoning of the early church 'doctors' and his argument has the tone of classic apologetics rather than an explanation of dogma. However if Barth compromised himself in the face of the political realities of Europe in the 1930s one thing is certain. His motives were above reproach even if the same could not be said for all of his contemporaries. He took the doctrine of the Trinity as his starting point but he set about a comprehensive re-evaluation of it. Although he could not bring himself to fulfill the promise which shone through Romans that he would grasp the Scriptures, ignore all else and start all over again, he did provide new perspectives and new emphases which inspired many people and disturbed a lot of others. He was accused of trying to push the church into another Reformation and his ideas were denigrated as "crisis theology" prompted by Hitler and Jewish persecution. In fact, as already noted, the trauma of the Great War was the catalyst which motivated both Barth and Hitler, and Barth could better be described as inhibited by the crisis of Hitler rather than prompted by it.

Commentators debate the reasons for the change in emphasis as Barth 'progressed' and made "some quite obvious corrections"³⁴⁴ from his earlier to his later writings and his increasing concentration on Christology. However the nature or direction of his Christology cannot be divorced from two considerations. The first was his overriding belief in, and emphasis on, the absolute sovereignty of God and that Christian theology, and the life of the church, must begin and end with its sights firmly fixed upon the Word of God – on what God has done in the past, is doing at present and will yet do in the future.³⁴⁵ The second was his decision not to reject the Doctrine of the Trinity. His decision to wear blinkers. Having made that decision, he was bound to develop a Christological view that, the sole basis for past, present, and future knowledge of God was God's gracious act in condescending to mankind in His Son and through His Spirit.³⁴⁶ That blinkered view made it impossible for Barth to recognize that revelation through Christ was possible without incarnation. This led to the contradictions between his Christology and "his refusal to allow for the possibility of saving knowledge of God in non-Christian religions;"³⁴⁷ his early assessment, in Romans, of the continuing role of the Jews in God's unfolding revelation; and the remarkable similarity, already noted, between his early Christology and Muhammad's view of Christ (chapter 17).

It is unfortunate that Barth was sidetracked in his Christology by the circumstances in which he was embroiled – the very circumstances which he was attempting to set right and which were a product of the church's history and conduct which he had perceived with such inspired clarity. However his work became the benchmark from which his contemporaries and many of the theologians of the following generation had to begin. It stimulated a period of very constructive debate among theologians about the meaning of Christ's life and his role in God's revelation. Although concrete results are hard to see at this stage Barth, and those who have reacted to him, have helped to set the scene for a solution to the trouble in the triangle. They have become a part of the process of revelation. Barth pointed out that the question of the subject of revelation (for which the doctrine of the Trinity has been the church's answer) should be seen as only the first part of the whole question of God and revelation. Scripture, in which the problem of the doctrine of the Trinity is set, stands above the dogma of the church. It is and it remains, in Barth's view, the measure and the judge of the solution of the question.³⁴⁸ If he, personally, had failed to find that solution he had, at least, pointed clearly to the nature of the problem. The reformation had stalled and Karl Barth had tried to kick start it again. If the church had been willing to at least openly confront that problem, perhaps it may have been enough to set the world upon a different course. But by 1937, there was no indication that the church would take up the challenge. Not even the force of Hitler's parody which he was pursuing with vigour was sufficient challenge to prompt that task.

With most of his radical Protestant opponents either dead, in concentration camps or in exile, Hitler had Germany's two officially established churches exactly where he wanted them.³⁴⁹ They were eating out of his hand, supporting him with their competitive blessings, and they were not in a position to oppose his major policies. Mein Kampf, with its remarkable parody of the Christian amorphous gel generally accepted throughout Germany as the proper philosophy of the nation, and with its criticism of both wings of the church, was proving to be Hitler's most effective secret weapon. The Protestant churches had been criticized for being soft on Jews, but they had been praised for being strong on nationalism. Being German-based the Reich Church was therefore in a reasonably secure position but its clergy did not want to lose their recognition as a reliable instrument of the state. It was the Roman Catholic Church which was in the weaker position and stood to lose far more if it fell out with Hitler. It had eagerly confirmed that it was foreign controlled through the Vatican's negotiations for the concordat and it had good reason to fear another round of Kulturkampf if its adherents showed signs of divided loyalties. Its most favourable attribute, in the Fuhrer's eyes, was its vice-like grip on the minds of its people, coupled with its supposed ability to produce good automatons for his military machine.

By 1937 several million copies of Mein Kampf had been sold. It was a must for anyone who wanted promotion; it was a school primer on racial science; it was a gift to newlyweds from the registrar and it was an award for meritorious service in the German railways. It had not only been printed in German and Braille for the domestic market but, either complete or abridged, it had also been translated and printed in English, Danish, Swedish, Portuguese, Bulgarian, Spanish, Hungarian, Arabic, Chinese, Czech, Japanese and French. Translations were later produced in Norwegian, Finnish and Tamil as well.³⁵⁰

Mein Kampf was therefore dynamite for the Vatican. This was not because so many of its policies were espoused by Hitler, (at that stage they were still respectable), but because if the Roman Catholic Church were to be rejected by Hitler the whole world would know his reasons and the consequences could be disastrous. Even in the face of broken promises, the virtual disregard of the concordat and direct persecution it was vital that good relations be maintained. Hitler no longer needed the Vatican. It had served its purpose and it was dispensable. Any religious function or authority which he needed was readily available without it. But the Vatican had worked itself into a corner in which it needed Hitler even more than when he came to power because it had forfeited much of its capacity to undermine him or to even act as a brake on him. A handbook, edited by Archbishop Grober and published with the recommendations of the entire German episcopate, described the concordat as proof that two powers, both totalitarian in character, can find an agreement if their domains are separate and if overlaps in jurisdiction become parallel or, in a friendly manner, lead them to make common cause.³⁵¹ The Vatican was still trying to sell concordats to other countries and, with totalitarian regimes being the only ones very keen to buy them, it was happy to substitute Hitler for Mussolini by way of illustration.

STORMY PASSAGE: MIT BRENNENDER SORGE

But eventually the strain became too great. While Grober's handbook was still actually in circulation, Pius XI shattered the illusion by authorizing his remarkable encyclical Mit Brennender Sorge which was smuggled into Germany in March 1937 and read in all pulpits before the Nazi authorities could do anything about it. It was a courageous action because although the pope did not move to rescind the concordat the encyclical could have placed the Catholic Church, and especially its clergy, at greater risk. It grabbed the initiative from Hitler and ensured that if he rescinded the concordat his action would be seen as retaliatory and would, if anything, reflect credit on the Catholic Church in other countries. By exposing the real nature of Hitler's regime it began to undermine his credibility to some extent. It also alerted the people of other countries to the danger from Nazi Germany and it offset, to some slight extent, the immeasurable damage which the Vatican had caused by eagerly negotiating the concordat with its shameful secret annex four years earlier.

However Mit Brennender Sorge was also a pathetic encyclical because of the fact that it had to be written at all; because of the implicit admissions of serious faults in the concordat system and of grave errors of judgement on the part of the Vatican; because it called into question once more the doctrinal basis of the church's self-understanding through the extravagant claims which Pius XI made yet again; and because it was not written to stand on its own but was written as one of three encyclicals which, as a cluster, were written with other aims in mind. The Vatican was not saying that it did not want – or that the world should not have – fascist or totalitarian governments. It was saying that governments should be moulded to its particular interpretation of totalitarian government so that, as Grober put it, totalitarian church and totalitarian civil government could run in parallel, making “common cause” in a friendly manner.

During negotiations with Pacelli, von Papen and his advisers had succeeded in leaving ‘political activity’, ‘political association’ and the status of baptized Jews ill-defined and the signing of the German concordat therefore did not, and could not, stop Nazi intimidation of Catholic organizations and its press, or persecution of clergy who challenged the regime. Vatican efforts to define these things in a manner which favoured the Catholic Church over Protestant churches, especially relating to the status of baptized Jews, only aggravated the situation. On September 19, 1933, only two days after the ratification of the concordat had been celebrated with enthusiasm, the political police chief in the Bavarian Catholic heartland issued an instruction banning all Catholic meetings except choir practices and meetings of the St. Vincent de Paul charitable society, and two weeks later Cardinal Bertram delivered a catalogue of protests about suppression of church activities to the Vatican. This led to Pacelli advising the German ambassador that the pope intended to make a public statement on infringements of the concordat and to a round of discussions on which church organizations were legitimate and which should be incorporated into National Socialist programs, after which Pacelli is said to have “restrained” the pope from making a worldwide protest.³⁵²

The level of harassment rose and fell, protests continued to pour into the Vatican, cat-and-mouse negotiations continued to little effect and the German bishops became increasingly frustrated. When a group of three who had originally been briefed as Pacelli's intermediaries sought to resolve matters in direct talks with Hitler they were restrained on the authority of the pope, with Hitler's “Night of the Long Knives” cited as justification. On that night, June 30, 1934, in Hitler's mini version of a Stalin party purge, an estimated 84 senior figures in politics, the church and public administration who had either been crucial to Hitler's personal rise to power or who may have been potential competitors for power were eliminated. That blood purge certainly struck fear into the hearts of many would-be protesters, but the real reason for the Vatican's intervention in a “characteristic act of centrism” was that “the Holy See was not going to allow the German bishops local discretion under any circumstances.”³⁵³

Overall, the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Nazi state continued to deteriorate over the next two and a half years and usually the church was stifled into silence whenever a dubious social program was introduced or the Nuremberg laws against the Jews were tightened. But on August 28, 1935, the German bishops issued a pastoral letter to be read from all pulpits in an effort to repudiate the notion that “religion has nothing to do with politics” and to encourage the faithful into action which would “let their light shine before the people.” It was an indication of their frustration with Pacelli’s inaction, but it was also a none-too-subtle and dangerous bid to prompt protest action. Hitler responded on September 11 with a statement to the Nazi Congress that he was not against Christianity itself, “but we will fight it for the sake of keeping our public life free from those priests who have failed their calling and who should have become politicians rather than clergymen.”³⁵⁴ Then a series of morality and sexual misconduct charges were laid against clergy in a bid to keep them silent, and when a series of atrocities against nuns and priests in the context of the Spanish Civil War led to criticism of Fascist regimes both Hitler and the pope were quick to point out that things were worse under Communism! This led Faulhaber to issue an episcopal letter to the churches in Bavaria in January 1937 to encourage cooperation between church and state in combating Communism.³⁵⁵

However, about the same time the Fulda Bishops Conference drew up a list of seventeen violations of the concordat and a delegation of three cardinals and two bishops was sent to Rome and met Pacelli on January 16. According to Cornwell,³⁵⁶ their demands for action were so determined and persistent that the Secretary of State “had no choice but to involve the Holy Father.” Pius XI, although gravely ill and “almost unrecognizable” from a complex of diabetes, heart complaints and other disorders, agreed to receive them in his bedroom. Convinced of their case, he decided to issue an encyclical on the plight of the church in Germany. Faulhaber was instructed to prepare a draft and he did so at great speed, handing it to Pacelli on January 21. Pacelli then edited the draft, and added material on the history of the concordat. Pope Pius XI did no more than authorize its preparation and publication in his name.

The encyclical in its published form opens with an attempt to justify the concordat on compassionate grounds, saying “We wished to spare Our loyal sons and daughters in Germany, as far as was humanly possible, the strain and the suffering which otherwise at that time and in those circumstances must certainly have been expected.” At best it was a very incomplete statement of Vatican motives. There follow very ambiguous references to “intrigues which from the beginning had no other aim than a war of extermination.”³⁵⁷

That particular clause has been widely interpreted as a condemnation of Hitler’s anti-Semitic policy but it requires close examination. There is no direct condemnation of either National Socialism or Hitler. Neither is there any direct reference to anti-Semitism; the pope had previously failed to act on a request for a special encyclical on the subject; and the Jesuit press was continuing a steady stream of its own anti-Semitic propaganda which Hitler took full advantage of and which nullified attempts by other Catholic churchmen to correct the situation.³⁵⁸ In addition, while Hitler’s practices at that stage were highly oppressive they had not reached the stage of organized murder, with the notable exception of the ‘Night of the Long Knives’, and either the drafter or editor (‘author’, hereafter) included his own highly provocative anti-Semitic statements in the encyclical. He quoted the text from the Gospel of John to the effect that anyone who denies the Son (Jesus) also denies the Father (God); he referred to the way of Salvation for eyes “not blinded by prejudice or passion”, and he capped it with a reference to “Christ who truly appeared in the flesh, and who took His human nature from the people which was afterwards to nail Him to a cross.”³⁵⁹ On the other hand, Hitler’s programs of legalized sterilization and execution of medical “undesirables” were already underway (with certain categories of Catholic medical practitioners exempted from carrying out the operations) and the reference to extermination was at least in part a reference to those programs.³⁶⁰ It must also be coupled to Hitler’s general attack on the church and the reference in the encyclical to “storm clouds of destructive religious wars” and the threat of damnation for those who discriminated against Roman Catholics.

The encyclical dealt with Nazi efforts to suppress church schools; idolatrous cults of race, pre-Christian rites and ‘godman’ adulation of the fuhrer; showpiece trials of dissident priests and their incarceration in concentration camps; and the use of national youth associations to indoctrinate young people against the church. Then there was a note on “the blessing which came to Western civilization from the living union between the (Catholic) Church and (the German) people.”³⁶¹ The Vatican’s troubles in Germany were being compounded by the state-church status of the Reich Church coupled with the snowballing ecumenical movement. This prompted the author to include a strong swipe at the incompatibility of the German National Church with the primacy of Rome and at the “hopeless sterility (and) spiritual torpor” of the separated “broken pieces” of the church.³⁶² He knew that two major world conferences were to be held only a few months after the release of Mit Brennender Sorge and interest in them was such that discussion within the Catholic Church could no longer be suppressed by the simple expedient of yet another critical papal encyclical. The first of those conferences, at Oxford in July 1937, was to be concerned with life and work while the second, at Edinburgh, was to deal with issues of faith and order. They were to be followed towards the end of 1938 by a third international missionary conference at Tambaram, India, and together they involved three of the main thrusts of the ecumenical movement which had been going along in parallel for some forty years.³⁶³ However there was a relatively small meeting planned to be held at Westfield College, Hampstead, on July 8–10, immediately before the Oxford Conference. There were only 35 people to be present but, as representatives of most branches of the ecumenical movement, they were expected to make a decision of far-reaching importance which would greatly influence not only the tone and decisions of each of the following conferences but the future direction of the church world wide. They were expected to recommend the establishment of a World Council of Churches.

THE NEED FOR A BALANCING ACT

However, the author had other things as well as the ecumenical movement to worry about. One effect which the Vatican seems to have anticipated from the publication of “Mit Brennender Sorge” was a boost to the standing of international communism which had been the only major political force consistently opposed to Hitler and Nazism. If the infallible pope had to admit, with such deep emotion, that the church had been wrong in its assessment of Hitler and Nazism people could reasonably conclude that it was wrong on Communism also. And if it was wrong on Communism what did that suggest about its position on Jews? And if ... As always, once that question had been asked there was no end to the questions. The entire doctrinal basis of the church would be under scrutiny again. The threat to the entire institutional structure of the church was as real as ever. And in addition that man Karl Barth was still lurking in the wings. He and his colleagues had stopped short once. Might they do so again?

Actually it is doubtful whether, in 1937, Vatican officials and theologians took the line of reasoning that far. They probably got no further than recognizing the threat to the teaching authority of the Catholic Church and the immediate consequence of that – the undermining of what they saw as its primary God-given role: the direction of universal social and political patterns.

Thus, whatever the end point of their reasoning, the Vatican had a number of vexatious issues to consider. Although the urgency with which the approach was made to Pius XI for action and relief in Germany, and the haste with which Mit Brennender Sorge was drafted would suggest that it was intended for very prompt publication, it was not published until two months later. The other situations had to be taken into account and they were considered of at least equal urgency. The result was that three major encyclicals were prepared concurrently for carefully controlled – or stage managed – release. The text of Mit Brennender Sorge was prepared in the German language only, it was promulgated secretly on March 14, 1937. Copies were smuggled into Germany, duplicated and distributed with equal secrecy and it was read from all Catholic pulpits – in Germany only – on Palm Sunday, March 21. Divini Redemptoris, a systematic denunciation of Communism, was prepared in both Latin and Italian. It was promulgated openly five days after the apologia, on March 19, for world wide consumption. It was admitted into Germany quite freely, and it was certainly widely read across Europe on the same day that Mit Brennender Sorge was read in Germany: Palm Sunday. And because the apologia was not immediately widely known outside of Germany the anti-Communist encyclical is often regarded as the first of the three and it was certainly intended to hold the public spotlight. The third, Nos es muy, on Marxist influence and persecution of the church in Mexico, was issued in both Latin and Spanish for reading on Easter Day, March 28.

According to Passelecq and Suchecky, Pius XI had already ordered work to begin on two encyclicals “toward the end of 1936.” One was Mit Brennender Sorge. The other, on atheistic Communism and the necessity of working toward the transformation of society through professional organizations, Divini Redemptoris,³⁶⁴ According to information available to them, preparation of Divini Redemptoris, was placed in the hands of the Superior General of the Jesuit Order, Fr. Wladimir Ledochowski, but preparation of Mit Brennender Sorge was “under the personal direction of Cardinal Pacelli” whose “moderating influence had up to that point kept the pope from expressing himself publicly.”³⁶⁵ Their sources indicate that the basic drafting had already been done by a team of writers who included Monsignor Ludwig Kaas, (apparently prior to the visit of the German delegation to Pacelli on January 26, 1937), and that Faulhaber’s role, after he and other members of the delegation had reviewed the draft during their visit, was to put the final touches to it.³⁶⁶ It was Kaas who had worked intimately with Pacelli on the drafting of the concordat; acted as courier between Pacelli and Hitler; persuaded the bishops to accept the document; acted for Pacelli in applying pressure on the Catholic Centre Party to dissolve; and published a paper on the relationship of papal primacy to the fuhrer-prinzip. It is therefore most unlikely that Faulhaber would have had any real success in strengthening the draft encyclical.

However Passelecq and Suchecky also make three significant points concerning the relationship between the two key encyclicals. First: Fr Gustave Desbuquois, one of the drafters of Divini Redemptoris, was called to Rome urgently at the beginning of February to help revise the whole text of that encyclical to ensure that it was not limited to a simple condemnation of Communism.³⁶⁷ Second: Ledochowski was obsessed by the Communist danger and hoped, against all the evidence, that the church and the German government would ultimately find a modus vivendi. Third: he was therefore concerned that there should be no stronger statement made (in isolation) against National Socialism in case it prompted greater support for Communism and, in the same vein as Pacelli, that above all the concordat should be preserved.³⁶⁸

It is therefore reasonable to reach the following conclusions. First, that as a result of the pressure from the German bishops either the drafting or the completion of Mit Brennender Sorge was brought forward. Second, that decisions were taken to edit Mit Brennender Sorge in such a way that the German bishop's criticisms of National Socialist conduct were muted so that the encyclical could not precipitate a break with Hitler. Third, that the decision was taken to speed up completion of Divini Redemptoris so that the release of the two (or three) encyclicals could be coordinated or 'stage managed' in the manner noted above. Fourth, that each of the decisions except the first were basically taken by Pacelli, the architect and protector of the Reich Concordat, whose aims were to maximize the Vatican's influence through a series of concordats with totalitarian governments and to minimize international questioning of its self-understanding and the consequences of the concordat system.

DIVINI REDEMPTORIS

Divini Redemptoris opens with either a very literal interpretation of the first book of the Bible, Genesis, or a misuse of it – or both.

*The promise of a Redeemer brightens the first page of the history of mankind, and the confident hope aroused by this promise softened the keen regret for a paradise which had been lost. It was this hope that accompanied the human race on its weary journey, until in the fullness of time the expected Saviour came to begin a new universal civilization, the Christian civilization, far superior even to that which up to this time had been laboriously achieved by certain more privileged nations. Nevertheless, the struggle between good and evil remained in the world as a sad legacy of the original fall.*³⁶⁹

This had the effect of placing heavy emphasis on both the guilt complexes of the concept of original sin and the church's Jewish heritage. In doing so it did two things: it validated the Hebrew Scriptures and it emphasized the claimed superiority of Christianity and the socio-economic and political systems which it spawned or which were associated with it. Pius XI, or the author or editor, then continued with the same disregard for historical accuracy and perspective which had marked so many previous papal statements. He completely ignored the pattern of causes and effects in human interaction and relationships which run through history, the rapidly growing knowledge of pre-history, and the dynamically growing knowledge of the nature of the universe and linked Communism directly with "the ancient tempter" who has never ceased to deceive mankind with false promises, and the series of "convulsions" which have followed one another through the centuries "down to the revolution of our own days."

The world was expected to believe that Communism was spawned by the devil and that it had nothing to do with the abuse of humanity by the dominant people and powers of the Western Christian World. He went on to claim: "Christian civilization (was) immeasurably superior to the culture which some advanced nations had contrived with great labour and difficulty to attain." Bolshevist, atheistic communism "whose one aim is to upset completely the ordered structure of society and undermine the very foundations of Christian civilization" had brought the world to revolution "exceeding in violence and magnitude any persecution which the Church has ever sustained." It threatened to "reduce whole nations to a state of barbarism worse than that which prevailed among most peoples before the coming of the Redeemer."³⁷⁰ Apparently he could not recall anything about the Christianization of Scandinavia, the Crusades, the Inquisitions, heresy hunting and burnings at the stakes, or the conquest of Latin America. Communism aimed, he said, to "set up a barrier between science and faith, and between human life and the church."³⁷¹ Such statements are hollow indeed coming after Copernicus; Darwin; the Syllabus of Errors; the Lateran Council, the papal oaths against modernism and restrictions on universities which had actually been devised and drawn up while Pius XI was working his way up through the Vatican hierarchy. He was, at that time, head of the Ambrosiana and, according to a church historian, "esteemed by the world of European scholarship as a prefect and author of a host of fundamental critical works on church history ..."³⁷² Surely it is highly improbable that he would have written with such callous disregard for history even if he was eager to sustain the Vatican's social and teaching authority.

The real situation was that Communists and other non-believers demanded a review of those statements by the church which had been proven erroneous by modern research, and reasonable compatibility between the church's doctrinal statements and the rapidly growing store of facts derived from scientific and historical research. The church could not oblige because of its self-understanding and so it defended itself by the only course it understood. It denigrated scientists, historians and philosophers along with Communists and other non-believers and built the barrier of dogma and doctrine ever higher.

The author of the fanciful representation of history in the encyclical took the concept that 'the Word' preceded creation, then extended and transferred the continuity of its authority to the church, sought to maintain the myth of a universal presence of unblemished Christianity, and described a constant struggle by powers of evil to unseat it and deceive the world in spite of the church. He deliberately linked Christianity and conservative western social and economic order, equating one with the other, and saying 'if you upset one you upset both.' [... bolshevistic and atheistic Communism ... aims at upsetting the social order and at undermining the very foundations of Christian civilization."³⁷³] He then referred to the 1846 encyclical of the "immortal" predecessor of Pius XI, Leo XIII, and said that in order to save Christian civilization and to protect the rights, property and possessions of all men from the satanic scourge it was "... Our duty to raise Our voice once more, in a still more solemn missive, in accord with the tradition of this Apostolic See, the Teacher of Truth ..."³⁷⁴

The author then followed his historical overview with his particular interpretation or "brief synthesis" of the "Doctrine of Communism." With the best of rhetoric, but with a line of reasoning which not all scholars accept, he concluded that "such a doctrine obviously leaves no room for the idea of an eternal God, for a distinction between spirit and matter or between body and soul, for the survival of the soul after death, or for any hope of a future life."³⁷⁵ But the author's interpretation of the 'Doctrine of Communism' and his misrepresentation of the human rights struggle in Russia combined to win the pope and the Vatican friends among Western Capitalists, and it also reinforced the barrier between Russia and the West. Similarly, his virulent attacks on Soviet Russia's steps to ensure equality and political and domestic emancipation for women served to entrench male chauvinism in the West even further. It was only after a generation of war had established the need for women to join the income-earning workforce in the interests of national survival, and when it was in the economic interests of Capitalism for them to stay there, that women's rights could get an effective hearing in the West.

And those issues linked into the pope's trenchant but ill-informed attacks on Soviet Russia's family and marriage policies to compound the effects of his social encyclicals in a most destructive way. He, or the author, chose to totally ignore new laws introduced in Russia during the previous year which bore a remarkable similarity to some aspects of Vatican policy both during the 1930s and the 1980s. For example, Soviet Russia's 1936 marriage and family law made it much more difficult and more costly to obtain divorce, especially after second or subsequent marriages. There was no provision for Las Vegas-type quickies in Russia and alimony provisions were tightened.³⁷⁶ Financial support for large families was a long established political Catholic platform which had brought only a limited response in the West, but Soviet Russia introduced it without a lot of ballyhoo and without the need for competitive denominational lobbying. However, in view of contemporary Roman Catholic sponsorship of "Right to Life" movements, the most striking omission from the papal encyclical was any reference to Soviet Russia's belief in the sanctity of life and its virtual total prohibition of abortions which had previously been legal.³⁷⁷

Pius XI, or the author, also totally disregarded the fact that the change from a religious to a civil basis for marriage had swept western Europe from Austria to France when both Capitalist monarchies and republics had been struggling with the church quite a few generations earlier. He simply characterized Communism in Russia as “a lawless system”, “constitutionally devoid of any principle of restraint” and “an association of human beings with no other principle of unity save an authority deriving from economic factors.” He said it “scorns and rejects all the sacred functions of human life”, “denies the indissoluble perpetuity of wedlock”, denies parents “the right to educate their offspring”, claims that right “exclusively for the community”, lacks ethical standards of administration and has “reduced whole masses of citizens to the state of slavery.”³⁷⁸

In addition he also ignored some of the conciliatory steps which the Soviet government had taken in 1936 when the new constitution was introduced. It retained the freedom of worship – alongside the freedom of anti-religious propaganda – and it abolished previous ‘disabilities’ imposed on priests. Children of clergymen were again permitted to enroll in institutions of higher learning, and the collection of funds for churches and ringing of church bells were again permitted.

When he turned to economic and political comparisons the author’s reasoning and presentation was little better. His attempts to ridicule “the doctrine which Bolshevist and atheistic communism preaches to the world as a new gospel, as the harbinger of salvation and deliverance” only serve to draw attention to the inadequacies of the church, including its pathetic efforts to prop up the concept of papal infallibility; its claims to authority over the state; and the delegated divine right of kings. He described Communism as “a doctrine destructive of the foundations of civil society and subversive of social order; a doctrine which refuses to acknowledge the true origin of the State, its true nature and purpose; which repudiates and denies the rights, the dignity, and the freedom of the person.” Then he claimed that the ground had been prepared for the spread of communism by the failure of governments to build churches in the neighbourhood of factories, or “to facilitate the ministrations of the priest”, and the drift away from Sunday observance.³⁷⁹ The answer to Communism was therefore to promote religious education in schools and to pour money and people into the church!

A BID FOR MORE CONCORDATS

Then came the pincers to pick up a few more concordats and to tighten the links between the church and Capitalism. “... there can be no hope of saving human society from the ruin and disaster to which an amoral liberalism is driving it, unless the economic and social order is inspired and guided by the principles of social justice and Christian charity ...” There could be no salvation through class warfare, terrorism, or the arbitrary and tyrannical use of the power of the state ... according to the encyclical. What a pathetic statement to make in view of the church’s long history of the abuse of state power. It is not conceivable that he was admitting the failure of the church during its long history. He simply hoped that people had forgotten its history.

True welfare of the people, according to the author, "should be secured through a properly devised system of corporations which would acknowledge and respect the different ranks of social authority ..."³⁸⁰ "It is utterly untrue, and mere empty talk, to say that all citizens have equal rights ...(and) ... Catholics may find (in earlier papal encyclicals) clearly expounded the principles of reason and revelation which will arm them against the beguiling and dangerous doctrines of communism." "The community as well as the citizen is of divine origin ... (and) ... in their fundamentals these mutual relations of citizen and community have been established and regulated by God Himself ..."³⁸¹ Perhaps that should have read that they have been interpreted, imposed and regulated by the church and its associated temporal powers.

As if to allow some slight independence for civil authorities the author noted that the church has "never propounded any definite technical system" in the social and economic field. "This is not her function," he said, "but she has nevertheless laid down fundamental principles and general directions which, while capable of adaptation according to differences of time, place and people, do point out to civil society the safe path towards an era of improved culture and greater happiness."³⁸² Those "fundamental principles", he said, had to adhere closely to "the ancient doctrine of the church on the nature of private property in its relation to the individual and to society ..." which he (Pope Pius XI) had dealt with in one of his encyclicals at the height of the Great Depression. "We clearly and distinctly emphasized the rights and dignity of human labour (and) the mutual relations of help and support which should subsist between those who provide capital and those who supply their labour ..."³⁸³ It was a pat on the back for Capitalism generally and any authoritarian power in league with the church, and a strong encouragement for Hitler who was varying the established Capitalist pattern to suit himself.

According to Divini Redemptoris the poor could endeavour "in accordance with the laws of justice and charity to gain what is needful for themselves and even to better their lot." But they "must, in like manner be 'poor in spirit' and set greater store by heavenly things than by earthly joys." Let them bear in mind, too, the author continued, "that men will never succeed in ridding this life entirely of misery, sorrow, and disease, evils that afflict even those who to all appearances are more fortunate than they." Patience maintains a cheerful spirit and finds confidence in the divine promise of eternal bliss, he said.³⁸⁴ Certainly he criticized abuses which "defraud the worker of his wage and his social rights" but the pope's basic theme was "the very right of ownership which the church sanctions and defends."³⁸⁵ Capitalists and their system had the papal blessing they were desperately in need of, especially in the exhortation for the downtrodden not to resort to revolution.

Priests were exhorted to count the fight against Communism as second only to the maintenance of life; to beg the intercession of "His Immaculate Mother, who long ago crushed the old serpent's head"; to appeal for close cooperation between governments and the church; and finally to invoke "the guidance and protection of St. Joseph, the powerful patron of the Catholic Church” in the campaign “against the onset of atheistic communism.”³⁸⁶ Sweet words indeed for Hitler. Unknown to the rest of the world, his chaplains were ready, willing and waiting to serve. For those who accepted the church’s theology of Mariology and saintly intercession that was powerful stuff. For those who did not, it was either sickening or laughable, depending upon their personal perspective. In either case it meant that the church then ranked the fight against Communism as even more vital than the fight against either of its partners in the triangle of Messianic faiths: Judaism and Islam. To slot another ‘ism’ onto a rung even lower than them was at best a very backhanded compliment and it was hardly a basis for improved interfaith relations. To label a person a Communist was to denigrate him or her in the most insulting and degrading way and, by implication, anyone who opposed Communism was an ally of the church. Hitler included.

In the circumstances as we now know them, and given the state of the pope’s health, it is reasonable to assume that Pius XI had no more involvement in either Divini Redemptoris or Nos es muy than he did in Mit Brennender Sorge. They, too, were prepared and published on his authority and in his name but with no direct input from him and with either the Cardinal Secretary of State, Pacelli, or the Jesuit Superior General, Ledochowski, controlling the processes.

In view of that, the importance of Divini Redemptoris does not lie solely in the fact that “it had become the ideological basis of Catholic defence against Communism and a source of inspiration and hope for the whole Christian world.”³⁸⁷ It lies in the fact that in publishing it and allowing it to be coordinated with Mit Brennender Sorge in this manner, the Vatican Curia had engineered two things. Firstly: the ties between the Vatican and anti-Communist regimes, and in particular the National Socialist regime of Hitler in Germany and other totalitarian regimes had been strengthened. Secondly, the church had been linked absolutely and officially to the Capitalist system, complete with all its abuses of human personality and rights. These things had been done by the use of theological rationale and doctrinaire statements at the very time when the church faced its greatest challenge from Communism, a movement which had developed to oppose and to offset such abuses and misuse of doctrine. Links between Christianity and Capitalism had been forged as a result of papal financial policy during the Crusades. They had been strengthened during the struggle for Constantinople; the rush for the New World; the Reformation; the French Revolution; and the Napoleonic Wars. They had been given more obvious form during the Colonial era – the era of Christian reconstruction of the non-European world – and the Industrial Revolution, and they had been given a theological basis of sorts, and respectability, with the development of the American version of the Protestant business and work ethic. Now those links had been graced with the ultimate stamp of approval: a papal encyclical coupled with policies and actions which showed a strong leaning towards ‘professional’ or totalitarian and Fascist systems of government.

The movement towards social and economic reform was retarded immeasurably and, with the crisis in Europe deepening, so was any prospect of rapprochement between the Soviet Union and the West which might have acted as a brake on Hitler. As much as they might try, Christians could no longer deny the deliberate doctrinal links between the church, Capitalism and oppressive authoritarian regimes. And in spite of all that had happened since the challenge of the Balfour Declaration had been thrown down, the church-at-large was unshaken in its self-misunderstanding. It still failed to see in Mein Kampf the parody of the Christian amorphous gel or to grasp the consequences of its actions. It was as if Hitler and Pius XI were competing in the parody writing business. Mein Kampf was the classic parody of the amorphous Christian gel. Divini Redemptoris was an equally classic parody of the Gospel as preached and exemplified by Jesus of Nazareth. Only a quite remarkable change in attitude could avoid a dramatic response from Stalin's communist government or the acting out of the twin parodies, but there was no sign of such a development. No sign, that is, until the Tambaram International Missionary Conference in December the following year, 1938. But that didn't have the same impact as Divini Redemptoris. The Tambaram participants were swimming against the tide of events. In any case they were too late because the world didn't have long to wait to see how the Soviet regime reacted.

Within months of Divini Redemptoris a program of closure of selected places of worship was enforced across Russia and about 1,900 places of worship or related facilities had been closed by the end of 1937. They included 240 Roman Catholic Churches, 115 synagogues, 110 mosques, 61 Lutheran churches or places of worship for other faiths and 1,100 Orthodox Churches, or less than 3% of an estimated 39,000 which had been operating in 1928. [There had already been a fall in the number of functioning churches by about 4% compared with pre-revolution Russia.] Then in 1938 political executions on the grounds that the accused were counter-revolutionaries, spies or conspirators in league with enemies of the regime accounted for eight bishops and many more priests, monks and laymen. In addition about fifty other church officials of high rank were imprisoned.³⁸⁸ However at the same time that the government wielded the big stick it continued to dangle the carrot of reconciliation. The mass observance of Christmas and Easter was recognized and orders were issued that workers were not to be penalized for absenteeism during those festivals; the manufacture and sale of objects connected with worship was again permitted; in one region ikon painters were allowed to continue their trade; history texts ridiculing Russian Christianity were removed from schools; blasphemous plays and films were banned; anti-Christian carnivals were also prohibited; and films, plays and books were produced lauding the patriotism of early churchmen and the constructive role of Christianity in the formation of Russian culture. Two years later, while the German-Soviet non-aggression pact was in effect, the seven-day week was restored and Sunday was made a compulsory legal holiday.³⁸⁹

During the twenty years since the Balfour Declaration the challenge to the church had taken on new and fearsome dimensions but few people realized they were acting out a parody on Christianity. The world situation became more complex and the causes of the complications were concealed, sometimes by circumstances but very often by deliberate leadership decision, as the consequences of one thousand nine hundred years of Christian self-misunderstanding began to change the trouble in the triangle into turmoil.

The Vatican-based wing of the church, still in a dominant position, acted as if it was determined to suppress change at all costs; to squeeze the world into social and ethical straight jackets of personality-destroying rigidity and to maintain its political power through a system of concordats or similar arrangements. The papal encyclicals Mortalium Animos (against the ecumenical movement); Casti Connubii (coupled with the other social encyclicals); and papal speeches announcing the Lateran Treaty and anticipating the growth of totalitarian government each illustrated those attitudes. Then Divini Redemptoris, following hot on the heels of Mit Brennender Sorge, left the world in no doubt about either the intimate links between the Christian Church and Capitalism, or the means by which it hoped to eliminate the challenge of Communism. At the same time it was using every contrivance available to it to offset the recurring challenge of Judaism.

Fortunately a rethink had begun in some fragments of the church. The towering intellect of Karl Barth had led the way, but his efforts were being stifled by circumstances and the contradictory conduct of the church. There was a growing number of people who were prepared to question the role, doctrines, policies and actions of the church. There were a few, such as those at Tambaram for Christmas 1938, who were prepared to fly in the face of Divini Redemptoris; to declare that “the dominating social and economic order throughout the world has been organized in such a way that it is difficult for man with his fellowmen to realize the Christian meaning of community” and who were prepared to break the links between the church and political power. There was the hard core of leaders in the several parallel thrusts of the ecumenical movement who were determined to bring reconciliation through a fresh look at those aspects of Christian life and worship which had fragmented the church. And there were even a few, like Bishop Oldham, who were prepared to actually talk about other faiths with people of those faiths without the assumptions of superiority which marked most Christians.

THE COLUMBUS PLATFORM

For its part the Synagogue – in all three denominational streams – had come increasingly under the influence of Zionism. The movement had started as a political stream within the Jewish Community of Europe. It had been aimed at freeing that community from the oppressive weight of the church and its amorphous Christian gel. It had been based on an aberration of Jewish theology, it was being shaped by world circumstances and it had gradually become the dominant thrust of Judaism, but there were still other developments and further reforms taking place in Judaism in response to those same pressures, and the net result was a progressive recovery in its influence in relation to its partners in the triangle. The Union of [Eastern European] Orthodox Rabbis was established in the United States in 1902; the Menorah Society at Harvard University was set up in 1906; B’nai B’rith established the Anti-Defamation League in 1913; then in 1917 the Conservative United Synagogue of America adopted a more pro-Zionist position and set up a committee on the interpretation of Jewish Law. During the years following World War I the Institute for Jewish (Historical) Research was set up in Vilna, a principal centre for Jewish culture in Poland's notorious buffer zone which had changed hands with monotonous regularity. Then the Synagogue Council of America was set up in 1926 in a bid to bring together Orthodox and non-Orthodox organizations; the Rabbinical Council of America was organized by English-speaking Orthodox Rabbis in 1933; and many organizations of an educational, welfare, industrial, philanthropic or theological training character were established within, or to serve, Jewish communities in America, Europe and elsewhere.³⁹⁰

Coinciding with those moves, and complementary to them, was the establishment of the World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ). This had its roots in an invitation by German Liberals for their counterparts in Britain, France and the United States to send representatives to their regular conference in 1914, shortly before Europe was engulfed in the First World War, so that, together, they could move towards a permanent union of all Liberal Jews. However that effort was interrupted and complicated by the war in exactly the same manner as the moves by leaders of the Ecumenical Movement to bring the Reformed Churches together, and it was not until 1926 that a conference could be organized on that basis, in London. The establishment of the WUPJ as a permanent body at that conference, in spite of vigorous dispute over the issue of Zionism which threatened to undermine its position of neutrality and scuttle it, was due largely to the drive of Miss Lily Montagu, the first woman to exercise significant influence within the Reform Movement, the first woman to be invited to preach and to read the service in a London synagogue, and a person who deserves special mention. Montagu, had already fused religion with a career in social work among under-privileged Jewish girls at the time of the Dreyfus controversy. Unable to accept Orthodox Jewish worship, only two years after the formation of the Zionist Organization she was then bold enough to propose an association which would extend the social obligations into the practice of religion and restore the blessing of religion to those who had lost it. Then she was a very mature 28 year-old when she agreed to serve as a vice president of the Jewish Religious Union at its formation in 1901. A committed universalist and anti-Zionist, she was very firm in her belief in God-external who cares for and loves each person. She was equally firm in her opposition to mixed-religion marriages.

When the WUPJ held its second conference in Berlin in 1928, Montagu became the first woman to deliver a sermon in a German synagogue. That conference, unaware of what lay ahead in the Depression, or of the full impact that Hitler's Mein Kampf was about to have, or that he would have achieved absolute power in Germany only five years later, set a new direction for Liberal Judaism in Europe, and somewhat less so in the United States. Rabbi Leo Baeck reflected and strengthened the thrust of the conference when he told delegates that the message for Liberal Jews lay not in any sermon but in the person; not in trying to keep Judaism current with the times, but in setting it against the times so as to help order the world for the Kingdom of God. In the nineteenth century Judaism had been too concerned with conformity, he said, and with how it appeared to others rather than with what it really was. Now the time had come to throw away the mirror and to look inside. True Liberalism was an intensive Judaism, he said, a religion of piety that took itself seriously. Such a religion would always have to set the messianic against the existent, the future against the present, great unrealized ideas against the ways of the world. He urged the delegates to “begin to create the future.”³⁹¹ [Emphasis added.]

Under the stimulus of the WUPJ the Reform Movement tried to respond to the growing crisis for Jews in Europe, and, in spite of the deepening economic crisis and the ever increasing pressure to recognize the role of Zionism within the Jewish community, it successfully established a Union of Liberal Religious Jews in Holland. It also launched a survey of religious conditions among Jews in Poland and tried to establish a Liberal mission to serve the larger cities but, when it found that the most serious of the enlightened Jews in Poland were interested in Jewish culture and modern Jewish studies rather than in a Jewish identity which was essentially religious, it reluctantly abandoned the venture.³⁹²

Subsequently, recognizing the tensions over the issue within the WUPJ and elsewhere, the Central conference of American Rabbis adopted a resolution in 1935 that ‘Zionism is a matter of personal conscience’ and deferred a more definitive decision on changes to the movement’s platform to a later conference. Then in May 1937, influenced by the ever-deteriorating situation in both Europe and the Middle East, and endeavoring to maintain its position at the leading edge of theological evolution, it adopted the Columbus Platform. For a time the conference was deadlocked over which of two drafts to adopt, or whether to have a formal platform at all, and the new platform, radically different in format and emphasis from the Pittsburgh Platform of 1885, was only adopted after much soul searching.³⁹³

The Columbus Platform departs from the forms of religious dogma and doctrine and presents beliefs and faith as a statement of religious philosophy, except to note that: “The heart of Judaism and its chief contribution to religion is the doctrine of the One, living God, who rules the world through law and love. In Him all existence has its creative source and mankind its ideal of conduct. Through transcending time and space, He is the indwelling presence of the world. We worship Him as the Lord of the universe and as our merciful Father.” Judaism, it states, is the historical religious experience of the Jewish people, growing out of Jewish life, with a universal message and aiming at the union and perfection of mankind under the sovereignty of God. Reform Judaism recognizes progressive development in religion, welcomes all truth whether written in the pages of scripture or deciphered from the records of nature and science. Then the platform refers to the nature of man, the role of the Torah, ethics, social justice, peace, religious practice, and Israel. It refers to Judaism as the soul of which Israel is the body; recognizes the bond of religious tradition and Israel’s mission to witness to the Divine; beholds the promise of renewed life in the rehabilitation of Palestine; welcomes those who accept the faith of Judaism; and affirms the obligation of all Jewry to aid in its upbuilding as a Jewish homeland by endeavouring to make it not only a haven of refuge for the oppressed but also a centre of Jewish culture and spiritual life. Then it states Israel’s Messianic goal as cooperation with all men in the establishment of the kingdom of God, of universal brotherhood, and of justice, truth and peace on earth. It does not use the terms ‘Zion’ or ‘Zionism.’

However it was Zionism which had determined and which had undermined relations between the Bolshevik movement in Russia and Russia's Jewish community. It was a reaction against Zionism which largely fuelled the Nazi drive to power in Germany and it was Zionism which had an influence on British and European foreign policy quite out of proportion to the size of the Jewish community. It was also Zionism which was driving the Jewish community to make its inflexible demands on Palestine. Thus it was Zionism which was fuelling conflict in Palestine and undermining Britain's ability to stand up to Hitler, and which was responsible for the fact that Jewish people, as a worldwide community, were enmeshed by an act of transgression against the people of that land.

The situation envisaged in the Qur'anic Night Journey had become a reality. But unfortunately only the Muslims of the Middle East who were continuing their organizational and spiritual revival from a position of political weakness seemed conscious of it. People and powers in the Christian West wouldn't listen. For one thing they still didn't recognize Islam or the validity of Muhammad's prophetic mission. For another thing, what the Jews were doing in collaboration with Christian Britain was no different to what European Christians were doing in colonial areas right around the globe, so that meant it was quite acceptable. It was another vital link in the parody. But if that had been recognized and if it had been acted on, the political and economic consequences would have been enormous. And there was that persistent issue of a rethink of Christian theology ...

The church could not afford to recognize the Qur'anic verse, sura 17:8 which had been addressed to the Jewish community. Neither could the Jews. It was an embarrassment to both groups. It is the passage which warns that if the Jews as a community transgressed a third time they would again be scourged. It ends with the words "We have made Hell a prison house for the unbelievers." (Chapter 8) If the church had recognized Zionism as a reaction to its own excesses, and if it had recognized the validity of that verse then the process of dismantling the burden of its doctrinal deadweight must have begun and the world could have taken the path towards peace. As it was, it stayed on the path to war. Britain was about to change its mind on the Balfour Declaration but the Zionist wing of the Jewish community had not changed its mind on Palestine.

So Hitler pressed on with his military and territorial expansion. Russia pressed on in a last ditch effort to make the BiraBidzhan scheme work, but many leading Zionists pressed on with their efforts to undermine it so as to strengthen their claims to Palestine where, they believed, the situation was turning firmly against them. And as they did so, the situation in the Middle East worsened. We must now go back and pick up the threads of that key element in the development of the trouble in the triangle.

WHO DOES OWN THE MIDDLE EAST?

There was a lot of action in the Middle East in the twenty two years after the Balfour Declaration was devised, complete with its challenge to the church, but it was usually only the bomb throwers and the anti-Semites who caught the world headlines. It was a vast area and only parts of it could be shown in the colours of Europe's great Christian empires on educational maps of the period. Children would turn to their teachers or their parents with the question "who owns that piece in there?" The answer was seldom simple.

Double-handed imperial games were being played behind the scenes with more competitive greed and bitterness than in any other region but with so little publicity that the world was hardly aware that they were in progress. The name of the games was 'oil'. They were played at a hectic pace to rules of diplomatic deceit, political manoeuvre, and commercial intrigue based on the pattern which had already been set before the Great War. The key players, Britain, France and the United States, repeatedly tried to outsmart each other and also the resident players of the Middle East whose trump cards were the aspirations of Arabs, Persians and Zionist Jews. For quite some time the great power players managed to deflect responsibility for each successive upheaval onto one or other of those resident groups.

To grasp the significance of the imperial games and the way they meshed into, and were actually part of the action in Europe, it is necessary to look at the region as a whole and to note a series of events and decisions in the order in which they happened. We pick up the threads at the point where British and Dutch interests had been prepared to combine with German interests in order to keep US interests out of the Mosul region of Iraq which was expected to be a valuable source of oil.

In 1914 the Turkish Grand Vizier announced his government's intention of granting a concession to the European consortium but no action had been taken because relations between Europe's governments were severely strained as they slid towards war. Britain and Russia, which had divided Persia's exploration areas between them, both recruited army units in Persia for the subsequent campaign against Turkey. In March 1915 they joined with France in the 'Constantinople Agreement' for the division of the Ottoman Empire. A year later Britain and France gave the plan more substance with the Sykes-Picot Agreement while Britain set about inciting Arab leaders in rebellion against Turkey.

However not all of the Arabian Peninsula was under Turkish control. The central region, Nejd, was divided between Arab communities led by Rashids to the north and Saudis to the south. In 1912 Ibn Saud had extended the area under his control to include the key region of Hasa along the Persian Gulf. The two families were still at loggerheads when Britain and Turkey went to war. The Rashids threw their lot in with Turkey but the Saudis, sharing the vital waterway of the Persian Gulf with the powerful British fleet protecting Abadan, was very happy to do a deal with Britain. They didn't have much option if they wanted to survive. Ibn Saud signed what was, in effect, a protectorate treaty with Britain on December 26, 1915 and agreed not to grant any oil concessions without Britain's approval.

At the time that the Sykes-Picot Agreement was being negotiated Britain's dominant interest lay in ensuring control of the Suez Canal region and it was prepared to concede control of the Mosul region to France. However after Germany occupied Rumania, denying oil to the Allies, and Standard Oil began to exploit its market dominance ruthlessly there were British officials who regretted that concession. As the end of the war approached they were eager to renounce the agreement altogether, on the grounds that Russia had already discredited it, so that they could go into post war negotiations unencumbered.¹ In that sense, although it was partly prompted by frustration at US policy, the British army's mad post-armistice dash for Mosul must also be seen as demonstrating a lack of confidence in future cooperation from France which had good reason to anticipate territorial conflict after the announcement of the Balfour Declaration in November 1917.

When the Zionist Commission arrived in Palestine in March 1918 Britain, under pressure to confirm its assurances to the Arabs, said that it recognized the complete independence of those territories which had already been independent before the war or which had been liberated by the Arabs themselves. The government of those territories liberated by Allied armies would be "based upon the principle of the consent of the governed" and Britain would work for the freedom and independence of the parts of Syria and Iraq which were still unliberated.² Naturally the Egyptians, whose country had been reduced to a protectorate from which Britain controlled the Suez and from which it manipulated Arab "liberation", wanted a piece of the liberation action too. The extremists even demanded that London receive a delegation to discuss full independence. They were excited, and a period of four years of tension, murder and mismanagement opened as the British government, playing for very high stakes, rejected the advice of its own diplomats that the protectorate should be scrapped in favour of self-government.³

Standard Oil understood Britain's aims and attitude towards it very well and sensed that it could take advantage of her very uncomfortable political position in the Middle East to press its corporate rights. On September 3, with the Turkish armistice clearly only weeks away, the company applied officially to the British Authorities for permission to proceed with exploration and drilling in the Palestinian leases which Turkey had granted to it six months before the outbreak of war. They were then in occupied enemy territory over which several parties each claimed sovereignty. Britain refused permission and a strong disagreement flared between the US State Department and the British Foreign Office.

VICTORS HAGGLE OVER SPOILS

Britain soon faced disagreements and discord throughout the region. On October 3 when Faisal entered Damascus the French objected to an Arab flag being hoisted. It was removed on British orders and a counter-rebellion was only averted when a joint Anglo-French Declaration was issued on November 7, promising complete and final liberation for the peoples oppressed by the Turks. Their national governments would derive their authority “from the ... choice of the indigenous populations” with help from Britain and France in programmes of justice, education and development.⁴ It was enough to regain the confidence of the Arabs – for a while.

In London and Paris Prince Faisal, whose father had been recognized as king of the independent Hejaz, pressed for Britain and France to honour their undertaking for a single Arab State to be formed from all of the liberated territories. He soon found that contrary to all their encouraging words the Sykes-Picot agreement was to take precedence over the McMahon letter and four areas of occupation were going to be set up. He was thrust onto the sidelines, humiliated and placed in an impossible position from which to lead the people for whom he was speaking while Britain’s Lloyd George and France’s Clemenceau haggled at a conference in London in December. Clemenceau wanted Mosul but he wanted the Rhur more. He also knew that an Arab Nationalist reaction could cost France dearly in Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco. Accordingly the two leaders agreed that France would cede Mosul to the British and modify the Palestinian boundary in return for Britain’s support for France’s claim to the Rhur and a share of Mosul oil.

The importance of the region to Britain becomes clear from a cabinet decision on January 15, 1919 that “His Majesty’s Government should at once signify their willingness to cooperate (on Mesopotamian oil) before the French secured American assistance, and before this country was forced by decisions at the Peace Conference to adopt, in self-defence and practically under compulsion, the policy of cooperation to which it is now invited.”

The Peace Conference then allocated four zones. Iraq, including Mosul, and Palestine were to go to Britain; Lebanon was to go to France; and Faisal was to get the crown of an inland Syrian Arab State. Mr. Balfour, the man who had chaired a section at the Edinburgh International Missionary Conference, confirmed in a submission to cabinet that while self-determination might be an acceptable policy in Europe it had no place in the Middle East. “... in Palestine, (he said), we do not propose even to go through the form of consulting the wishes of the present inhabitants of the country ... The four Great Powers are committed to Zionism. And Zionism, be it right or wrong, good or bad, is rooted in age-long traditions, in present needs, in future hopes, of far profounder import than the desires and prejudices of the 700,000 Arabs who now inhabit that ancient land.”⁵

On January 3, while those negotiations were in full swing and only twelve days before that cabinet meeting, Faisal signed an agreement with Dr Weizmann in the belief that cooperation and goodwill between Arab and Jew in Palestine was achievable, that Arab independence in Palestine was not under threat and that Weizmann's people were not working towards a Jewish government in the territory.^{6 7} Faisal accepted and was sympathetic towards what he understood to be the intent of the Balfour Declaration, the Zionist programme and the proposal for large scale Jewish immigration.^{8 9} In return Weizmann committed the Zionist Organization to study and foster economic development for the whole region which was badly denuded of timber and olive plantations by the armies of the great war and was in a parlous social and economic plight as a result. Article V. of the agreement guaranteed freedom of religion and specifically that "No religious test shall ever be required for the exercise of civil or political rights."¹⁰ At that stage both parties were equally intent on showing that both religious harmony (which had never been achieved when the church had a finger in the pie) and religious liberty (which was still only being achieved the very hard way in Europe) were to be part of the way of life in Palestine. However it is clear that the negotiators did not share a common conception of the future political shape of Palestine and from a proviso clause which he attached to the agreement it appears that Faisal sensed that he was being manipulated. He wrote that he could not be answerable for failing to carry out the agreement if changes were made to the proposals which he had addressed to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the same Mr. Balfour.

Faisal didn't have to wait long to realize that the agreement was a waste of time. The French were hostile to him and the Arab Nationalism which he personified, and Britain was committed to paying off the Jewish community for its response in the Great War. He therefore pressed for an international commission of enquiry to be sent to Syria and Palestine. With Woodrow Wilson's support the proposal was adopted and it was agreed that a team of British, French, Italian and US commissioners would set off promptly. But French and British suspicions of each other (and of more or less everyone else) quickly sabotaged the proposal. Only the US nominees (Dr Henry King and Mr. Charles Crane) made the trip. Subsequently, and as a response to the US Senate's refusal to ratify the League of Nations Covenant in May, the European powers had an excellent reason to ignore their embarrassing report when it was released in August.

While King and Crane were in the Middle East they learned from the General Syrian Congress that the Arab community wanted a nation unified by a constitutional monarchy with Faisal as king. They also wanted its economic viability assured by a 20-year US assistance scheme in place of a mandate, but they did not want either the French or a Zionist State which could only be established by force of arms.¹¹

However the British and French governments were still arguing over the future of Mosul and its oil. On April 8 they agreed that, subject to their mandates being granted, a Mesopotamia-Turkish Petroleum Co. would be set up. Seventy percent of the capital would be held by British interests, twenty percent by French and ten percent by the "native government." France would "facilitate construction" of two separate pipelines from Persia and Mesopotamia to the Mediterranean, free of a transit fee across French mandatory territory. Three weeks later, on April 29, a British inter departmental committee on Eastern Affairs noted that the April 8 agreement was “an important part of the more important negotiations by which H.M. Government hoped to secure control of the Royal Dutch-Shell combine.” On May 16 the British Foreign Office confirmed the agreement so that arrangements could proceed, but on May 21 Lloyd George and Clemenceau clashed over parts of it and on July 22 Lord Curzon, the new Foreign Secretary, annulled it. The French would get nothing and the pipelines would run through British territory either to the Gulf or through Palestine.

In August, while the King/Crane Commission was putting the finishing touches to its report, the British government called Faisal to London for further talks. He was not fully briefed on the real motives behind the row between Britain and France and he was still actively pressing the Arab case for a unified territory overlapping the Great Powers’ mandate claims. Neither would he have known (although the British Government would probably have either known or assumed) that the King/Crane report would recommend that there be a US and not a French mandate over an enlarged Syria, with Faisal as constitutional monarch, and a British mandate over Iraq. Lloyd George advised him that British troops would be withdrawn from the area which Britain had proposed should become an Arab State and also from the area to which France laid mandate claims. Clemenceau believed, probably quite rightly, that Britain was using Faisal as a lever against France and refused to meet him or to discuss his proposal for a US-British-French conference on the Arab State until the end of November.^{12 13} He then consented to a territorial compromise which left almost everyone who was directly involved dissatisfied but which was designed to satisfy the League of Nations and avoid an outright Arab revolt.

France then returned to the conference table battle field with Britain on December 12. It demanded an equal share in the oil reserves of both Mesopotamia and Kurdistan, which overlapped the proposed borders of Turkey, Iraq and Persia, as compensation for giving up any claims to Mosul. Britain dug its toes in. After all it had spilled a lot of Indian and English blood to get its hands on Mosul and it wasn’t giving in that easily. About two weeks later, on December 29 (after a suitable break to celebrate the birthday of the Messiah) a new agreement was initialled under which France was to have a 25 percent share in the Turkish Petroleum Co. which would be the only company allowed to operate in the long-disputed area. There was at least one point on which the two powers were in complete agreement: the US, and especially Standard Oil, had to be kept out at all costs.

ARABS DIVIDE, REVOLT

The new year, 1920, was not a happy one in the Middle East. Faisal had been so manipulated and outmanoeuvred by both Zionist interests and the Great Powers which dropped any pretence of honouring obligations to the Arabs that he could not carry his people with him. On March 8 the Syrian Congress proclaimed the independence of an Arab State which included Palestine and also Lebanon with special provision for its autonomy. Iraq took similar action and proclaimed the Amir Abdullah, Faisal's elder brother, as king. Britain and France immediately called a meeting of the Supreme Allied Council at San Remo. To some people it was little more than an annoying diversion from the real problem of Germany's reparations and the muddle of Allied war debts to be refinanced via the US. The quicker it was out of the way the better. The Arabs simply had to be put in their place – under Europe's heel. Without even waiting for a peace treaty to be finalized with Turkey the council scrapped the idea of an independent Syrian Arab State altogether and awarded mandates over both Syria and Lebanon to France, and over Iraq and Palestine to Britain. It was not until August that year that Turkey formally renounced all claims to former Ottoman territories outside Turkey in the Treaty of Sevres which was hailed as formally concluding World War 1. The European Christian reconstruction of the Muslim Middle East was finally taking place.

Faisal refused to lead a war against France which was unwinnable; the French crushed the Syrian uprising; and Faisal, rejected by both sides, was expelled from the country which had called him to be its king. But just a year later he was back in favour in the Arab world and accepted the British-sponsored throne of Iraq. After the highhanded San Remo Conference the Iraqis rose in bloody revolt against Britain as the Syrians did against the French. Britain had to have peace if it was to be able to exploit the Mosul oil fields and by making swift concessions to Arab Nationalism it could achieve peace as long as it could isolate Iraq from the issue of Zionism just across the mandate border in Palestine. Having put down the revolt, Britain promptly agreed to a constitutional monarchy within the framework of the mandate, held a plebiscite and happily crowned Faisal on whom the choice of the people fell. It was his brother's turn to be out of a throne and he would have to wait a few years until Britain again needed to establish a constitutional monarchy as part of its policy of divide-and-rule to suppress either anti-Zionist movements or Arab reunification.

While those two rebellions against European colonial policy and Zionism were in progress Britain was having trouble of a different kind with Zionism in Palestine. The Zionist Commission had reached the arrogant stage at which the Vatican used its conduct and reports of atrocities against Christians in its attempts to have the Palestine mandate switched from Britain to France and to have the League of Nations squash the concept of a Jewish National Home altogether. But it had also caused such problems and tensions for the Occupied Enemy Territory Administration (O.E.T.A.) that Major General Sir Louis Bols recommended that the Commission be abolished. However the British Government's romance with Zionism – or the extent of its dependence on financial and political interests which supported Zionism – was such that its solution was to abolish not the Zionist Commission but the O.E.T.A. and to appoint Sir Herbert Samuel as High Commissioner in its place. He arrived to take up his post about the same time that Faisal arrived in Jerusalem as an exile from Damascus.

PERSIA ENDURES A PROTECTORATE

During 1919, while Britain and France argued over control of Arab territories, Britain was also busy strengthening its position by extending semi-colonial control over Persia. It had bribed its way to a secret protectorate agreement which would have given it virtually absolute control over Persia's oil and other resources.¹⁴ Early in May 1920 a team of British financial advisers led by Sydney Armitage Smith arrived in Teheran to oversee arrangements between the two governments and on May 8, almost as if it were a bit of side play to the Arab attempts to throw off the hated mandates, Britain paid the Russian Khoshtaria 100,000 pounds Sterling for the northern region oil concessions. It had succeeded in convincing both Persia and Russia that arrangements negotiated with imperial Russia were void. At least that episode was consistent with Britain's attitude to the Standard Oil concessions in Palestine. The government-controlled Anglo-Persian Oil Co. immediately established a subsidiary, North Persian Oil Co. Ltd., with an authorized capital of three million pounds Sterling.

Five days later the United States launched a blistering attack on Britain and France at the long-running Peace Conference in Versailles after learning of their secret negotiations over Mesopotamia and Mosul. The uprisings in Iraq against the mandate quickly swelled into full scale rebellion and Britain suffered 2,500 casualties between May and October. Intense anti-British feeling was generated in the US during June; the government officially pressed for an "open-door policy" on Middle East Oil; and Lloyd George was forced to withdraw his government's support for the agreement with France. In retaliation, France joined the US in trying to dismantle Britain's preferred position in Persia where the government had finally been forced to disclose the agreement with Britain and to seek ratification of it. In July the Persian government fell under the combined weight of several linked issues: US and French pressure; domestic opposition to the heartland of one of the world's former great empires becoming a resource vassal to a European power; and a British military withdrawal in the face of Russian forces when Soviet authorities decided they didn't like what Britain had done either.

It was only the first Persian government (and the first of a great string of Middle Eastern and other governments) to fall as a consequence of getting caught up in the Western World's oil intrigues – that is if we regard Turkey's troubles and the mandate manoeuvring as an integral part of the Great War rather than as the opening round of the oil wars.

The new Persian government refused to ratify the protectorate agreement and on August 12 the US State Department stepped up its campaign to break Britain's near monopoly on Middle East oil concessions. It advised the Persian Minister in New York that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey would be happy to consider a proposal to operate in Northern Persia and that other US-based companies might also seek such concessions. But in spite of considerable counter pressure, the Persian government signed the Armitage Smith Agreement with the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. on December 22. The D'Arcy Concession was modified and the government was to receive 16 percent of the net profits derived from local and overseas operations involving Persian oil, exclusive of transport operations. That little loophole introduced a new element into oil manipulation which was not blocked effectively for two generations. It is amazing how cheaply oil could be produced, processed and marketed but how expensive all stages of transport became! Transport subsidiaries were established by the oil majors; disproportionate profits were attributed to them; and profit payments to Persia and other countries which accepted similar agreements were squeezed to a minimum.

From Britain's point of view the year was closing on happier notes than those on which it had opened in other regions as well as in Persia. Dr Weizmann had become President of the World Zionist Organization and this had brought a very close working relationship between his organization and the British government. In Palestine Sir Herbert Samuel had gained the confidence of the Arab population and had established a system of local councils as well as an Advisory Council that was made up of four Muslims, three Christians and three Jews. But one of the appointments he made in 1921 was to prove troublesome. Following Britain's well established policy of moderating radical opponents of its colonial administrations by appointing them to positions of responsibility, he appointed a leading anti-Zionist, Haj Amin al Husseini, as Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. Husseini gradually became the focal point of resistance to Zionist expansion.

In 1921 another appointment was made on that basis which Britain may have regretted later also. King Faisal's brother Abdullah, who had been prevented by circumstances from occupying the throne that Iraq wanted to give him when they thought Faisal was set for the Syrian throne, was most upset when Faisal was expelled from Syria. He announced that he would personally drive the French out of Syria. He resigned his post as Foreign Minister for the Hejaz, began to gather an army and began the long march north along the Red Sea. Britain was not at all keen on Abdullah's plan and when he reached southern Palestine in January 1921 he was made welcome for a while. Then when Churchill visited Cairo in March for conferences with British and Arab officials the welcome was converted to recognition as ruler of the Transjordan region and it was not long before he had been persuaded to forget all about his northern mission. All that was required was a bit of financial help to establish a new state, assurances of British protection and the promise of a crown. In 1923 Britain confirmed its recognition of Abdullah's territory east of the Jordan as administratively separate from that west of the Jordan and exempted it from any Zionist settlement. In return Abdullah recognized Britain's mandatory authority. Five years later Britain and Transjordan exchanged formal agreements.

Several factors must have influenced Churchill's decision to recognize Abdullah. There were concurrent anti-British troubles in each of Palestine, Egypt, Syria, Iraq and Iran, coupled with anti-French trouble in Syria and Lebanon as well. His first task was to restore Britain's authority in Iraq but its political and commercial difficulties in Persia were not far behind. By deflecting trouble from France in Syria he would strengthen European authority overall and strengthen Britain's position in delicate negotiations with France. Recognition and support for Abdullah would help to reestablish confidence in Britain which had been totally undermined by its broken promises and its bias in favour of the Zionists. Abdullah, like Faisal, was known to be moderate in his attitude towards Zionism and well disposed towards Jews generally. If he were to control a region adjacent to the Zionist settlement there would be a buffer zone between the more radical Arab Nationalists and the Zionists. But an additional argument which found favour in some quarters was that the land available for Zionist settlement would be restricted; the total Jewish population in the region could therefore be restricted by appropriate migration policies and, as a consequence, tension and the probability of conflict between Jews and Arabs would be reduced. That argument has provided a source of contention ever since.

Only a couple of weeks before Churchill's Cairo visit, Persia had another quick change of government – by bloodless coup. Sayyid Zia edDin Tabatabai, a young political reformer, became Prime Minister and the Cossack colonel whose troops had put him there became Minister for War. The colonel was Reza Khan. Sayyid Zia tried to change the corrupt established order with great speed, clashed with powerful vested interests and, unable to retain the support of Reza Khan, departed in haste after only three months. Reza Khan, commander-in-chief as well as minister for war, took a firm grip as master of the revolution. He also took legal advice – in London – on the Armitage Smith agreement; found that it put Persia at a serious constitutional disadvantage; that Armitage Smith had exceeded his authority; and that by swift action he might be able to repudiate it and get Persia off the British hook.¹⁵ Soviet Russia agreed rather reluctantly to renounce all claims to territorial concessions which imperial Russia had gained in collaboration with Britain in 1907 and extracted a favorable commercial treaty in its place. On November 22 the Majlis declared the Khoshtaria concession which Anglo-Persian had bought from Russia to be invalid. It then granted Standard Oil of New Jersey a 50-year concession in the five northern provinces, bordering Soviet Russia, under which the government was to get 15 percent of gross earnings.

The US authorities and Standard Oil were being quick to seize opportunities from the mess which Britain had got itself into. In October/November, while they were negotiating with the Reza Khan government in Persia, they took advantage of the new circumstances in Iraq following Faisal's investiture as vassal-king in July 1921 and made another push to break Britain's grip on Mosul and the rest of the Mesopotamia oil basin. The State Department, in collaboration with Standard Oil of New Jersey and six other US companies, pressed for an equal and competitive opportunity with Britain and proposed arbitration to test and determine the rights of the Turkish Petroleum Company. Standard Oil withdrew its claims for separate concessions in Palestine in order to strengthen the US group case.

It was now patently clear to the British oil men and their government that they had lost the initiative and the most fruitful approach might be one of cooperation with US interests instead of confrontation. Discussions began with a view to burying the Anglo-American hatchets so that a joint approach could be taken to the Persian government, ('collusive' might be more accurate), and these brought a quick response. On February 28 1922, only three months after the Majlis had acted in favour of the US at Britain's expense, a counter proposal for a joint operation was put to the government. Standard Oil and Anglo-Persian Oil proposed to establish the Perso-American Petroleum Company to operate concessions that might otherwise be granted to one or the other company. The proposal was rejected. Subsequently the Majlis empowered the government to negotiate an alternative concession with any independent and responsible American company, on condition that a development loan of $US10,000,000 would be arranged for the Persian government.

GROWING US INTEREST FORCES ‘COOPERATION’

Britain’s Middle East oil strategy, around which its neo colonial policy of mandates, protectorates and the exclusion of American interests had been hung, was in tatters. The US was firmly entrenched in Iran and it enjoyed strong support in Syria and Lebanon where its prestigious American University in Beirut had largely influenced the Arab preference for links with the US rather than with France. But in addition, the Balfour Declaration had prompted a surge of interest in Zionism in the United States, (to the extent that the World Zionist Organization faced the tensions of a ‘European Wing’ and an ‘American Wing’) and the US was developing strong influence in Palestine as a result. There was therefore no acceptable alternative to the cooperative approach in Iraq as well, especially as Britain had been forced to repudiate its agreement with France already. On August 1, 1922, Britain, in collaboration with France, offered the US a 12 percent share in the Turkish Petroleum Co. for its group-of-seven but the US State Department declared it unacceptable. On August 26 the offer was raised to a 20 percent share with a plan for the subleasing of portions of the T.P.C. concessions. The State Department accepted that offer somewhat grudgingly.

But the competition for the spoils of the former Ottoman Empire was not over yet. The game still had a few more rounds to play, and none of the players had yet reckoned with Mustafa Kemal Pasha. Atatürk. The soldier who had been sent to Anatolia to oversee Turkish demobilization in accordance with the armistice had attracted massive support for a nationalistic reform and resistance movement whose membership drew heavily from among former members of the ousted wartime Ittihad government. Support for his movement had snowballed with the transfer of the port city of Smyrna to Greece under British-imposed Treaty of Sevres, and by the end of 1920 he had set up a provisional government in Ankara in opposition to the official government in Constantinople. His successful action to restrain further Greek settlement in September 1921, six months after Churchill’s Cairo conference, cemented his position. Then a year later his decisive victory over the Greeks put him in a position from which, politically, he could challenge British and French occupation of the dismembered Ottoman Empire. It recast the Allies’ thinking towards a “final” Turkish peace treaty. In particular, it raised the matter of one of the ugliest issues of the war. The Armenian genocide.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Beginning in 1914, and acting under the cover of war, the Turkish Ittihad government had organised and implemented a systematic program of murder, deportation and starvation in an attempt to exterminate Turkey’s Christian Armenian minority. The program resulted in the deaths of over one million Armenians. (see chapter 16, pp 40–46) In response to public outrage at the Turkish atrocities, the governments of Britain, France and Russia had in 1915 condemned the massacres, promising that Turkey's leaders would be held "personally responsible." Despite the failure at Versailles to adopt proposals which would have enabled the guilty to be punished under international law for 'crimes against humanity' the new Turkish Government, under pressure from Britain, France and the US, subjected hundreds of former Ittihadist accomplices to a series of trials under Turkish law throughout 1919 and 1920. Turkey was then forced under the Treaty of Sevres to agree to a number of specific terms that included the establishment of an independent Armenian State, compensation to Armenian survivors and tough punishment of war criminals.

But Ataturk's rise to power, with substantial support from members of the former Ittihadist government, had changed the equation. His nationalist movement was trenchantly opposed to Armenian independence, and even before the Treaty was signed fighting had broken out between Ataturk's forces and Armenian nationalists pushing for the establishment of their promised state. Under intense pressure from his growing movement, by the end of 1920 the Turkish government was forced to end the war crimes trials even as a new round of massacres commenced. By the time Ataturk had installed himself as the undisputed ruler of Turkey, it was clear to the Allies that they would have to change their tack if they wanted to get their hands on Mosul's oil.

In fact, the US government had long since sniffed the change in the political wind and set its sails accordingly. Among the first to see the implications of Ataturk's push for power was the American High Commissioner to Turkey, Retired Admiral Mark Bristol. The bigoted Bristol had no sympathy for the Armenian cause. "The Armenians", he wrote, "are a race like the Jews – they have little or no national spirit and poor moral character." The United States should abandon its support for an Armenian Republic, he argued. Instead it should strengthen its relations with emerging government of Ataturk, and enlist his support in gaining access to the oil fields of the former Ottoman Empire. The new Harding administration, with key links to the oil industry, agreed.¹⁶

A systematic effort to turn US public opinion in favour of Turkey was soon mounted. To assist the shift in policy, Bristol barred American newspaper reporters from travelling to areas where renewed massacres were taking place. When reports nevertheless continued to find their way into the American press, he wrote to the State Department to intervene with US publishers to change the tone of reporting to one less sympathetic to the Armenians. The response from the head of the State Department's Near East desk, Allen Dulles (later head of the CIA) was frank, if somewhat pessimistic: "Confidentially, the State Department is in a bind. Our task would be simple if the reports of the atrocities could be declared untrue or even exaggerated but the evidence, alas, is irrefutable...[T]he Secretary (sic) of State wants to avoid giving the impression that while the United States is willing to intervene actively to protect its commercial interests, it is not willing to move on behalf of the Christian minorities."¹⁷ Dulles needn't have worried. Throughout 1922 a range of public figures, some with connections to the US oil industry, were trotted out to announce to the American public that claims of Turkish atrocities were indeed ‘exaggerated’. At the same time the US discretely withdrew its previous promises of aid and protection for the proposed Armenian republic.¹⁸

Ataturk now had the competing powers on a string. Fearful that King Faisal may throw his weight behind Turkey’s claims on its former imperial territories, Britain made the Iraqi mandate sufficiently attractive for King Faisal to drop any ideas he may have had of supporting Turkey’s position. Strengthened by the US State Department’s acceptance of its Mosul oil plan in August, Britain negotiated a Treaty of Alliance with Iraq in October 1922 which was to stand for 20 years. Faisal gained a greater degree of autonomy but continued to recognize Britain’s mandatory authority.

Then on December 12, still fearful of the Iraq mandate being annulled by the eventual peace conference with Turkey and needing US backing to avoid such a result, Britain offered to increase the US share in the Turkish Petroleum Co. from 20 to 24 percent. The condition was that the US support the T.P.C.’s claims to the exclusion of all other interests, including those of Americans. Politicking was going on at a great pace. Britain’s fears were well-founded – the US State Department rejected the offer and Britain became more dependent on French support than she cared to be. For that reason, painfully conscious of the earlier agreement between them, Britain could issue little more than a sham protest when France occupied the Rhur a few weeks later. The real protesting was left to people like Hitler. Then it was Turkey’s turn to try to isolate Britain still further. On April 10 the National Assembly voted 141 to 16 in favour of accepting the American Chester group proposal which (like the joint British/Dutch/German proposal) had lain on the table since before the Great War. It involved both Turkish and Iraqi mandated territory.¹⁹ The matter may have rested there but for a bit of swift diplomatic footwork by Britain, which insisted that the province adjoining Constantinople on the Balkans side of the Bosphorus remain part of Turkey. When the Lausanne Conference finally determined a peace treaty with Turkey in July the Mosul decision went in favour of Britain, but only just. Mosul would remain under British-Iraqi control either for one year, during which there would be further negotiations, or until the matter was referred to the League of Nations.²⁰

ARMENIANS WERE EXPENDABLE

Ataturk had played his game well. In return for relinquishing all claims on the territories of the old Ottoman Empire, the Western governments agreed to new Turkish borders and officially recognised Attaturk’s government. In addition they abandoned any claims on behalf of Armenian state, and agreed to an end of war crimes trials and an unconditional amnesty for all Ittihadist members previously convicted of atrocities.²¹ For the Western powers it was a sell out on a grand scale, and the message sent by their shameful oil for blood deal was clear. It was a lesson learned by a young Adolf Hitler just starting on a political career in post-war Germany. In 1931 Hitler would comment that “the extermination of the Armenians” had led him to “the conclusion that masses of men are mere biological plasticine.”²² Eight years later, on the eve of Germany’s invasion of Poland, he would tell his generals, “I have sent to the east...my Death’s Head Units with the order to kill without pity or mercy...Only in such a way will we win the vital space we need. Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?"²³ His generals may well have asked themselves: "who, indeed?"

But Britain's interest was secure for the time being and the Churchillian approach to Faisal and Abdullah was beginning to pay off. However, only two months after Churchill's Cairo Conference in march 1921 the first major violence between Arab residents and Jewish immigrants had erupted at a hostel at Jaffa, just as Faisal was preparing for his new role in Iraq and just as Abdullah was settling down in Transjordan. About 100 deaths and 200 other casualties were shared equally between the two communities but Arab feelings were inflamed because it was police and other official forces who had been responsible for most of their casualties, and not the immigrants.

Neither had Churchill been able to find solutions to Egypt's complaints which were acceptable to both countries. With Ataturk mopping Armenians, Greeks and other Europeans out of Turkey, Britain had to grant a degree of independence to Egypt as well as Iraq. If it did not, the rising tides of Arab Nationalism would link up across the enthusiastic young Zionist enterprise – because of which Britain had artificially separated them – engulf Britain in a struggle it could not possibly cope with and sweep all British interests out of the Middle East. In a move born out of desperation the British government unilaterally declared Egypt to be independent in February 1922, except that it insisted on stationing forces there for the defence of the Suez Canal, the communications system and the Sudan. The Sultan was set up as Fuad I and constitutional government was established, but the new situation could hardly be described as 'peace'. There was three-way friction between Britain, the king and the constitutional government seldom far below the surface.

The policy of divide and rule had taken on another new dimension. Britain was committed to showing that a series of Arab communities which were interlocked by a common religious heritage and culture, and which were now linked even more closely through monarchies which it had set up to suit its own purposes, were separate oil-tight countries. In order to suppress both their anti-Zionism and the cohesive nationalism which was being further stimulated by it, Britain had to negotiate with each of them separately and on a different basis. It was adopting a deliberately divisive policy which was subsequently continued by the state of Israel and its principal ally, the United States.

Britain's policy was basically a defensive tactic aimed at achieving the most favourable result for Britain. It would make only those concessions which were necessary to satisfy the minimum individual demands of each of the Arab States which had either been recognized already or which were being set up on arbitrary boundaries which cut across real communities. However, in its effects Britain's policy was not then, nor was it after World War II, purely defensive. Throughout the period it involved an aggressive strategy to secure control of oil resources and trade routes in other people's territory. Its successors in the region have pursued the same strategy either for the same purposes or to support and impose the interests of the Zionist State of Israel.

BRITAIN'S BALFOUR DILEMMA BEGINS TO HURT

The dilemma which Britain faced in trying to discharge the conflicting commitments which it had made without having to forfeit strategic and material benefits which flowed from those conflicting commitments is shown by Churchill's White Paper of June 1922.²⁴ The reasoning given to justify Britain's actions (and for the complex administrative and political system which Sir Herbert Samuel was trying to make workable) ran around in circles and could be used by both the Zionist Organization and the Arab communities to support their demands.

On one hand Britain claimed that it had never intended Jews to have a state of their own or to assume the government of Palestine but that it wanted them to have somewhere to go to live and to be a focal point for the whole Jewish community. This meant that they could have prestige but they could have little more. Certainly they could not have a home for all of Europe's Jews, whether refugees or not, because their numbers were to be restricted to levels at which the Jewish and Arab communities together would be economically viable in a region of about one third of the area of that which had originally been envisaged. On the other hand it regarded Palestine as excluded from the area of Arab independence although the Arab community was still to govern it and its rights were not to be affected adversely in any way. But of course both groups existed for Britain's benefit. As a statement of colonial rationale or foreign policy it was about as cohesive and logical as another statement of colonial and foreign policy which was about to be written and which would be published three years later: Mein Kampf.

ABOLITION OF THE CALIPHATE

However by 1923 the British Government had reason to believe that it was managing to defuse the interfaith issue in Palestine through its conciliatory approach to domestic issues; through its role in settling the future of Turkey; and through the actions it had taken to placate Egyptian and Iraqi nationalism. But it had not reckoned with Ataturk. It was not really unhappy to see the dynamic Turkish leader dismantle the moribund Sultanate as he gained power in 1922 and it probably shared the joy of the United States at the establishment of a republic in September 1923 under the Treaty of Lausanne. Then in 1924 Ataturk secularized the state, withdrew recognition of Islam as the religion of the state and as the basis of its civil and legal codes, and abolished the Caliphate. Western observers gleefully predicted the imminent end of Islam as a force in world affairs. Their reasoning ran that without a paramount religious leader as a personal focal point, and with the last Islamic empire dismantled, Islam would disintegrate and Muslims, left without political leadership, would lose the tenacity of their faith. They would probably defect to Christianity en masse but even if they didn't the churches would have an open field for evangelism, there would be no reason for compromise and the future of Jerusalem would be simply a matter for Christian and Jewish discussion.

The first shock of Ataturk's decision certainly sent a tidal wave of dismay flooding across the Muslim world and it looked as if the Western observers might be correct. Muslims throughout the world were under Christian rule or suzerainty with the only significant exceptions, numerically, being in the Communist Soviet Union where all institutional religion was discouraged, and in republican Turkey which had just disowned Islamic law in favour of European law and which was substituting the Latin alphabet for Arabic.

But as the flood subsided many influential Muslims began to realize that it was taking with it, like flotsam and jetsam, relationships and traditions which had tended to inhibit thought and development and which had coupled with European Christian attitudes and colonial policies to become self-perpetuating. They began to reason that Muslims didn't need a paramount religious leader like the Roman pontiff as a dictator on moral issues or as a focal point for their faith. It didn't really matter if apostolic succession was broken, except to certain fragments of Islam such as the Shi'a, because it was the word of Allah transmitted through the Messiah and the prophet Muhammad which mattered and not the person momentarily leading the faithful. And besides that, Islam had its two focal points in Mecca and Jerusalem.

JERUSALEM OR MECCA?

Jerusalem! Perhaps the abolition of the caliphate was the signal for Muslims to turn back to Jerusalem from Mecca. There were a number of Muslim scholars and leaders who believed it to be so. Among them was the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al Husseini. His opposition to Zionism became stronger and his appeals for Jerusalem to be an open city administered on a genuinely multi-faith basis for people of all faiths, notably Muslims, became louder. Husseini's standing and influence had grown immensely in the few years since his appointment as Grand Mufti, especially after the Jaffa riots of 1921 when the British authorities tried to placate the Arab Palestinians by establishing a Supreme Muslim Council with him as president. With the abolition of the Caliphate they deemed it necessary to make further concessions in an effort to defuse the impact of his new appeal. It is reasonable to believe that they were also made in an effort to reduce both his personal authority and that of his office. His religious zeal was misrepresented as a matter of local politics and as a camouflage for a push for personal power. The base of Arab involvement in the city's administration was broadened by enlarging the local council without changing the balance of interfaith power.²⁵

But there was a strange assortment of people other than the Zionists who did not want to see Muslim attention focussed on Jerusalem. It included people of all three faiths, each with their own assortment of reasons and, because of the quite fantastic position which successive British governments had got themselves into as a consequence of their imperial greed, Britain was happy to respond to them all.

Three months after the outbreak of the Great War, as an early shot in the insidious, unscrupulous campaign to poison relations between the Arabs and the Turks and to manipulate the Muslim world community, Field Marshall Lord Kitchener²⁶ had written a letter to the Sharif of Mecca which must rank among history's foulest pieces of religious intrigue and characterizes the general Christian misunderstanding of both Islam and Christianity itself. He wrote that until then Britain had defended and befriended Islam in the person of the Turks but that henceforward it would be that of the noble Arab. "It may be (he wrote) that an Arab of true race will assume the Khalifate at Mecca or Medina, and so good may come from the help of God out of all the evil which is now occurring."^{27 28} Naturally enough the Sharif, recognized by Britain as King Hussein of the Hejas with his base at Mecca and with two of his sons in similar roles in Iraq and Transjordan, was quick to claim the title of Caliph when the Turkish Caliphate was abolished. He was very unpopular with Britain because of his strong anti-Zionism coupled with contempt for Britain's failure to honour its undertaking to support a unified Arab nation but his claim had to be recognized even though it strengthened his personal authority and the anti Zionist cause. Britain would have been universally damned by the Kitchener letter if it had not recognized him, and at least the spotlight moved to Mecca and away from Jerusalem.

But Hussein's immediate neighbour a few hundred miles away in Central Arabia, Ibn Saud, was not at all impressed by the idea. He was the leader of the puritanical Muslim reform group, the Wahhabis, whose fanaticism had helped restore religious fervour to Mecca during the previous three or four generations and he was not eager to be encircled and then eliminated by Hussein's family. Nor was he keen to recognize a British sponsored usurper as Caliph when one of his own tribes had led one of the religious reform movements which had cleaned up much of the religious dry rot which the old ecclesiastical order had been associated with. When the British authorities learned of his plans to "absorb" the kingdom of the Hejas they were caught in another jam. They had a treaty with both dynasties and they were happy to contemplate the Middle East without Hussein but if they supported Ibn Saud they would invite further uprisings in Iraq and Transjordan. Officially they discouraged him and went as far as cutting off a "subsidy" of Sterling 5,000 pounds per month which had been paid as part of the 1915 protectorate agreement to gain his support against Turkey – or at least to keep him friendly.²⁹ However when Ibn Saud turned his fanatical religious troops (the Ikhwan) against Mecca in 1924 they turned a blind eye and stepped up support for both Faisal and Abdullah to avoid further eruptions in Iraq and Transjordan.

In fact Britain was having to walk another of its homemade tightropes and it was running out of balancing options. One of its stated reasons for discouraging his adventure was that if the battle went against him, Britain did not have the forces in the region to support him. That was in reality an admission that it could not stop him and that in any event it could not involve its forces in Iraq, Palestine or Egypt. Its relations with Turkey and its oil interests in Iran, Mesopotamia and, by then, in Arabia as well had become so complicated that it could not afford to intervene in Arabia either for or against Ibn Saud for fear of triggering a chain reaction. Britain tried to placate both Abdullah and Faisal and to appear to be innocent of complicity with

Ibn Saud who obligingly cabled London that his Ikhwan had invaded Mecca against his orders.³⁰ Britain was still in the middle of delicate negotiations to get its Iraqi treaty ratified and it only achieved that by subterfuge on the night of June 10, 1925.³¹

If Britain had fallen out with Ibn Saud it could have faced a crisis in its efforts to impose exclusive control of the vital Persian Gulf with its access to both the Persian and the Mesopotamian oil fields. Britain therefore had to maintain its position in Arabia irrespective of any other considerations. But if it had tried to prevent Ibn Saud's expansion by military intervention it is almost certain that its action would also have inflamed Arab feeling even more in Iraq, Palestine and Egypt as well. The entire region would have been at risk including both the Mesopotamian oil region and the Suez Canal. But in addition there was also Britain's resources agreement with Ibn Saud which it did not want to lose to any other power which was already friendly with him or which might choose to become more friendly.

PILGRIMAGE FEES OFFSET LACK OF PROMISED OIL INCOME

One aspect of Ibn Saud's protectorate agreement with Britain in 1915 which received little publicity was that he had agreed not to grant any oil exploration rights without Britain's agreement. In the years following the Great War he was naturally eager to capitalize on oil exploration rights and, if possible, to generate royalties similar to those which the Persian government was enjoying. However the government-controlled Anglo-Persian Oil Co. was happy with its level of production, (two and a half million barrels in 1921–22), and, being doubtful of prospects on the other side of the gulf, it did not want to spend money on exploration. Based on the company's advice to him the British High Commissioner actively discouraged Ibn Saud from granting any concessions. He also discouraged potential explorers on the grounds that Britain could not provide protection. In spite of that, in May 1923 a New Zealander, Major Frank Holmes, sought and was granted a concession over 36,000 square miles of eastern Arabia for an annual rental of a mere 2,000 pounds Sterling. He was in his second unsuccessful year of exploration when Ibn Saud swooped on Mecca and eliminated Hussein's very temporary universal Caliphate and his short-lived Hashemite Kingdom of the Hejas as well.

Even though he was virtually the spiritual leader as well as the political leader of the Wahhabis, Ibn Saud was much too astute to claim the Caliphate himself. It lapsed. But that was not the end of the episode. Ibn Saud had a greatly increased area and population over which he had to establish his authority. To do that he had to provide for both economic development and political security. That took greatly increased funds as well as great diplomacy to secure the allegiance of tribes whose allegiance had either been with the Hashemites, the Rashids to the north, or the Turks whose empire was re-emerging as a dynamic republic. In a sense he needed a continuing alliance with Britain as much as Britain needed one with him.

Neither Britain's investors nor its authorities would provide increased funds through exploration royalties or grants in view of the chaotic state of Europe's finances. However Ibn Saud's control of Mecca now promised a couple of real advantages for Britain. It therefore reversed the policy of opposition to increased revenue generation through pilgrimages to Mecca which it had maintained while Hussein was in control. This relieved the pressure from Ibn Saud for alternative financial support, elevated Mecca as the focal point for Islam, eased the spotlight away from Jerusalem, helped to further undermine the Grand Mufti's authority and influence, and helped to defuse the issue of Zionism. It also tied the fervently puritanical and evangelical Ibn Saud even more tightly to Islam and for the second time in only a few generations a Wahhabi reformation swept through Jeddah and Mecca and on across the Muslim world. At the same time Ibn Saud took full advantage of Muslim acceptance of polygamy to forge links with tribes not previously owing allegiance to him. Of course to avoid antagonizing tribes already allied to him he also had to seek wives from them. It has been said that within a few years he had married at least 135 virgins and possibly a hundred additional wives.³² His dozens of sons and daughters multiplied so that in recent years the scale and activities of the royal family has provided ample opportunity for attacks by those wishing to denigrate either the Saudi Arabian monarchy or Islam.

Ibn Saud's romantic and easily misrepresented programme to unify the whole of Arabia through marriage – unusual only because of its staggering scale – coincided with the development of several conflicting streams of moral and ethical behaviour in the Christian West which have already been discussed. They included the frightening net of eugenics-based race control programmes and the sanctimonious, inhibiting, frustrating and destructive programmes which were unleashed by Casti Connubii. But they also included the rising tide of sexual permissiveness and promiscuity which has been described as both a trigger for, and a consequence of, Casti Connubii. Now, in the third generation since those developments, they serve to highlight differences in ethical interpretation and practices between the partners in the troubled triangle.

But in 1924 Britain showed little interest in the long-term effects of the policies it was pursuing in the Middle East and even less understanding of them. Its deeply ingrained self understanding as one of the dominant Christian, Western nations strongly discouraged both interest and understanding and so the politicking went on apace. British diplomats skillfully led Ibn Saud, Abdullah and Faisal to agreement on boundaries between their three territories and then, in 1927, Britain formally recognized Ibn Saud as an independent monarch as part of the deal.

In the region under its control France had been following much the same policy as Britain in an equally divisive and sterile manner. Its motive was to avoid a flow on of nationalistic subversion in its enormously important North African territories. It seems to have overreacted to the anti French component in Britain's manoeuvring which suggests that Britain was very successful in concealing both her motives and the extremely fragile position into which she had blundered. France seems to have even seen Britain's cordial relations with Faisal and Abdullah in that light rather than as absolute political necessities. It set about fragmenting the area of its mandate both politically and administratively. It tried to suppress communities hostile to it by isolating them and by making access to the coast more difficult, and it grasped the reality of Arab nationalism only slowly.

TWO CAN PLAY 'DIVIDE'N'RULE'

France was, like Britain, preoccupied with events in Europe. It was struggling with the financial crisis over German reparations and the political crisis over its seizure of the Ruhr. Its programme of divide-and-rule in the Middle East resembled Britain's nineteenth century activities in India even more closely than its concurrent activities in neighbouring regions. When it was faced with a rash of revolts connected with the crisis in Asia Minor in 1924 it took what appeared to be an easy way out. It doubled the size of Lebanon at Syria's expense to "balance" the numbers of Christians and Muslims; it imposed a constitution and electoral system based on religious division, and then it proclaimed the enlarged Lebanon a republic in 1926.³³ The consequences of those moves began to show within a few years with a revolt by the Druze, but they multiplied with World War II so that a new constitution was hastily drawn up in 1943. They then burst Lebanon apart only a few years later in the wake of the partition of Palestine to establish the state of Israel.

Naturally very few people other than the Arabic speaking peoples have thought of the Middle East as a unified region, albeit complex, since the mandate fiasco of the 1920s. Everyone outside of ruling circles has been encouraged to see it as a series of pocket handkerchief European (or at least Western) possessions which had previously suffered neglect and under-development because of their one common factor: an "inferior" religion and a "barbaric" system of ethics. They were all supposed to be of low productivity and of very little strategic importance except for Egypt and Palestine which could not be kept out of the limelight. But to informed observers visiting the region in the late 1920s its importance, its political turmoil and its religious tension and dissent were all very real.

Such was the situation when delegates to the International Missionary Conference trudged up the Mount of Olives in 1928. It has been of great consequence that most of their colleagues back home failed to understand it and refused to heed their message. If that conference had been accorded more credibility instead of being denigrated on both sides of the Reformation fence the tenor of subsequent events could quite conceivably have been different. Diverse European interests, both Christian and Jewish, were hell-bent on pursuing their own economic, political and sectarian interests without regard for the increased tension and conflict being generated in the triangle of faiths and irrespective of the consequences for other people.

BRITAIN: STUCK FAST AT THE CENTRE OF THE TRIANGLE

Britain, which was clinging to the role of standard bearer for the Christian West which it had assumed during the European Colonial era, was preoccupied with economic problems which degenerated into deep economic depression after the Wall Street collapse of October 24, 1929.

It was Britain's actions in bringing the three faiths into direct confrontation in Jerusalem during its Great War manipulation which had actually set the irreversible scene in which a thorough rethink of the Messianic message can no longer be avoided. But the people of the entire amorphous Christian gel were unwittingly condemning themselves and the rest of the world to another two generations or so of deepening crisis until they came face to face with the even greater catastrophe of World War II and the extensive degradation of their own society: all because of their inability or their refusal to recognize the nature of the challenge.

As with each of the previous challenges to the church's self-understanding and theology which had been rejected, the crisis would have reverted to manageable proportions if the challenge had been recognized and acted on. But because humanity has not been programmed to produce a fixed response to a particular mental stimulus and because its members are permitted, by the Grace of God, to make their own decisions – whether responsible or irresponsible – they have to accept the consequences of whatever decisions they choose to make. So the plot thickened. The years from 1928 to 1933 (when Hitler gained the authority to put his parody of the amorphous Christian gel into effect) provided an opportunity to either put out the fires which were blazing around the world or to stoke them up. By their decisions and their actions the controllers of the amorphous gel stoked them up. Perhaps it was done unwittingly. Perhaps it was done knowingly and arrogantly on the basis that they, or their successors, controllers of the destiny of humanity on behalf of God, would never lose control of the long term situation and that they would therefore be able to put out the fires in due course.

The interdependence of countries in which major financiers, resource extractors and industrial employers had either complementary or competing interests had been well established by the time of Napoleon's sweep across Europe. By the time of the Crimean war the governments of every country in which the Rothschild family held investments was forced to recognize it and by the time of Bismarck's confrontation with the House of Rothschild after the Franco/Prussian war it had become an important factor in both domestic and foreign policy. Then the relationships between Cecil Rhodes, the Rothschilds and the Round Table highlighted that dimension in international affairs. But during those four or five generations the world's population, the level of industrial activity, and the number of major investment institutions had each mushroomed so that when Wall Street crashed no country involved in the Western World's trade could avoid being affected.^{34 35}

Britain, as political master of most of the Middle East, was faced with a multitude of conflicting interests. Its successive governments had to try to prevent the hungry American eagle from nesting among the choice pickings. At the same time they had to maintain good diplomatic and commercial relations with the countries of Europe and a strong naval presence in the Mediterranean to preserve what was left of Britain's preferential position. They sought to take advantage of Germany as a buffer against Communist influence and for a decade or so that appeared to be a successful strategy. But once Hitler came to power it became a much more delicate task to use Germany as a buffer because, although they readily identified with his domestic economic policies, they were, out of sheer self interest, in conflict with some aspects of his social and foreign policies. And they had got into such a frightful mess that they could neither support nor reject his racial and religious policies so they stayed silent. They became unsure in their attitudes, policies, strategies and everyday decisions in both Eastern Europe and the Middle East. Anti-Semitism increased to unprecedented heights in Europe as Hitler raved and ranted against “the Jewish materialistic spirit.” In fact his ‘anti-ism’ was misplaced and what he was really attacking was Western Christian materialism.

With the advantage of hindsight we can now see that at the time of the Wall Street crash, although Hitler was not yet in power, his parody was already beginning to come into play but, naturally, the Christian West didn’t recognize the parody and applauded that part of his performance which it could identify with. British governments, unable to counter Hitler’s public stance, launched one enquiry after another into affairs in Palestine in order to stabilize the region. They sought to camouflage Britain’s sheer political and religious hypocrisy and dishonesty during the Great War which had become enshrined in the Balfour Declaration by continuing to support two clearly defined and competing commitments. One involved Zionism and Jewish rights in Palestine. Britain had to continue to support this commitment in order to secure the economic and political support of the Jewish community which had become important if imperial stability was to be sustainable. The other was the political, religious and land rights of the Arab populations of the Middle East. Britain also had to continue to support this commitment in order to retain access to the petroleum supplies within the Arab territories and to retain secure access to both the trade of its dominions and colonies, and defence-sensitive facilities and regions (notably Suez, the Persian Gulf and Singapore) which had become vital to imperial stability. As the crisis which developed from these two commitments became more acute the British Government became aware of two realities. The first reality was that without massive military and naval capacity to enable it to enforce its decisions, the two commitments were incompatible. Britain did not have, nor could it afford, the massive military and naval capacity which would become necessary to secure its position if a major war broke out and it had to rely entirely on its own goodwill and resources. The second reality was that maintenance of stability in the Middle East had become the single most critical factor in the maintenance of Britain’s imperial power. Britain could not simply walk away and leave the Jews and the Arabs to resolve the crisis which it had generated. If it did so it would lose everything on both sides of the basic equation. It therefore had to stay and endeavour to stabilize the region with whatever goodwill and resources it could muster.

ZIONIST-ARAB CLASHES INCREASE

It was the Arab population which had suffered most in the confusion resulting from the Balfour Declaration, especially as the distinction between “Arab” and “Muslim” became blurred in many public statements. Christian Arabs were often conveniently made to appear to be a curiosity minority but the facts, as far as Jerusalem was concerned, did not justify it and the churches continued to press for their rights.^{36 37 38} The supposition that “Arab” meant “Muslim” was cleverly and conveniently exploited by Zionist groups when serious clashes occurred between Jews (including Palestinian Jews who had never left Palestine) and Palestinian Muslims in 1928 and 1929.

Both communities – Jewish and Arab – took advantage of every incident they could to apply pressure on the British administration, to make it appear to be favouring the other community, and to manipulate it into making rulings in their favor to offset the perceived advantage which the other was enjoying. The importance of an incident involving a prayer screen used by the Jewish community at the Wailing Wall was exaggerated by the Arabs and when ugly brawls resulted in September 1928 the Grand Mufti aggravated the situation by enlarging his house above the wall, by insisting on changed arrangements for access to the wall and by adding additional calls to worship at the adjacent mosques which became a distraction from worship for the Jews. The bitterness had not subsided in July 1929 when a new constitution was approved for the Jewish Agency by the Sixteenth Zionist Congress. It formalized both the inclusion of non-Zionist Jewish representatives as well as Zionists, and its role as a fund raising and development agency for Jewish activities in Palestine. While that may have suggested some moderation in Jewish attitudes to Palestine it had the effect of increasing Jewish support for the work in Palestine, especially in the United States, and there was no real moderation. When it was established without a formal constitution in 1923 the Agency had been, in effect, the Zionist Organization wearing another hat even though only half the members of its executive were Zionists and half were non-Zionists. Since then Zionists had tightened their numerical grip so that eventually there were 17 Zionists out of 20 members and no non-Zionists were elected after 1937.

At that Sixteenth Congress meeting the leader of the Revisionist group, Vladimir Jabotinsky, was insistent that a National Home could only mean a state with a Jewish majority in which the life of the community would be directed by Jews, and that ‘Palestine’ referred to territory on both sides of the Jordan. He was opposed to Weizmann’s policy of cooperation with Britain. He demanded that Britain open up all of Palestine to Jewish settlement, and he called for Jews to repudiate the White Paper of 1922 and cease a policy of appeasement towards the Arabs until a Jewish majority had been achieved. In mid August, shortly after delegates returned from that Congress meeting, Arab fears were reinforced by a demonstration at which Jews demanded ownership of the Wailing Wall which the Arabs understood to be a claim to the Temple Mount and the mosques as well. A few days later the murder of a Jewish boy led to further demonstrations and, in turn, widespread attacks on Jews in Jerusalem and four other centres. Unable to quell the violence, the security forces called for reinforcements from Egypt and Malta, but before they arrived 133 Jews had been killed by Arabs and 116 Arabs had been killed – all except six of them by soldiers and police.^{39 40} From that point on, any reputation for even handedness which the British security forces may have tried to maintain was totally destroyed in the eyes of the Arabs and, for the first time, the Arabs unleashed their hatred not only against the Zionists but also against the old-established Jewish religious groups which had little sympathy for the Zionists and with whom they had maintained peaceful relations up to that point.

A WHITE PAPER CRISIS

Early in June 1929, barely two months before that crisis in Palestine, Ramsay MacDonald's second Labour minority government took office in place of Baldwin's Conservative government and the new Secretary for Colonial and Dominion Affairs, Fabian Socialist peer Sidney Webb, (Lord Passfield) ordered a detailed review of the situation in Palestine by a British Commission. Passfield followed the Commission's report with another White Paper, published in October 1930. It proposed restrictions on Jewish immigration and on land sales to Jews in order to protect the rights of the Palestinian people. Dr Weizmann immediately resigned as president of the World Zionist Organization in protest. When it was debated in the House of Commons in mid November the White Paper was trenchantly criticized by members of former governments, then in opposition, who echoed the Zionist view that it contradicted the British mandate and the spirit of the Balfour Declaration.

In the meantime a substantial group of Jewish scholars, working within a group called Brith Shalom, sought to reduce the likelihood of further violence by redirecting Zionist ideology towards a bi-national Arab-Jewish state and away from an ultimately exclusivist Jewish State. Its members included prominent academics such as the founding Chancellor of the Hebrew University, Reform Rabbi Judah Magnes, two professors at that university, Hugo Bergmann and Gershom Scholem, and the editor of a scholarly magazine, Robert Weltsch. Its spiritual leader was the Viennese-born philosopher Martin Buber who was teaching in Germany and braved the storm there until 1938 when the Nazis drove him from his post as national director of Jewish adult education. After World War One Buber had urged the Jewish community to lay the foundation of a true brotherhood with the Arabs and not to see themselves as emissaries of the West which he concluded was doomed to destruction.⁴¹ He also placed great importance on Christian-Jewish dialogue and pressed the Jews to recognize the reality of Christianity as a path to God, coupled with the demand that Christianity similarly acknowledge Judaism as an authentic path to god.⁴² (Remarkably similar to the reasoning of Karl Barth.) However Brith Shalom failed to develop any real political muscle, it had little impact among the Jewish settlers of Palestine, it therefore could not generate a favourable reaction from the Arab community, and its most prominent publicity appears to have resulted from attacks on the views of its leaders by Zionist leaders in the United States.⁴³

Any impact which it may have hoped to achieve was overshadowed by an even greater crisis than that in Palestine which overtook the British government following the Wall Street stock market collapse on October 24, 1929, exactly two months after the crisis in Palestine reached its new peak. The great depression was worsening every day and with a desperate need to secure employment, to generate investment and to prevent an outflow of capital, it was the British Government's turn to suffer an attack of the Bismarck jitters. It appeared more prudent from the point of view of both politics and economics to respond to the Zionist cause and to hold the Arabs in subjection by a military presence. Economic interest again took precedence over religious belief (or heritage) and interfaith relations. Therefore, on February 13, 1931, three months after the Commons' debate, Prime Minister MacDonald wrote to Dr Weizmann with a partial retraction of the White Paper. In view of the Prime Minister's assurances that the terms of the mandate would be adhered to and his very gymnastic interpretation of the meaning of some sections of the White Paper, Dr Weizmann resumed his former policy of cooperation with the British government. But bitterness was welling up relentlessly on all sides.

Arabs of all persuasions attacked the "black letter" and for the first time their wrath was let loose on British authorities in Palestine as well as on Zionist oriented Jewish communities and the older non-Zionist communities associated with them. When the Seventeenth Zionist Congress was held in Switzerland in July 1931 to elect a successor to Dr Weizmann another split developed. Although the majority of delegates supported his policy of cooperation with Britain the Revisionist wing again demanded that the aim of Zionism be redefined to include the establishment of a Jewish state with a Jewish majority. In a bitter outburst which ultimately led the Revisionists to break from the World Zionist Organization (in 1935) and to establish a separate organization, Jabotinsky tore up his delegate's card, saying "This is no Zionist Congress!" Weizmann refused to withdraw his resignation and Sokolow was elected president.

It was then the turn of Zionist propagandists and sympathizers to take advantage of the Muslim population for their own ends as the Christian powers had during the Great War. They began to play up Arab attacks on British authorities and to misrepresent it as Muslim hatred of Christians. They were very successful, largely because they were simply adding a bit of impetus to what churches had been doing and saying for a very long time, and the myth gradually drifted towards fact. Certainly their activities made it easier for the British Government to align itself with Zionism rather than with Arab interests in Palestine. A vicious circle had been set in motion in the middle of the triangle.

When an international Muslim Conference was held in Jerusalem at the end of 1931 it was portrayed by Zionist groups as a political meeting arranged to scheme against Britain, Christians and Jews, and to assume control of Palestine. In fact that conference, attended by 145 delegates from around the world, was the Islamic counterpart of the 1923 Christian Missionary Conference. The spotlight was again on Jerusalem as the focal point of all three partners in the triangle and it is of immense significance that Muslim theologians and leaders also chose Jerusalem as the venue for their conference. Because of the double demolition of the Caliphate they were meeting in much the same atmosphere of crisis as the Christian missionaries had. They were also meeting with the same incentive and urgency in their search for renewal and reformation. And in addition their reasons for choosing Jerusalem in preference to Mecca, Istanbul, Cairo or any other seat of Muslim administration or learning were essentially the same as the Christians' reasons for bypassing Rome, Constantinople (Istanbul), Canterbury and the other seats of Christianity in Europe.

Cairo, in particular, could have pressed quite strong claims to the honour of hosting the conference. Its position as a seat of Muslim scholarship had strengthened gradually during the previous two generations with two streams of thought developing together, even if in conflict to some extent. Those streams illustrate an interesting parallel between Islam in the twentieth century and Christianity when it was confronted by Darwin.

Muhammad Abduh, teaching at Al-Azhar University, led those who believed that faith and reason were compatible and that they both contributed towards the advancement of true religion coupled with the development of a well ordered society. He saw Islam as a call to man to use his reason to investigate the world of nature since the totality of nature, of which humanity is a part, is God's creation. His teaching encouraged the rejection of medieval religious authority along with the modernization of the Muslim Middle East. However the fact of religious renewal had tended to enhance the role of religious teachers and leaders at the same time that the Qur'an and the Sunna were being elevated above the authority of long-standing Islamic tradition. This was a consequence of the integration of religion and government remaining undisturbed in much of Islamic society.

After the drawn-out demolition of the Caliphate, in a continuation of the cycle of action and reaction, Al-Azhar became more and more the centre of scholarship for the Muslim world community. But it was definitely a centre of scholarship and leadership as opposed to a focus of faith and a centre for pilgrimage. This was especially so from 1928 when Ataturk's Assembly deleted all reference to Islam as the State religion from the Turkish constitution. A new political movement developed at alAzhar with the broad aim of ensuring that such a break between state and religion did not take place elsewhere. Islam began to assume a new and militant dimension. Before long the Muslim Brotherhood was also established. Its aim was to eliminate Western influence from Muslim communities and it was difficult for anyone to distinguish between "Western influence" and "Christianity." The church and the Western powers had spent so much time and effort in persuading each other and the world that such was the case, how could they expect anyone to suddenly believe otherwise?

CHANGES PLACE GRAND MUFTI IN KEY ROLE

In the circumstances it was natural that the Grand Mufti's influence was further enhanced when the 1931 International Muslim Conference was held in Jerusalem.⁴⁵ He became a dominant figure in the whole Arab Nationalism movement and under the pressure of those circumstances and the attitudes around him his tolerance of things and people non-Muslim began to falter. It is hardly surprising that he saw the Infidel Jew as being in league with the Infidel Christian government.

But as was the case when King Hussein claimed the Caliphate in 1924, the Grand Mufti's rise to pre-eminence in the Muslim community posed another threat to one of his near neighbours, Ibn Saud. It was a different kind of threat but it was no less real. Ibn Saud did not fear political or military encirclement as he had when he was faced with Britain's trio of Hashemite kingdoms.⁴⁶ He feared economic problems and a consequent internal political challenge if Mecca was supplanted by Jerusalem as the focal point of Muslim pilgrimage.

The Great Depression had not bypassed the Middle East. Investment money was scarce, so were royalties from concessions, and Ibn Saud had cancelled Major Holmes' concession in 1928 because he had earlier defaulted on payments. Money for travel was also very scarce. Fees and general income from pilgrimages to Mecca slumped sharply. Ibn Saud and his Meccan subjects were soon in financial trouble in much the same way as the papacy and the innkeepers of Rome when the pope's Holy Year failed in 1450. Anyone or anything which shifted the spotlight from Mecca to Jerusalem encouraged a further drop in pilgrimages to Mecca and was to be discouraged. This was therefore a significant factor in Ibn Saud's quite remarkable tolerance towards Zionism and Jewish claims to Jerusalem. And when he assumed the title King of a unified Saudi Arabia shortly after the Muslim Conference in Jerusalem it was Britain's turn to show equally remarkable tolerance, especially in view of the split between the Revisionists and the World Zionist Organization over the matter of relations with Britain only a few months earlier.

However the increased prestige from his being both spiritual and temporal ruler over most of the Arabian Peninsula did not stop the decline in pilgrimage income. During 1932 the country's financial position became desperate and the government was unable to meet its commitments.⁴⁷ Ibn Saud turned to his chief confidant, the British geologist, diplomat and explorer H.St.J. Philby, for urgent assistance in raising additional income by means of oil concessions. The prospects for the discovery of oil in Saudi Arabia had improved dramatically with the discovery of oil in neighbouring Bahrain at the end of May that year. But Ibn Saud could not have known that he and his country were about to become locked into some of the most unsavoury episodes in resource exploitation history.

At that time very few people knew of a couple of sweetheart agreements which had been made between Western oil companies during the previous couple of years. Certainly the last people intended to know anything about them were the governments of countries in which there was any prospect of those companies finding oil. And at the core of the matter had been Britain's efforts to gain control of the oil resources of Mesopotamia and adjacent areas which figured so centrally – but out of public gaze – in the lead up to, the conduct of, and the aftermath of the Great War.

Britain had recognized Soviet Russia in February 1924, some years ahead of its European neighbours and the United States. In view of the fantastic relationships between the Western powers and Soviet Russia at the time, there can be no reasonable doubt that a major factor in Britain's early recognition was the need to avoid Russian intervention on the side of Ataturk (with whom diplomatic links had also been established). The Allies and the USA had been struggling to sort out their financial and political relationships with each other and with Germany. Among the arrangements made were that France's national oil company, (specially spawned for the purpose), took Germany's interest in the Turkish Petroleum Company, and Britain surrendered some of its interest in that company to the USA and some degree of self-government to Iraq. At the same time Soviet Russia played one Western oil company against another while doing all it could to negate Western interference in its affairs, Standard Oil and BP battled into a price fiasco in India, and a world oil glut developed.⁴⁸

RED LINE: ARAB INTERESTS UNDERCUT

Against that background Standard Oil (later Exxon) reached a patent agreement in 1926 with Germany's I.C.Farben.⁴⁹ A year later, in October 1927, the Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC, the new name for the Turkish Petroleum Company) made a fabulous oil strike. It must have seemed to Iraq that fifteen years of trauma, including the Great War, was a moderate price to pay for the benefits of the Christian reconstruction of the region. Industrial development was assured (for those who controlled the oil supplies anyway), along with material prosperity on an unprecedented scale and almost unquestionable military superiority. The collaborating governments, and the companies which used and sheltered behind them, only had to stabilize the region, the flow of oil around the world, and the competition between them. Eight months later, in July 1928, the members of the IPC met in Belgium for that purpose and adopted the Red Line Agreement. They agreed that no party to the agreement would seek an oil concession, other than through the IPC, in Turkey, the mandated territories of Iraq, Syria, Palestine and Jordan, and the entire Arabian Peninsula except the Sheikdom of Kuwait.⁵⁰ The resources of those countries were to be the possessions and the playthings of the Christian Western World in no less a sense than the resources of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Government authorities and the major oil companies of three European powers and the USA were involved in the agreement.

But the agreement wasn't tight enough. A few weeks later the same group met again, with a few extras, in Scotland. They set up a "Pool Association" under the Achnacarry Agreement and divided the world into marketing regions. They agreed to maintain the existing volume relationship between each other; to maintain world prices based on prices for oil shipped from the USA's Gulf region; to restrict any production increase to the level required to meet actual demand; and to avoid any additional countries entering the oil market.^{51 52}

This means that only a few months after the International Missionary Conference in Jerusalem some of the capitalists who were pouring vast amounts of money into competing missionary enterprises in Asia and Africa had reached an agreement which was discriminatory, contrary to the economic and political principles which they claimed to espouse, against the interests of people in countries where their Christianizing money was being spent, and which was morally insupportable. It is no wonder they sought to keep it secret. It was another infamous link in the chain which the Protestant Work Ethic had helped to forge; which had conveniently propped up British and European capitalism in its fledgling form after the French Revolution; which had been the trigger for the studies and writings of Karl Marx; and which had been developed into the American Protestant business ethic after the American Civil War. South of the Caucasus the “mighty army” of Christian “soldiers” were wildly flaying their fellow man with that chain for their personal advantage. North of the Caucasus the disciples of Marx were trying to beat it into plough shares to benefit mankind. Unfortunately they had lost sight of the pattern and a few swords were coming out of the forge as well, as we shall see shortly.

By March 1929, in a move designed to implement the Achnacarry Agreement, the American Petroleum Institute adopted a plan to cut US oil production to 1928 levels. It tried to camouflage profiteering behind a propaganda front of resource conservation. When the US Federal Government vetoed the plan the companies and the state governments with which they collaborated found simple ways to circumvent the veto.⁵³

Then came the Wall Street crash. With industrial productivity and consumer demand cut to ribbons the problems of petroleum oversupply became even more acute and from the point of view of the companies which were party to the Red Line Agreement and the Achnacarry Agreement it was certainly no time for further oil discoveries, and exploration, both in the USA and elsewhere, was definitely discouraged. So when a Texas wildcat well flowed 7,000 barrels a day in October 1930, and triggered an uncontrolled rush with irresponsible drilling that made Titusville seem like a Sunday School picnic, most of the oilmen were very embarrassed. Most. But not all. Even though the US price of oil collapsed to ten cents per barrel the Hunt fortune flowed out of it.⁵⁴

No member of the IPC group was at all interested in Major Holmes’ Bahrain concession but eventually Gulf agreed to give him $50,000 for it. Then, being unable to take advantage of it, Gulf passed it on for exactly the same price to a stable mate of Exxon’s, Standard Oil of California, (Socal), which was not a party to the Red Line Agreement. Socal then registered a subsidiary, BAPCO, under the Canadian flag, to circumvent the British treaty requirement and, not being directly favoured by the flood of oil in the United States, began a program of remarkably successful drilling.^{55 56}

Now back to Ibn Saud’s efforts to find an answer to the financial crisis engulfing his young kingdom. On the surface it would seem that Socal’s success would have improved his chances of a strong negotiating position and a good deal. In fact its effects were contradictory. The IPC partners and their governments, especially BP and Britain, were not about to let another outsider in if it could be prevented and they wanted markets for the oil they had already, not more oil.

The intrigue became ever more complex. In the US the various governments and the majors joined forces – because it pleased them for once – to restrict interstate trade and to undermine the smaller companies. Six of the seven majors met, in 1932, to try to enforce the restrictive clauses of the Achnacarry agreement.⁵⁷ The Sheik of Kuwait was keen to get into the oil act too, but Britain was trying to keep him tied to his Great War protectorate treaty which virtually bound him to accept any British resource offer. It was on the basis of that treaty that it had succeeded in having Kuwait excluded from the IPC Red Line Agreement.⁵⁸ At the same time BP and the British government succeeded in subduing the very independent minded Reza Shah. They extracted from him an extension of the BP exclusive concession, to run to 1993.⁵⁹

Ibn Saud, naturally, did not know of either the Red Line Agreement or the Achnacarry Agreement. But there were several other important things that Ibn Saud did not know, or his decision making may well have taken quite a different direction. First, Exxon was about to buy control of Creole in Venezuela from another of its stable mates, Standard of Indiana. Second, his most trusted confidant, Jack Philby, was a two-timing British intelligence agent who had also been running Britain's spy operations in Transjordan from 1922 to 1930 when he adopted Islam and became a member of Ibn Saud's entourage. Third, Philby was also retained as a consultant by two of the oil companies, Socal and IPC (dominated by Anglo-Persian) and he therefore had a very twisted mass of conflicting interests, each of which he was exploiting to the full with total disregard of the consequences for any of the governments with which he was associated. Fourth, Philby's illegitimate son, Kim, an intellectual Marxist who at that time was estranged from his Fascist father, was well on his way to becoming a double agent serving both Russia and Britain, with the specific task of spying for Russia on his father and the oil manipulations in the Middle East.⁶⁰

GRAND COLLUSION: THE LONDON COMMITTEE

However in Saudi Arabia, hamstrung by the complexity of its interests and Philby's duplicity, Britain had lost the initiative and the long round of politicking seemed to have ended when the king granted a 60-year concession to Standard Oil of California in May 1933 in return for an immediate payment against first year royalties of five thousand pounds Sterling plus a loan of thirty thousand pounds. Philby's agreed take, in contrast, was an immediate US$10,000 plus US$1,000 a month for six months, plus a bonus of US$25,000 to be paid when commercial exploitation began, plus 50 cents per ton for oil exported up to another US$25,000. Only two months later Socal upgraded his retainer to permanent employment at one thousand pounds Sterling per year.⁶¹ In fact none of the conflicts of interest and jealousies had been resolved although Ibn Saud's immediate financial needs had been satisfied. Socal was effectively prevented from utilizing any Saudi Arabian oil it might extract by the secret inter-company arrangements, and the Red Line group were still determined to get a share of the concession. The big three oil companies, Exxon, Shell and BP, met secretly again in April 1934 to draft a Memorandum of Principles which would be adopted throughout the oil industry to control production, prices and competition, and to impose penalties on companies or countries which failed to tow the line. The 'principles' were to be enforced through a 'London Committee'.⁶²

Exxon, Shell and BP had just devised the techniques of an international cartel on a scale and to a degree of refinement which the world had not previously experienced and did not then comprehend. They were about to use those techniques not only against competitors but also to make a mockery of participation in their industry by the government of Iraq and to prevent the participation of other sovereign governments at all. But 40 years later they were at the forefront of a Western oil industry campaign to discredit OPEC, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, and its member governments as a 'cartel' trying to hold the world to ransom when, in fact, those governments were acting to protect legitimate national and international interests.

When the big three met to draft their 'principles' the majors already had to adapt to increasing production from Socal's Bahrain fields and they were determined that its Saudi Arabian potential would not be allowed to rock their boats even more. The manoeuvring for a share in the concession or for some other solution began in earnest. Although it could not be certain of a market for any oil which it extracted in Saudi Arabia, Socal had to drill at a minimum rate set down in its agreement or face the probability of forfeiting the concession. The screws tightened even further when BP and Gulf reached a devious deal for a joint concession in Kuwait in December 1934 after protracted negotiations between the US State Department and the British Colonial Office. But more than two can play at market grabs when the stakes are high and in July 1936 Socal began merger negotiations with the Texas Company to set up the California Texas Oil Company Ltd – Caltex.⁶³ Socal had immense production potential but it had been shut out of markets, while the Texas Company had developed foreign markets but no offshore production. Socal announced in March 1938 that it had struck oil in Saudi Arabia and that it was going into production. To ensure that Philby retained his interest in the company and in things American it promptly made the first of the two payments of US$25,000 agreed with him.⁶⁴

By the late 1930s most of the world except the United States had begun the long climb out of the great depression but it had also begun the long slide towards World War II. And because of the bitterness towards the excesses of the Capitalist system which had developed during the depression, the Capitalist confrontation with Communism was entering a new phase. It was already an important aspect of the trouble in the triangle but it was about to become even more firmly entangled in the intrigues of the Middle East, "the Jewish question" and the question which the powers of Europe had fought and manoeuvred over with total disregard for the people of the region – "Who does own the Middle East?"

But there was now a new factor which had not been conceived when the Balfour Declaration had been drawn up or when the European Powers and the oil majors began politicking to out-manoeuvre each other for control of those Arab oil resources. Mein Kampf. Hitler had gained power in Germany on January 30, 1933, and he had already consolidated his authority in Europe at the expense of the other major powers and it did not take long for Arab leaders to realize that they now had a potential ally in both their struggle against subordination to Zionist interests and their struggle for economic justice in the exploitation of their petroleum resources. However Ibn Saud knew that there were two marketable resources within his grasp – oil and land – and that both competition for power, and fear can be powerful stimuli towards decisions to buy. He also knew that in the circumstances of the time either, or both, could strengthen his position.

Firstly, oil. Following the discovery of oil in Saudi Arabia, Philby held talks in Spain with German Nazi officials with a view to ensuring supplies of oil for Germany in the event of a war and the imposition of an embargo on supplies from the United States and other countries. The proposal was that the Fascist dictator General Franco, who had been dependent upon German support during the Spanish Civil War, would receive a share for enabling the oil to be shipped from 'neutral' Saudi Arabia through 'neutral' Spain. The Spanish were concerned about the possibility of an attack on Spain if such a ruse were recognized and to test international reaction the matter was leaked, through Philby's son Kim, to both Russia and Britain. At first there was no response from Britain with authorities apparently being content to encourage Hitler to turn his attention to Russia. However in August 1939, after the signing of a non-aggression pact between Germany and Russia which did not welcome the idea of such 'attention', the reaction from Britain was strong.⁶⁵ Spain and Saudi Arabia both learned that such an arrangement would not be advisable.

Secondly, land. When the Evian Conference in July 1938 failed, tension around the future of Palestine naturally increased. The Arab and other Muslim nations held a conference in Cairo three months later and Britain interpreted it as possibly a prelude to another form of Arab-Axis cooperation. However although the Arab revolt erupted again with full force, from the point of view of his relations with the Arabs Hitler mistimed his move into Czechoslovakia and in doing so provided something of a distraction. In a bid to capitalize on it and possibly find a basis for Arab-Zionist cooperation, the British government convened a round table conference for February 1939. Jack Philby was there to watch over Ibn Saud's interests. He arranged a luncheon at which Zionist leaders Chaim Weizmann and Ben-Gurion could meet the Saudi's foreign affairs representative and proposed an arrangement for substantial Jewish migration into Palestine in return for Jewish support for Saudi 'domination' or authority over the region.⁶⁶ The reaction when that proposal was also leaked was mixed. For some, it showed an admirable degree of religious and community tolerance while for others, including the surrounding Arab nations, it was either a ploy by Britain to strengthen its hold over the Middle East or simply a power grab by one Arab ruler which would play into the hands of Zionists at the expense of the total Arab community. The matter was dropped – for the time being.

The question remained: "Who does own the Middle East?"

JERUSALEM NOW!

During the 1930s, as people struggled to cope with the effects of the Depression it was still quite apparent that the First World War had taken a frightening toll of all of the countries involved: those who were more or less innocent occupied bystanders as well as those who had hoped to gain from it. They had been persuaded by their politicians that there would be no more wars and they strongly opposed any national economic and financial policies which were based on the need to rearm. But within the countries of the victorious Western Alliance people were less aware that the Treaty of Versailles had taken an even heavier toll on Germany. Germany had not only been forced to dismantle its monarchy, under the treaty it had been stripped of all of its colonies, one eighth of its European territory, one tenth of its European population and most of its iron, steel and shipping. The Rhineland and the Saar had been placed under temporary foreign control, the German navy and air force had been eliminated and its army had been reduced to a force of 100,000 men who were required to serve for a minimum of twelve years so as to prevent the creation of reserves. Germany had been forced to provide a written admission of war guilt and under the treaty an extensive reparations bill had been imposed on it with no immediate limit other than the victors' assessment of Germany's capacity to pay.¹ In the political and economic circumstances which followed the Great War it was virtually inevitable that the job of enforcing the terms of Versailles would prove too much to handle.

The first aspect to come under pressure had been reparations. In 1921 the Allied Reparations Commission fixed Germany's provisional reparations bill at £6,850 million, with the understanding that it could be increased if the Commission decided that Germany could pay more. In 1924 another attempt was made to quantify reparations in the light of hyperinflation which had resulted in Germany defaulting on its payments, France and Belgium exercising their right to occupy the Rhur, and Hitler's failed Munich putsch which the Rhur crisis had provoked. Under the US-sponsored Dawes Plan Germany undertook to repay the equivalent of £50 million a year, though still with no fixed limit. But no one seemed to mind very much since the US was lending Germany the money to pay reparations to Britain and France who were, in turn, using it to pay back their war loans from the US, plus enough to finance Germany's post-war reconstruction, pay off its trade deficits and provide a gold reserve to boot. The American capitalists and financiers who were creaming off a percentage at virtually every stage of the money merry-go-round were quite happy.² Then in 1929 the Young Plan reduced the Dawes Plan payments and fixed a limit to Germany's reparation payments. It also secured yet another loan to Germany of $300 million, and provided for the evacuation and demilitarization of the Rhineland in 1930, five years ahead of schedule. Nevertheless, the Young Plan committed Germany to paying reparations for another 59 years.³ But with the coming of the Depression, partly in response to the unsustainable international financial arrangements which had been set up, the rules of the game changed entirely.

The political and military aspects of Versailles had proved no easier to enforce than the draconian reparations demands, but for different reasons. President Wilson's hope that the League of Nations would alone underwrite the peace had ended when the United States failed to join. In return for British acceptance of the League Covenant, the United States had agreed to join Britain in guaranteeing France's borders. But when the US Senate refused to ratify the Covenant, the American guarantee to France lapsed, and that of the British with it.⁴ That had left the European powers, and especially France, casting about for an alternative. They found it 1925, or thought they had, when they signed the Treaty of Locarno.

Under the Treaty of Locarno Britain and Italy jointly guaranteed the Franco-German border and the demilitarization of the Rhineland. But while that may have satisfied France's security claims in Western Europe, its interests in Eastern Europe were left hanging. Following the collapse of the Anglo-American guarantee France had also sought to contain Germany from the east, and to that end she had concluded a series of treaties with Germany's eastern neighbours. Its effort began in 1921 with an agreement with the newly re-established state of Poland under which France and Poland mutually guaranteed each country's borders with Germany. Similar treaties soon followed with the countries of the so-called Little Entente, Czechoslovakia (1924), Rumania (1926) and Yugoslavia (1927), which had been carved out of the Austro-Hungarian empire at Versailles. At Locarno, Germany formally acknowledged its western borders but it refused to do the same for its eastern borders which it still hoped to modify in its favour. And while France at Locarno confirmed its existing guarantees to Poland and Czechoslovakia, Britain, more intent on imperial matters and anxious to conciliate Germany, had refused to add guarantees of its own.⁵

But before we piece together the jigsaw of those few years we must again retrace our steps through some of the countries which had suffered during the British phase of the Christian reconstruction era.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE UNDER PRESSURE

Officially the British Empire no longer existed. The Imperial Conference of 1926 had declared the major countries which were already broadly self governing, Australia, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand, Ireland and Newfoundland (later merged with Canada) to be fully independent and self-governing, equal in rank with Britain and "united by a common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."⁶ Five years later, in 1931 when the world was at the deepest point of the trough of the Great Depression and Hitler was still two years from the Chancellorship, their status was formalized and the British Commonwealth took form as an association of independent nations, dominions, territories, dependencies, colonies, protectorates and mandates with the adoption of the Statute of Westminster.

The decline of the empire, in the traditional sense of imperial rule maintained by military presence, had begun long before the empire reached its greatest extent, like Rome, with the establishment of mandates over Palestine and the adjacent Arab regions as a consequence of World War I and the Balfour Declaration. The emphasis in Britain's efforts to retain the economic advantages of empire had swung firmly away from military operations to political and trade negotiations after the near catastrophe of the Boer War and the introduction of a scheme of Commonwealth trade preferences in 1932, hot on the heels of the Statute of Westminster, was consistent with that new emphasis. It was therefore quite natural that the trade preferences scheme would come under attack from Britain's competitors, particularly its former colony which had suffered so badly from Britain's previous restrictive trade practices, the United States. But the Commonwealth trade preferences system was also a vital aspect of Britain's bid to climb out of the Depression, and every concession and every authority for independence in foreign policy still had to be wrung from Britain the hard way, especially in the case of communities which were not dominated by Anglo-Saxon settlers.

Uprisings from 1916 to 1920 had won for the Irish Free State something akin to dominion status in 1922, and the continued civil war then led to the abolition of the oath of loyalty to the crown in 1933 and the termination of annual payments to Britain. Coincidentally a customs war was necessary to achieve the British-Irish Trade Agreement and parity with the dominions under the Commonwealth Preference scheme. But though the British government was prepared to offer some concession in the face of acute pressure, it was not prepared to allow the secession of a white, Christian community, in what the world had been taught was British home territory. To do so would generate even more pressure for the dismantling of its empire of non-white, non-Christian possessions. Another major ingredient had therefore been added to its recipe for troubles in Ireland.

India was the biggest country in the Commonwealth, it was the most influential, and it was arguably the one among those which had not gained Dominion status out of the 1926 conference which had been most degraded by imperial policies. Disappointed with the outcome of the Imperial Conference, its leaders took note of the pressure for constitutional reform in the American colony of the Philippines. They then noted the establishment of the P.N.I. as an anti-Dutch federation in the Dutch-governed East Indies after the government had expelled 1,300 P.K.I. members in 1926; the growing influence of China's Red Army; and the growth of Japanese sponsored secret societies which aimed to oust Anglo-Saxons from Asia. And they also noted the ruthless repression which followed anti-British race riots in Burma which was, then, still governed as a part of India. But, inspired by Gandhi's example, most of them kept their protests and their pressure on Britain at the passive, or at least non violent, level.

The Indian National Congress, a body with a very broad base of community support but largely Hindu-led, boycotted the 1928 Simon Commission which was announced following the 1926 Imperial Conference and which was intended to plan reforms in India as a bit of a consolation prize. Then, on December 31, 1929, Congress resolved to push for independence. In doing so it triggered pent-up tensions and aspirations so that India resembled a multiple jack-in-a-box with Britain, a frustrated master, trying to close all the traps at once with just two hands. Gandhi demanded tax reforms, publicly defied the salt tax and was gaoled in May 1930 for the second time. Britain convened a Round Table Conference in London in December-January 1930–31 but, being dissatisfied with the Simon Commission's recommendations which were to be the basis of negotiation and being bitter about the imprisonment of 60,000 Indians on civil disobedience charges, Congress boycotted that too.

Although most other religious, ethnic and ruling groups cooperated, Britain's Prime Minister MacDonald knew that a solution was not possible without the Indian National Congress so he instructed the Viceroy to encourage Gandhi to participate. A second Round Table was then held from October to December 1931 but it broke up in disarray and, being seen as the inspiration for further unrest, Gandhi was again thrown in jail when he returned to India. The deeply ingrained attitudes in Britain towards the concept of empire and towards India at that time are illustrated by Mr. Winston Churchill's intemperate remark that he was "nauseated to see Mr. Gandhi, an Inner Temple lawyer, now become a seditious fakir of a type well known in the East, striding half naked up the steps of the viceregal palace while he was still organizing and conducting a defiant campaign of civil disobedience, to parley on equal terms with the representatives of the King-Emperor."⁷

India's troubles were linked to those of Palestine. Britain's Colonial officials were painfully aware that Indian Muslim sympathies had been firmly with Turkey during Britain's long-running confrontation with it over the fragmentation and exploitation of the former Ottoman Empire. They were vainly trying to defuse the bitterness between Jews and Arabs in Palestine by means of the Passfield White Paper when the first Round Table on India was convened, and they were working to undermine the Grand Mufti and his ideas on the preeminence of Jerusalem while they sought to entice Gandhi to the second Round Table and while the International Muslim Conference was being held in Jerusalem. Anything they did to antagonize or to undermine the Muslim community at either of those functions would bring an adverse reaction at the other. On the other hand, pronouncements and actions favourable to the Muslim community would bring an adverse reaction from both the Hindu community in India and the Jewish community in Palestine, plus the Zionist lobby in Britain. It is therefore hardly surprising that when the Indian Communal electorate scheme was introduced in 1932 Britain's troubles were aggravated by a deepening of the division between Hindus and Muslims which it had fostered as a matter of policy in earlier years in its effort to divide and rule. Three years later, when the powers of governments in India were fragmented by the complex Government of India Act, the new scheme brought a greater degree of cooperation from Muslims but forced the Hindu-dominated National Congress into more bitter opposition.

ASIA FOR THE ASIATICS

But Britain's Asian troubles in the 1930's didn't stop at India. They involved its interests in China and its relations with Japan as well. The assassination of two premiers, in 1930 and 1932, had resulted in strong-arm highly nationalistic and sharply anti-Communist military governments taking charge in Japan, with several big privately controlled financial empires given roles in public administration in a manner that has been compared to private socialism.⁸ By the time Hitler had achieved his position of absolute personal power, bolstered by his concordat with the Vatican, Japan was already, effectively, a Fascist state, firmly in control of Manchuria – the Czechoslovakia of Asia – and the Western powers had lost their grip on affairs in East Asia.

Japanese political and business groups, smarting under the impact of Western efforts at a Christian reconstruction of their country, were taking advantage of Europe's troubles in their efforts to eliminate all Anglo-Saxon Christian influence from their region. Taking up the theme of America's Monroe Doctrine they were proclaiming "Asia for the Asiatics." It wasn't hard to blame Western interference and gun barrels for most of Asia's economic ills, social degradation and international humiliation. To them, the West and its Christianity was the mass-personification of greed and corruption. Japan and its clearly defined system of ethics therefore equated to national purity and patriotism.

During the early years of this century, and even after the Great War, Ultra-nationalism in Japan had lacked the well-defined philosophy and organization of Fascism in Italy and Nazism in Germany. It had tended to reflect all of the community's circumstantial reactions drawn together by a yearning for strong central authority. It was anti-West, anti-liberal, anti-democratic, anti-parliament, anti-international and anti-disarmament, and yet it was also anti-Communist and anti-socialist.⁹ Given Japan's heritage as a well disciplined nation in which close family and community links were very important it was natural that its ultra-nationalism should merge with its State Shinto. It was also natural that its military hierarchy would seize on the Shinto veneration of the nation and the emperor as manifestations of God, which was then current. This became the focal point of their efforts to achieve political stability and growth of empire through religious conformity in much the same way that the emperors of Rome had sought to exploit the same idea.^{10 11} There was certainly no room for competition from Christianity which was so clearly and intimately linked with the powers and the systems to which the military hierarchy attributed Japan's predicament.

During and after the Great War, Western politics and the effects of manipulation during the Christian reconstruction period had become steadily more entangled with the affairs of Japan and China. But of course the Western powers and the church, (with the few notable exceptions already discussed), had not grasped what was happening and pushed on relentlessly in the belief that the world and everything therein, including nonwhite people, existed for the benefit of Christian whites. Lord Balfour and Hitler were not the only political figures to base their foreign policies on the well-taught axiom that the inequality of races was a plain historic truth which justified the process of settler colonialism as an expression of the great rights and privileges of the races of Europe.¹² The United States had refined it and almost claimed it as its own discovery through the Eugenics movement. It was highly conceited in its corporate confidence that none of those lesser mortals would ever be able to do anything about it if the unassailable truth did happen to prove an untruth. Its dealings with Japan in the 1920's illustrate the point.

DISCRIMINATION IN AMERICA

In 1920 the State of California denied its Japanese residents the right to lease land, to act as guardians for their American-born children who might own land, and to own shares in American-controlled landowning companies. Previously, a year before the Great War, they had been declared aliens and ineligible for citizenship or to own land. Then in 1924 whatever goodwill towards America may have remained in Japan evaporated when the US Congress banned Japanese immigration totally. Of course it was still America's right to exploit Japanese markets as it wished, and Japan had few options but to continue to buy American oil, cotton, scrap iron and loans for its own capital development. And of course America continued to buy Japan's silk, tea and cheap-labour manufactured goods. But on top of that a host of major American companies such as Ford, General Motors, RCA and the Aluminium Company of America set up subsidiaries to tap Japan's cheap labour and expanding markets more directly while others, such as General Electric and Western Electric, made patent and trade mark agreements with Japanese companies. It is quite likely that among the patents were some of those which had been expropriated from Germany after the Great War and which had boosted US industrial competitiveness very greatly.

It is no wonder that Japan's attitude to the West hardened even more when the Western powers further tightened the limits imposed on its rearmament program in 1927. The growth of anti Western secret societies from 1928 onwards was a natural response to Western attitudes and actions. And while some of Japan's secret societies restricted their activities to Japan others sponsored and financed groups in other parts of Asia to help liberate nonwhites from Anglo-Saxon domination. It was a very short step from wanting to free Asia from domination by outside powers to wanting to take the place of those powers.

So when the collapse of America's economy threw Japan's economy into chaos, the nation's determination to eliminate Anglo-Saxon Christian influence and to buffer itself against the traumas of the Western World by expanding its own empire rose quite sharply. Japan would provide the leadership for the Asian region and it would reap the benefits just as the European powers and the United States had. It knew it had little to fear from British naval retaliation. It had, after all, gone to Britain's aid with its own navy in the Great War and had "earned" its Pacific dependencies accordingly at Germany's expense. And even before that it had learned very well from its nineteenth century overlords. Using much the same bash'n'bully methods as the United States and European powers had used against it just 50 years earlier, in 1904 Japan had forced Korea to accept Japanese advisers to supervise its finance, military, foreign, and domestic affairs. A year later, taking full advantage of its war with decadent Tsarist Russia and in collaboration with the United States, it imposed a protectorate. It was then a short step via the Japanese-enforced abdication of the Korean Emperor and a short-lived agreement of cooperation to outright annexation in 1910.

Also in 1905 Japan had gained special economic concessions in Manchuria as successor to Russia, with the agreement of both China and the United States. Its extensive program of railway construction, control of vital ports on the Liaodong Peninsula in the Gulf of Chihli and treaty access to trading centres in North China provided the legal status which Japan was able to use a generation later to justify its military expansion in China. In the meantime the preoccupation of the European powers with their own neocolonial Great War games gave Japan the chance to press its demands for additional rights in Manchuria while China was not in a position to deny them. But then, in 1922, the Four-Power Treaty on respect of mutual rights in Pacific territories and the Five Power Treaty on naval arms limitations put a damper on her ability to manoeuvre until the Great Depression again changed the international rules.

But in 1930 Japan's ambitions for independence from the West and for the development of its own empire were being undermined by fears that China would upstage it, or even invade it in a bid to solve its own problems. Britain and the US were both in league with Chiang Kai-shek in his bid to reunify China and to eliminate Mao Tse-tung's Red Army. Britain still had its Chinese territories, the US had its Philippines, France was in firm control of Indochina and Chiang was courting them all. His acceptance of the divisive Christianization programs was just one aspect of that courtship, but it might help the West keep its hold in Asia, and that concerned Japan. And those concerns deepened when the Western Powers again cut the permitted strength of Japan's navy relative to their own at the Washington Naval Conference that year. Chiang Kai-shek therefore had to be stopped for several reasons, but it was not to be done through collaboration with Mao Tse-tung so the only option was direct Japanese military intervention. In 1931 a unit stationed in Mukden, Southern Manchuria, provided the pretext for an invasion by blowing up a bridge and blaming it on Chinese guards.

Chiang Kai-shek then found himself more dependent on his Western allies as he tried to reunify China, to liquidate the Red Army and to repulse Japan at the same time. But by 1933 his Western allies had a new problem to worry about.

DECLARATION OF THE GREAT POWERS

In October 1933 the British Chiefs of Staff (COS) warned in their annual review of defence preparedness that Germany would rearm to the point where within a few years it could start a war in Europe. As soon as she felt strong enough, the report stated, Germany would "attain her ends in a war of offence in the East, combined if necessary with a defensive in the West." If that happened Britain might then be obliged to come to the aid of France as it had pledged under the Treaty of Locarno. Moreover, the COS stated that in accordance with a long standing national interest, Britain must keep any continental power from seizing the Low Countries. That interest had now been magnified by the need to prevent the establishment of air bases within striking distance of Britain. In the view of the COS, however, the combination of disarmament and the ten year rule meant that Britain's defences were now inadequate to meet its responsibilities in both Europe and the Far East, where the recent Sino-Japanese truce had not removed the threat to the British Empire from Japan.¹³ To fulfill its European obligations, the British Army could provide at most two divisions, which could not be reinforced for many months. At the same time, war in Europe would certainly entail trouble elsewhere which would make competing demands on Britain's military resources. "We are forced to the conclusion", the COS stated, "that, should war break out in Europe, we should be able to do little more than hold the frontiers and outposts of the Empire during the first few months of the war."¹⁴

Arguing that adequate military strength in peacetime was "the best possible deterrent to the ambitions of any enemy", the Defence Requirements Committee (DRC, an ad hoc sub committee of the Government's Committee for Imperial Defence) admitted that "practical finance [made it] impossible for a world-wide empire like our own to be equally secure against every conceivable enemy." It therefore advocated a limited but carefully targeted program balanced between the three services. With regard to Germany, which the DRC identified as Britain's most significant long-term threat, the report concluded that an army expeditionary force of four infantry divisions, one cavalry division, two air defense brigades and a tank brigade, supported from the air, "would as a deterrent, exercise an influence for peace out of all proportion to its size." With regard to the Far East, where the threat from Japan was seen as the most significant in the short term, the DRC argued that British imperial interests would be adequately safeguarded by a reconditioned fleet with well-defended bases. A total of £71 million was requested for the program over the first five years, with £40 million earmarked for the Army, £21 million to the navy and £10 million to the air force.¹⁵

However, it was not until five months later, in July 1934, that the Cabinet approved measures to reinvigorate Britain's flagging defence requirements. By then the DRC's proposals had been radically revised, largely due to the dogged intervention of the influential Chancellor of the Exchequer, Neville Chamberlain. Reflecting both the financial orthodoxy of the Treasury and the domestic political situation of the Conservative Party, Chamberlain insisted that Britain's financial position meant that it simply could not afford to prepare for a two-front war. He would not sacrifice butter for guns when the government had pledged to reduce taxes and restore salary cuts made in 1931. Neither would he borrow to pay for defence. Instead of preparing for war on two fronts, he argued, Britain should work toward rapprochement with Japan and must concentrate on Europe. In addition, despite recognizing the vital importance of defending the Low Countries, Chamberlain as well as other ministers also emphasized public distaste for terms such as 'expeditionary force', which brought back bitter memories of the Somme. In Chamberlain's view, therefore, the best, quickest and cheapest defense against Germany would be the deterrent power of a larger air force. The army would not have to send an expeditionary force to Europe unless the air deterrent failed, and the navy would not need major expenditures on deficiencies for a European war. The budget for the deficiency program was accordingly cut back to £50 million over five years, with the navy getting £13 million, army £20 million and the air force £17 million.¹⁶

No sooner had that decision been taken, however, than Hitler's parody began to challenge the British Cabinet's complacent views on the need for an expeditionary force. On 25 July, 1934, in an attempt to hasten the Anschluss, which Hitler had called for in Mein Kampf, the Austrian Nazi party murdered Austrian Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss. Recognizing the threat to Italy's security, Mussolini immediately moved troops to the Austrian frontier on the Brenner Pass, effectively forestalling Hitler's attempt at Austrian revolution.¹⁷ But the matter was far from settled.

THE SMALL POWER ADVANTAGE

The situation was that the establishment of the small independent nations of Austria and Czechoslovakia under the Treaty of Versailles had been intended by the World War I victors to weaken Germany and to provide a buffer zone around it. The security of those countries was to be guaranteed by the League of Nations or, effectively, the victors. Austria was clearly dependent for its security on an agreement between its southern neighbour, Italy, France and Britain that they would jointly guarantee its independence. To consolidate that relationship Austria's new Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg visited Mussolini three times in quick succession between August 1934 and January 1935 and signed formal protocols with him; France and Italy signed an accord to guarantee Austria's independence in January 1935; and von Schuschnigg then visited Paris and London in February 1935.¹⁸

However, in the prevailing circumstances the British government was not able to give a commitment. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir John Simon, to whom Schuschnigg was referred by Prime Minister MacDonald and other ministers during their February consultations whenever 'too hard' questions were raised, said that Britain had "full understanding" of the pressures which Austria was under from Germany outside and from Nazi extremists inside its borders. Certainly, he said, Britain was "all for" Austrian independence because any change from the status quo in the Danube Basin might bring catastrophe and "... it was in Great Britain's vital interest to keep quiet, order, security, and normal developments in the regions at the heart of the Continent." But, apart from the Declaration of the Great Powers, Britain could not and would not give any further guarantee for Austria and "it was not in a position to take on new European obligations, or obligations with respect to France, which could not be judged at present in all their possible consequences." Sir John made it clear to Schuschnigg that "it was necessary to quench the spark before the whole country was in flames" and he asked whether Austria could not strengthen its domestic policy by a free plebiscite on the question of the Anschluss. He also said that in spite of its friendship and understanding for Austria, 'public opinion' in England found it regrettable that Austria had "abandoned democratic forms." Schuschnigg in turn explained that the "temporary expedient" of election of governments through corporate bodies instead of through political parties had been adopted in order to preserve Austria's long term democratic integrity and independence in view of the conduct of some of those parties – he was alluding to the National Socialists – and outside pressure for the Anschluss.¹⁹

Britain's attitude was far from reassuring and Schuschnigg returned to Vienna somewhat despondent. He noted England's "decisive influence in Europe", the effect of Europe's (colonial) contact with the rest of the world and that this "... can be good or bad – for most people it will be good."²⁰ He also noted that "the English Government, always anxious to retain Parliamentary backing, takes account of public opinion to a degree unknown to our continental democracies. This is all the more remarkable as the Government has very few means by which it can influence public opinion."²¹ He was very perceptive indeed, but he was not to know that the situation was about to change with dramatic consequences for him, his country and the world.

A new British White Paper on Defence was published on March 4, 1935. Reflecting both the influence of pacifist public opinion and the realities of Britain's strained financial position, Cabinet's directions for producing the final draft had stated that the paper should emphasize "the importance of our defence forces from the point of view of peace, defence, and deterrent against the outbreak of war, and ... not make specially prominent such matters as our military obligations and commitments, as well as our deficiencies from the point of view of offensive action." Accordingly, the Paper emphasized the importance of air defence of Great Britain, omitted any mention of an expeditionary force and the implied commitment to Belgium and France, noted the Government's continued adherence to collective security and disarmament, and stressed the compatibility between deterrence and the "establishment of peace on a permanent footing." Nevertheless, despite the assurances which it contained of Britain's continued commitment to collective security, the White Paper was labelled a betrayal of peace and disarmament by both Clement Attlee (deputy leader of the Labour Party) and Sir Herbert Samuel (leader of the Liberal Party) in debate in the House of Commons a week after its release.²²

Following the White Paper, Cabinet proposed to send the Foreign Secretary, Sir John Simon on an official visit to Berlin, despite the potential damage it might cause to relations with Italy and France. The controversy surrounding the visit was heightened when on March 9, taking advantage of popular acclaim for the recently successful plebiscite on the re-incorporation of the Saar, Hermann Göring announced the existence of the Luftwaffe. Then on March 16, three days before Simon was due to arrive, Hitler announced the introduction of universal military service and a peace time army of half a million troops. Both announcements were in clear contravention of the terms of the Treaty of Versailles. When questions were raised about whether Simon would be welcome and whether the visit should go ahead, Hitler said it should. Then, on March 19 Hitler personally told Sir John the equally staggering news that Germany had reached air parity with Britain. Hitler's revelation sent shock waves through Whitehall, but the government did not inform Parliament.

In Rome, the British Ambassador was so alarmed by the damage done to Britain's relations with both France and Italy by Simon's visit that on March 20 he proposed a three power meeting in northern Italy to reaffirm a united front against Germany. Accordingly, a conference was arranged for April 11 in the Italian town of Stresa. In what became known as the Stresa Front, all three countries censured Germany for its unilateral action and reaffirmed their commitment to the Treaty of Locarno. They also reiterated their support for Austria's independence. However Britain once again refused to give its support the status of a guarantee.²³ It may well have seemed to Schuschnigg that his understanding of the British Government's inability to influence public opinion had been correct. But he was wrong.

THE CONSPIRACY OF SILENCE

In fact a conspiracy to camouflage the British Government's actions, the reasons for them, and the critically weak position into which Britain had floundered was just beginning. It continued up to and well into the war, but its impact was most critical in the period from 1935 up to the outbreak of hostilities. As archives have been examined and cabinet and private records have been opened for public perusal in recent years the full extent and impact of the conspiracy has become apparent. Richard Cockett documents much of it in Twilight of Truth. Drawing on that and other sources we can now trace the early stages of the conspiracy and then follow its consequences in coming chapters.

The basis of the conspiracy was the need, at least as the then Chancellor of the Exchequer and later Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain perceived it, to conceal the complex and fragile predicament into which successive imperial governments had floundered because of the self-misunderstanding of the amorphous Christian gel of which they were key pieces. Government documents and other publications as well as newspapers from the years leading up to World War II show that the motive behind such concerted non-reporting and misrepresentation was to prevent a further weakening of Britain's position. However the conspiracy and the policy of deception which went with it simply contributed to the relentless slide into the trouble in the triangle by requiring people to make decisions and to respond to government initiatives in a partial information vacuum, or even on a false basis, while it enabled Chamberlain to pursue his policy of appeasement unrestrained by the reasoning of those around him.

The seeds of the conspiracy had been sown some years before. From 1885 a House of Commons 'Lobby' of specialist political journalists had been recognized and organized, with a secretary, and given open access to government departments and to any Minister or Member of Parliament who wished to speak to a representative of the press. The lobby was a very privileged group but it helped the British free press attain and maintain an enviable reputation for accuracy and independence. Of course journalists still had to 'ferret out' information or to be actively investigative, because any person with such access to the press only wanted to disclose information which was to their advantage, but basically the system worked to everyone's satisfaction. The first real change came in 1929 when the Labour Prime Minister, Ramsay

MacDonald, faced with economic and international crises on many fronts, was dissatisfied with the news coverage provided by the conservative 'press barons' who controlled Britain's newspapers and set out to influence them or to get balanced coverage by appointing a press officer. The press officer soon assumed the responsibility of arranging regular press briefings for the lobby and restricted access to ministers and departments.²⁴ In due course the number of press staff grew, and with successive changes in the coalition or National Government, conflicts developed, especially as the Prime Minister's press officer and the Foreign Office News Department (FOND) tended to work independently. From 1930 Press Officer George Steward placed restrictions on the lobby in a bid to control the flow of information and when these were tightened in 1933 they tended to encourage ministers to attend secret briefings on a confidential 'off the record' basis and reports were published without a source quoted. Heads of departments also tended to develop their own favoured press connections. Some lobby journalists realized that influence was being peddled, while others saw themselves as members of a power establishment and ex-officio members of a political system, or legitimate "allies, legmen and buddies" of those with the authority to govern the country.²⁵

But in 1930, at about the time that Steward introduced controls over the operation of the lobby, an appointment was made by the Conservative Party, then in opposition, which was to prove crucial in the subsequent conspiracy. Sir Joseph Ball, a former head of MI5's Investigation Branch, who had been recruited to run a little intelligence (or political infiltration) service for the Central Office of the Conservative Party in 1924, was appointed director of a new Research Department for the party. In that capacity he also became Neville Chamberlain's closest political adviser. From August 1931, when the Conservative Party became the dominant partner in a coalition National Government, of which Ramsay MacDonald was still Prime Minister, Ball became indispensable to, and inseparable from, Neville Chamberlain.²⁶

Actually Chamberlain did not have everything under his control. The Foreign Office had set up its News Department, FOND, in a bid to ensure that the public had access to information to enable it to properly interpret Foreign Office policy, and Rex Leeper had been appointed to head it early in 1935. Controversy erupted from time to time when information which he released was in conflict with the views being offered by Steward's office, such as when Prime Minister MacDonald sought to suppress the fact that Germany had reached air parity with Britain. Sir John Simon had recorded this on file but did not include it in his report to the Commons of his visit to Germany. Sir Robert Vansittart, the permanent head of the Foreign Office, then instructed Leeper to inform selected diplomatic journalists and a report was published in the Daily Telegraph on March 29. This incident showed clearly that FOND was a powerful competitor with the Downing Street Press Office and that this dual system could become "menacingly fractious" when the policies pursued by the Foreign Office and Downing Street parted company. From that time Vansittart briefed Winston Churchill, possibly the strongest critic of government policy on its own backbench, on matters of importance regardless of the fact that he was only a back-bench MP.

So Chamberlain did not have everything under his control, but almost. After June 1935 when Baldwin became Prime Minister with Chamberlain as his overpowering Chancellor, the lines between what was 'government' and what was Conservative Party became progressively more blurred. Chamberlain treated the lobby as his personal service and when he was not present to brief the lobby Sir Joseph Ball was. Similarly, a National Publicity Bureau was set up to publicize government achievements and policies prior to the November 1935 elections. The source of the bureau's funds is unclear but Ball was a member of its committee and what was government and what was Conservative Party in the material distributed was also blurred.²⁷ Cockett notes that: "Through Ball and George Steward, Chamberlain was able to run an entirely unattributable news campaign. Via the obliging Lobby, he could set the tone of political reporting every morning." Cockett also refers to the personal relationships between the core members of the Baldwin-Chamberlain cabinet (Lord Halifax, Sir John Simon and Sir Samuel Hoare) and key press barons and editors, notably the Times editor Geoffrey Dawson, and says that: "Indeed, throughout the 1930s it can be said that Dawson was privy to more cabinet thinking and secrets than most members of the government, whether the Prime Minister was MacDonald, Baldwin or Chamberlain."²⁸ Because these personal relationships were common knowledge within diplomatic circles the Times was widely regarded as a semi-official channel for the British Government's thinking on foreign policy and its editorial statements were "scrupulously scrutinized in the chancelleries and embassies of the world."²⁹

ANGLO-GERMAN NAVAL TREATY

Thus, when on May 21, 1935, Hitler announced a thirteen point peace plan with honeyed words and promised to limit Germany's navy to 35 percent of Britain's capacity or 85 percent of France's, the British press, including The Times, dutifully responded with the sort of coverage both Chamberlain and Hitler wanted. It did not seem to matter that the proposed limit to the size of the German navy actually represented a substantial increase over the Versailles treaty level or that regulations against the Jews were being tightened with monotonous regularity. Such a limit would reduce pressure for rearmament by enabling the release of forces from Europe to defend Britain's naval base at Singapore against a threat from Japan, which had denounced its naval limitation treaties with Britain and the US six months earlier, in December, 1934. Subsequently, Britain's commitment to the Treaty of Versailles and her allies of the Stresa Front was effectively abrogated when an Anglo-German Naval Treaty was signed in June.

Britain's allies were aghast at the signing of that treaty and the rising tensions in Europe were not lost on the US administration. With the publication of revised histories of the Great War and evidence given to the Senate Munitions Committee, Americans were becoming conscious of the guilt which the allies shared for the world's crises and concerned at the role of businessmen in provoking wars in order to profit from the sale of arms and munitions. They were eager to take steps to ensure that the United States was not involved if there was another war in Europe as a spin-off from the failed Treaty of Versailles and the resurgence of Germany. But there was another critical situation which the world's governments tried to make-believe was a bit of a sideshow: Spain. The crises which had rocked Spain since the monarchy gave way to an unstable republic at the depths of the Great Depression in 1931, gave every indication that it could become the focal point for another conflagration.

In 1931, the tottering and unpopular monarchy of Alfonso XIII, (whose wife was a great-granddaughter of Britain's Queen Victoria), had finally been replaced, by popular demand, with a republic governed by a coalition of Left-leaning Republicans and Socialists, shortly after the depression-embattled dictator, Primo de Rivera, resigned. The monarchy had been propped up by the Roman Catholic Church and the efforts of de Rivera since 1923. Among the republican government's early major initiatives was the separation of state and church with the disestablishment of the Roman Catholic Church. Even before Hitler began to wield his big stick in Germany the Spanish government had begun the process of nationalizing all ecclesiastical property, although it did permit the church to have continued use of it. It also discontinued the state payment of the clergy, ordered the Jesuits expelled, forbade the remaining teaching orders and congregations from operating church-controlled education, and it introduced civil marriage. In some towns radical mobs took affairs into their own hands and a number of churches and convents were destroyed. But when the church and its allies succeeded in bringing down the two-year old government in November 1933 and installed a conservative government based on a coalition of the Catholic Right and Radical Republicans, the anticlerical measures were relaxed somewhat. Relaxed, but not ended. Of course the Vatican had never taken such treatment lying down and in October 1934, when the Socialists objected to the government supporting the suppression of Socialists in Germany and Austria, the nation was rocked by an abortive anti-democratic revolt which had been planned in a bid to establish Fascism in Spain with the support of Italy's most famous modern anti-clericalist-turned-church-prop, Mussolini.³⁰

In view of Spain's strategic importance with its constantly-threatened empire straddling the Straits of Gibraltar and its history as a site of religious turmoil, it was very likely that if the instability continued each of Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, the United States and the Vatican could become involved in a struggle to determine its future form of government, the direction of its economy and its alliances. The result was that in August, 1935, Congress passed a Neutrality Act. Under the act, once the president declared that a state of war existed between two foreign nations, Americans were forbidden to sell or transport arms to either of the belligerents and the president could warn Americans that they travelled on ships of the belligerent nations at their own risk.³²

Such actions gave the new Baldwin-Chamberlain government the justification it wanted to go to the electors on a pacifist note. On October 1, 1935, six weeks before the election and in spite of the fact that the Conservative Party manifesto referred to 'increased rearmament' Baldwin told the Peace Society: "I give you my word there will be no great rearmaments."³³ Two days later, however, Baldwin was confronted by an entirely new set of circumstances which called his statement into question. Italy invaded Abyssinia, and intentionally or otherwise, Mussolini changed the balance of power in Europe.

ITALY, ABYSSINIA AND 'A MOST INCONVENIENT DILEMMA'

In fact, the Prime Minister's statement was all the more remarkable because Italy's interest in annexing Abyssinia (Ethiopia) was long standing and the British Government had known of Mussolini's intentions for some months. The origins of the dispute lay in the 1890's, when in the final stages of the Christian reconstruction of Africa, Anglo-Italian protocols had assigned much of the Horn of Africa to the recently reunited Italy. In 1896 war had broken out between Italy and the Abyssinian Empire over disputed territories lying between the Abyssinian capital Addis Ababa and the Italian-controlled coastal strip of Eritrea. Italy was defeated, and the disputed territories were incorporated into the Abyssinian Empire.³⁴ Not to be outdone by the other European colonial powers, Mussolini was determined to retrieve the lands for his new version of the Roman Empire.

His problem, however, was that Abyssinia was a member of the League of Nations and could therefore expect support from the League in the face of any hostile moves by Italy. But the Duce also knew that he could use his support for the anti-Hitler front as a bargaining chip. France's position had been made clear some ten months earlier, in January 1935, when Italy had pledged support for France if Germany threatened Austrian independence. In return French Prime Minister Pierre Laval had offered concessions to Italy in Africa, including what amounted to an implicit free hand in Abyssinia.

However, Britain's position was more complicated. Officially committed to a policy of support for collective security, the British Government could not be seen to be undermining the League by giving in to the aggressive demands of a dictator. Thus, in December 1934, when clashes had occurred between Italian-led Somali tribesmen and Abyssinian troops along the Abyssinian border, Britain had warned Italy that it would not support an Italian invasion. At the same time, however, given its need to maintain a common front with France and Italy in relation to Germany, it had expressed a willingness to help negotiate a compromise settlement favouring many Italian claims.

Britain's silence on the matter at the Stresa Conference in April, 1935, when the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of Italy, Britain and France met to discuss a common front against Germany, had naturally led Mussolini to believe that Britain, too, rated the question of Abyssinia a low priority. By June Anglo-Italian talks aimed at formulating compromise proposals had broken down. In mid-June, soon after the Anglo-German naval Treaty was signed, Foreign Minister Samuel Hoare had informed the cabinet that relations between Italy and Abyssinia had deteriorated, and that Italy was sending forces to its colonies in Eritrea and Italian Somaliland. Given that the French seemed more willing to side with Italy than the League, Hoare noted, His Majesty's Government would soon face "a most inconvenient dilemma."³⁵

Hoare's description was an understatement. As a leading member of the League of Nations Britain was committed to opposing aggression against any of its member states through collective economic sanctions. Failing to oppose Italy through the League would therefore severely undermine the credibility of the League's collective security system and hence weaken its capacity to resist German expansion in the future. On the other hand, punishing Italy through the League would inevitably alienate Mussolini, destroy the Stresa Front against Germany, and possibly push Mussolini out of the League and into the arms of Hitler. Moreover, making economic sanctions work required the support of France, whose conciliatory attitude to Mussolini was already evident. And should economic sanctions lead to war, which was likely, the parlous state of British defences would make French support for Britain even more vital.

But there were also the considerable effects on British imperial interests to consider if Italy invaded Abyssinia. Already Britain was chafing at Italian propaganda about succeeding the "effete" British in Africa, and conflict between the two colonial powers would only further inflame nationalist feeling in the region already fanned by resentment of European imperialism. In addition, war between the two powers would draw off vital resources from both Europe and the Far East. In doing that it would significantly weaken air and naval defences against potential German or Japanese aggression and disrupt the air rearmament program. But equally importantly, Italian expansion in Africa would threaten British control over neighbouring Sudan and Egypt, as well as imperial communications through the Mediterranean and Suez.³⁶

Expecting that Mussolini would invade but hoping that pressure from the League would get him to stop and negotiate after achieving something he could claim as a victory, Cabinet wagered on a bluff. On September 11 Hoare addressed the League Assembly with a rousing speech of support. Britain, he said, was committed to "steady and collective resistance to all acts of unprovoked aggression", and would be "second to none" in carrying out the obligations contained in the Covenant. Within a week, however, the bet had soured when it became clear that France would not commit itself to supporting Britain in the event of war against Italy unless Britain gave an unequivocal commitment to France in the event of a German attack. And that, Britain would not do.³⁷

VATICAN AMBITIONS

By mid-September the British navy had all but mobilized in the Mediterranean, and substantial reinforcements had been sent to Egypt and Malta. Not to be intimidated, Mussolini rejected the League's compromise proposals for a transfer of territory on September 18.³⁸ It was then, on October 1, that Baldwin gave his pre-election commitment to the Peace Society, and it was two days after that, on October 3, 1935, that Mussolini's armies crossed from Eritrea into Abyssinia. Ethiopia immediately appealed for British intervention and Britain officially opposed the invasion, but in spite of pressure from its African colonies it did not intervene. There was a certain amount of propaganda about the rights of independent states, but Britain was on very boggy ground over that issue. However, there was little point in either Abyssinia or other African colonies appealing to the pope to intervene with Mussolini because the Vatican saw an opportunity looming to absorb the Ethiopian Orthodox Church. Mussolini didn't have the benefit of a Rominus Pontifex. He didn't need it. He wasn't carrying the church into a new Muslim or other non-Christian territory. It would be a case of bringing a part of the 'separated brethren' back into the fold. The Vatican established an Apostolic Delegation, on the basis that the Lateran Accord gave it the authority to do so; it divided the country into prefectures apostolic and at least one vicariate apostolic, and it hoped to "bring the Church of Ethiopia into obedience to the Pope."³⁹ A papal nod was as good as a wink. In this case judicious silence was just as good. There was no papal condemnation of Italy's aggression. Not even an effort to subdue the enthusiasm of the Italian church hierarchy. The bishop of Terracina declared: "O Duce! Today Italy is Fascist and the hearts of all Italians beat together with yours. The nation is ready for any sacrifice to ensure the triumph of peace and of Roman and Christian civilizations ... God bless you, O Duce."⁴⁰

Immediately following the invasion the League accused Italy of breaking the Covenant and commenced a debate on the imposition of economic sanctions. Britain and France voted with most members to impose them, though Austria and Hungary, 'recognizing their existing treaty obligations' and needing to retain Italy's support against Germany, stood by Mussolini.

With the British general election due in mid-November, the Abyssinian crisis inevitably focused attention on the general question of rearmament. On the day of the invasion, and only two days after Baldwin's commitment to the Peace Society, Conservative MP Winston Churchill, then on the backbench, had moved at Conservative Party Conference for the repair of defence facilities and the organization of industry for speedy conversion to defence; for the recovery of equality in the air with "the strongest foreign air force within striking distance" (Germany); and strengthening of the Royal Navy for defence of supplies and the cohesion of the empire.⁴¹ Then on October 8 he told parliament that Italy's invasion of Abyssinia was a very small matter compared with danger posed by Germany. There could be no anxieties "comparable to the anxiety caused by the German rearmament. We cannot afford to see Nazidom in all its present phase of cruelty and intolerance, with all its hatreds and its gleaming weapons, paramount in Europe." In the Strand Magazine he wrote: "side by side with training grounds of the new armies and the great aerodromes, the concentration camps pock-mark the German soil. In these, thousands of Germans are coerced and crowded into submission to the irresistible power of the Totalitarian State." The persecution of the Jews is being pursued with "brutal vigour" and "No past services, no proved patriotism, even wounds sustained in war, could procure immunity for persons whose only crime was that their parents had brought them into the world. Even the 'wretched Jewish children' were persecuted in the national schools, he said. The world still hoped that the worst might be over, 'and that we may yet live to see Hitler a gentler figure in a happier age.' Yet even as Hitler spoke words of reassurance from Berlin, 'the great wheels revolve, the rifles, the cannon, the tanks, the shot and the shell, the air-bombs, the poison gas cylinders, the aeroplanes, the submarines, and now the beginnings of a fleet, flow in ever-broadening streams from the already largely war-mobilized arsenals and factories of Germany.” The German government protested about both the speech and the article.⁴²

Such backbench efforts at public education were to little avail, and despite its acute awareness of Britain’s military ill-preparedness, the Conservative Party stuck to its politically expedient campaign platform of collective security and limited rearmament. The election on November 14 resulted in a landslide victory for the Conservatives, who won 432 seats to Labour’s 151 and the Liberals’ 21. But even so, Ball expressed concern to Baldwin that the press had been biased against them and recommended that a weekly newspaper be acquired to redress the balance. Using National Publicity Bureau funds without the committee’s knowledge, Ball subsequently bought control of the Truth and directed it from his office, also without the committee being aware of it, using it to promote appeasement and to discredit the government’s political opponents.⁴³

Within days of the election, however, the folly of its election platform was made clear to the Government. On November 15 the League agreed in principle to the adoption of oil sanctions against Italy, and Mussolini promptly responded by declaring that he would treat an oil sanction as an act of war.

Britain’s dilemma was starkly outlined in a DRC Report of 21 November, 1935. The DRC noted that the Mediterranean crisis had exposed Britain to ‘probings’ in both Europe and the Far East. Rapid rearmament was needed. In addition to recommending an expanded program for the air force, the report recommended the establishment of an expeditionary ‘Field Force’ of five divisions capable of mobilization on the Continent within two weeks of the outbreak of war, with reinforcement by twelve ‘Territorial’ reserve divisions over a period of eight months.⁴⁴ Stressing that Germany and Japan remained the priorities, the DRC also recommended the adoption in principle of a new standard of naval strength that would enable the fleet to operate against those two powers simultaneously. It also noted, however, that it was impossible to make provisions against Italy as well. Since Germany was still the main menace, there were overwhelming arguments “for avoiding any further estrangement of Japan ... or of any Mediterranean Power [i.e. Italy] which lies athwart our main artery of communication to the East. Least of all could we contemplate without the gravest misgivings an estrangement with Japan and a Mediterranean Power at once.” There was therefore a need for an “ultimate policy of accommodation and neighbourliness with Italy.”⁴⁵ In short, the DRC had made it starkly clear that Britain’s obligations under the League were incompatible with the interests of empire.

By December, despite Hoare’s September speech of support to the Assembly, Britain was the only League member not to have declared support for an oil sanction. Desperate for a way out, Cabinet agreed on December 2 to Hoare’s proposal that Britain should accept the oil sanction in principle but postpone the date of its implementation so long as peace talks offered the prospect of a reasonable territorial settlement. In the meantime, while the war in Abyssinia continued, Britain should simultaneously work at conciliating Mussolini and pressuring him in cooperation with France. Cabinet instructed Hoare to continue talks with the French aimed at arriving at a settlement acceptable to Mussolini.⁴⁶

Following two days of talks in Paris between Hoare and French Prime Minister Laval, Cabinet on December 9, 1935 approved a plan under which the League would agree to Mussolini's occupation of large tracts of the Abyssinian Empire. When news of the plan was leaked soon afterward, the uproar in public and parliament over the British government's betrayal of the League, Abyssinia and its recent election manifesto was such that within two weeks the Hoare-Laval plan was a dead-letter. Hoare was forced to resign as Foreign Minister to save the Government.

CREDIBILITY GAP IN THE FAR EAST

But even with that level of appeasement the danger of concurrent operations against both a European power and Japan could not be ignored. Only weeks later, on January 17, 1936, the Secretary of State for War, Alfred Duff Cooper, circulated a memorandum to cabinet members which reflected growing concern in the War Office about Britain's position in the Far East. Entitled 'The Importance of Anglo-Japanese Friendship', it advised that the state of Anglo-Japanese relations was unsatisfactory and the level of tension could only be reduced if the British Government was more friendly in its attitude to Japan. It went even further than the DRC's December Report, noting that "... so long as affairs in Europe remain unsettled, our interests in the Far East, at any rate north of Singapore, are at the mercy of the Japanese." The recommendation which followed was brutally frank. "It would seem a reasonable precaution, therefore, to try, by every means and even at some cost, to safeguard by amicable agreement with Japan, interests which we are unable to protect by military means." (Emphasis added.) It then advised that it would be logical for Britain, considering its strategic position, to take advantage of a number of overtures which Japan had recently made.⁴⁷

However six percent of Britain's total overseas investment at that date was in China and a number of its powerful bankers and importers and exporters were heavily dependent upon the Chinese import/export trade. It was in a cleft stick. It could support Japan's push for closer economic and political relations with China or the alternative concept of dividing China into spheres of influence. If it did so it would weaken its own commercial position and undermine its relations with Chiang Kai-shek and each of the competing Chinese power-lords, but if it refused to show some support for Japan there was a real possibility that Japan would simply 'brush it aside.' If it chose to side with the Nanking regime in the hope of retaining a fruitful long term relationship with a re-invigorated China it would have to concede "outdated imperial privileges such as extra-territoriality and the Treaty Ports" and directly confront Japan in alliance with China.⁴⁸ Whichever course Britain took required political and commercial concessions and military resources which it could not provide, and would also cause repercussions for either the United States, the Soviet Union, Germany, or France, Holland, Spain and Portugal as the other European powers with major Asian colonies. It dare not move.

The government's international credibility was in tatters. More than ever, it was searching for some means of relief. To add to its concerns a bitterly contested election campaign was being fought in Spain between a reorganized coalition of the Left, known as the Popular Front, and the army-backed Fascist coalition of the Right. In view of Italy's involvement with the Spanish Right it was wise for Britain to wait until it was clear which way the winds of fortune were blowing in that country before making a decision on Italy and Abyssinia. At the election on February 16, 1936, the Popular Front won a narrow working majority, but the country was polarized. The Right made it clear it would oppose any reforms, while the Socialists insisted that the government must press on with reform immediately. The signs for the future were ominous but the common assessment was that in the circumstances Italy was not likely to either want to or be able to intervene, and Britain's least dangerous option was to close ranks against it. Therefore on February 26, Cabinet finally voted in favour of oil sanctions against Italy as the least contentious option, and a week later, on March 4, the decision was announced in Geneva by Britain's new Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden. By then, however, the action was largely symbolic, since sanctions had already been undermined by the actions of United States suppliers. Just as it had in the early stages of the First World War, the United States government and its oil companies had wasted no time in taking advantage of squabbles between European powers to make some extra profit at Europe's expense. During February, oil exports from the US to Italy reached three times the normal flow.⁴⁹ But it was not only the British government which had undermined its own credibility. The United States government was also open to charges of hypocrisy, double standards and playing to the rules of sheer self-interest. Its neutrality was either a matter of circumstantial convenience or lip service.

THE US MOCKS AN EMBARGO

Then, at the same time that the United States and its oil companies were making a mockery of Britain's oil embargo against Italy, Congress was debating – and passed – an extension of its Neutrality Act with additional clauses prohibiting loans to belligerents in foreign wars. Trade in materials other than arms and munitions could continue, of course. The sale of oil – the most important strategic resource to a nation at war (or facing the threat of war) after arms and munitions – continued. Mussolini continued to press his advantage in Abyssinia and Hitler was well pleased, too. And although it hardly affected his plans, this new provision in the Neutrality Act prevented the US from providing financial aid to Germany's opponents since most of those countries had defaulted on their World War I war debts and were ineligible for private loans under the provisions of another act, the Johnson Debt-Default Act of June 1934 which was passed in an attempt to coerce the Allies into paying their debts. All of the warring European nations except Finland had defaulted on those debts.⁵⁰

Then the day after Eden's announcement of the oil embargo, March 5, the British Government presented a new White Paper on Defence. The measures it outlined followed the recommendations of the DRC report of the previous November, to be funded by recourse to a Defence Loan. But there was one major departure from the DRC's recommendations. Despite the illogic of providing an expeditionary force with no reserves to back it up, Cabinet had approved the five regular divisions of the Army's expeditionary force, but not the twelve territorial divisions. Chamberlain had again decisively shaped cabinet's views. Britain could simply not afford to provide for home defence, its imperial commitments, and a continental army as well. The British public had no stomach for continental adventures, he argued.⁵¹ Britain was better off building up its air force as a deterrent to any aggressive designs by Germany. In the meantime it would be necessary to seek diplomatic solutions in Europe.

Talk in Whitehall began to focus on the need for a 'general settlement.' It was clear that an overall peace deal would mean that many of Germany's claims must be met, including the possibility of the return of Germany's colonies. But the most pressing issue was the question of the Rhineland de-militarized zone, a stretch of German territory along the border of France in which all military activity was prohibited by the Treaty of Versailles. By early 1936, following the reincorporation of the Saar, it was increasingly apparent that Hitler would soon act to reclaim it. In early March Eden floated the idea of offering Rhineland in return for an Air Limitation Pact before Hitler had the chance to seize it. He was too late.⁵²

THE RHINELAND

On March 7, 1936, well satisfied with Britain's two-day old Defence White Paper, Hitler reoccupied the Rhineland with a force of only three battalions, which would have been far too small for the task if Britain had backed France. The commander had been ordered to stage a fighting withdrawal if his force was challenged by French troops.⁵³ Hitler had taken full advantage of Britain and France's troubles with Mussolini, together with a regimental rebellion in Japan that had triggered violent anti-foreign propaganda by that country, increased tension between Japan and China, and Chiang Kai-shek's appeals for Western support. In announcing the Rhineland occupation Hitler denounced the Franco-Russian treaty of May 1935 in which the two countries pledged to come to each other's aid in the event of military attack. He offered non-aggression pacts to both Eastern and Western countries and he offered to rejoin the League of Nations. He also offered an air pact. Britain, desperate to avoid military confrontation, eagerly grasped Hitler's terms to block insistence on tough action by France and Belgium. The only response from the West was a resolution from the League on March 12 denouncing Germany as a treaty breaker, plus a proposal to hold a Five-Power Conference between Britain, France, Belgium, Germany and Italy to reach a general settlement on new treaty arrangements in the west.⁵⁴

Having nothing to fear from further negotiation, Hitler agreed to the Conference proposal. Then, taking full advantage of Germany's irritation at the League's reproach, he dissolved the Reichstag and staged a plebiscite on March 29 in which he gained 98.8 percent support for his policies. It was an even more resounding demonstration of support than his plebiscite of November 1933. He had reason to be well pleased with events. The re-militarization of the Rhineland had pushed the German front-line to the French border. Germany was now in a position to launch a surprise attack in the west, while the French Army could no longer move unopposed into Germany if it should be required to come to the defence of Austria.

From Austria's point of view the situation had worsened considerably. In addition to the weakening of France's position with regard to Germany, its own capacity to resist Hitler had also been undermined by the Abyssinian crisis. The estrangement of Italy and Britain meant that Italy might now become subject to a new relationship with Germany. Thus, although Austria had voted with Italy in the League, it could not rely on its southern neighbour's continuing protocol support in the event of a showdown with Germany, which was working to undermine Austria's domestic stability as quickly as it could. Austria was therefore dependent upon an 'understanding' between France and Britain about their treaty obligations which was of very uncertain quality.

For Britain, however, a military commitment to Austria and France was simply out of the question. With a continued threat to its Imperial interests from Japan the Far East, its paltry military resources were simply insufficient to act to restrain Hitler in Europe while Italy still threatened its lines of communication and supply in the Mediterranean and the Middle East. War with any one of those powers could only serve as an invitation to the others to join in. The result would be the dismemberment of the entire British Empire. The weakness of Britain's position was driven home in early May when Abyssinia surrendered to Mussolini's forces and King Emmanuel of Italy was proclaimed Emperor. Having lost all hope of British or French intervention if it faced a crisis with Germany, Austria found it advisable to endorse an agreement for the restoration of friendly relations with Germany. It did so in July. But by then Britain's 'inconvenient dilemma' had been complicated by another factor. A second Arab Revolt had broken out in Palestine.

THE ARAB REVOLT

1936 marked a turning point in the affairs of the Middle East. Throughout the region there had been a dramatic shift in perceptions of European colonial power as a result of tensions in Europe. Italy's invasion of Abyssinia clearly exposed Britain's weakness in the Eastern Mediterranean, and her impotence in the face of Hitler's occupation of the Rhineland had dealt a further blow to her standing and prestige. With a European war appearing imminent, there was widespread hope it would 'provide the Arabs with the chance to realise their full political and national aims.'⁵⁵

In the face of continued Jewish immigration and land purchases, the Palestinian Arab community had throughout the 1930's continued to press for reform of the Mandate arrangements. Spurred on by the establishment of the self-governing Kingdoms of Iraq and Trans-Jordan as Britain's consolation prize to the Arabs for the broken promise of an independent Arab state, Palestinian leaders had demanded similar treatment in the belief that the formation of a representative government would enable them to use their numerical majority to curtail Jewish immigration. The Passfield White Paper of 1930 had gone some way to meeting their demands by proposing the establishment of a Legislative Council made of elected and appointed representatives from the Muslim, Christian and Jewish communities. Despite its limited powers, Arab political leaders were inclined to accept the proposal as a first-step toward full self-government. But vehement opposition by the Jewish Agency successfully blocked implementation of the proposal for four years, until continuing unrest forced Mandate authorities in late 1935 to propose proceeding with the plan with or without Jewish participation.⁵⁶

The British authorities had good reason for concern. Greatly facilitated by the Ha'avara Agreement between the Jewish Agency and Nazi Germany, legal Jewish immigration to Palestine in 1935 had reached a record 65,000 people. By 1936 the Jewish population had more than doubled from 175,000 in 1931. With Jewish land purchases continuing apace, and Zionist authorities rigorously enforcing a 'Jewish labour' policy on Jewish employers to prevent widespread unemployment from undermining British support for large-scale immigration, Arab discontent had inevitably intensified.⁵⁷ The mandatory authorities were keenly aware that many Palestinian Arabs had watched with interest when, following Mussolini's invasion of Abyssinia in late 1935, Egyptian nationalists had staged violent demonstration in Cairo against the strengthening of the British garrison in Egypt and were rewarded with the restoration of their suspended constitution.⁵⁸

Thus, when the British Cabinet in March 1936 finally rejected proposals to establish the Legislative Council – almost in the same breath as announcing the Defence White Paper – the scene was set for an explosion. In mid-April a series of reprisal killings between Arabs and Jews provided the trigger. Beginning with sporadic attacks on Jews, Arab violence soon escalated into riots and demonstrations. Within a few days calls to implement a previously proposed general strike were being made throughout the country. By the end of the month a succession of rapidly formed local strike committees had come under the direction of a newly established Higher Arab Committee involving four Muslim and two Christian parties, and led by the Mufti of Jerusalem, Hajj-Amin al-Husayni. Its first act was to announce that the strike would continue until the British Government agreed to the cessation of Jewish immigration, the prohibition of the transfer of Arab Lands to Jews, and the establishment of a national government responsible to a Representative Council.⁵⁹

The commencement of the strike was accompanied by escalating violence. By early May organized armed bands began to appear, and with the situation out of control, on May 13 the British Cabinet decided to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the disorders. Then, with appalling timing, the Government announced approval of a new round of immigration certificates on May 18. The rebellion intensified. Initially concentrated in cities and towns, the rapid assertion of control by the British in the major centres merely caused the centre of gravity of the revolt to be shifted to the countryside. A number of large British targets were bombed, including an attempt to blow up the main railway line from Palestine to Egypt. By June the revolt had spread to the point where guerilla-style armed bands were operating all over the countryside with the support of the local population.⁶⁰

At the same time an important change occurred in the character of the revolt. Until then the Mufti had distanced himself from the rebellion and had refrained from using his position as head of the Palestine's Supreme Muslim Council (SMC) to foment it. No religious slogans were adopted, and Friday sermons avoided a militant tone. But in June Muslim leaders began to appeal to the masses to support the revolt in the name of Islam, citing alleged insults to the Qur'an by British troops and emphasizing the threat of losing control of Muslim Holy places to the Zionists. In a letter to the British High Commissioner from the SMC, the Mufti wrote: "The Council believe that the principal motive which moved the Jews to think of making Palestine a National Home for them is a religious one. That being the case, the Zionist case is fundamentally and principally a religious case." The reason the Jews had refused to establish their National Home in other, better places, he continued, was due solely to "a religious idea which they maintain and which aims at the reconstruction of the temple of Solomon in the Place of the Holy Masjed Al-Aqsa [Al Aqsa Mosque]."⁶¹ Of course, the Mufti was well aware that far from being religiously inspired, Zionism was a predominantly secular movement whose primary aim was to deliver the Jews from Christian oppression in Europe. Only a small, albeit influential section of its following were motivated by the religious factors he cited. But Zionist leaders had been more than willing to use religious arguments when it suited their purposes, and now he was going to fight them with the same weapon. The character of, or the emphasis in, the Jewish-Arab struggle for dominance in Palestine shifted significantly.

Equally disturbing for the British, however, was a growing concern over events in Palestine, in other Arab countries. Bolstered by the Mufti's call to defend the holy places of Islam, efforts by the HAC to foster support among the wider Arab population proved fruitful, particularly in Syria and Iraq where pan-Arabic sentiment was high. In June the Iraqi Prime Minister warned the British Ambassador that 'amicable relations between their two countries would be damaged if the present state of affairs were allowed to continue.' In Saudi Arabia, the British representative was told that Ibn Saud had received 'many appeals from Moslems all over the world, begging him to take the lead in liberating Arabs from the menace of Jewish domination.' Even the Muslim press in India published demands that Britain change its policy, and mass meetings were held in support of the demand.⁶²

At the beginning of July, desperate to end the conflict in order that the Commission could proceed, the Foreign Office began cautiously promoting mediation by Arab Rulers, giving its blessing to a joint effort by Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Yemen to stop the strike. Transjordan and Egypt were excluded, the former to avoid a clash between Abdullah and his family's old rival Ibn Saud, and the latter due to fears that Egyptian intervention in Palestinian affairs may strengthen her position in Anglo-Egyptian Treaty negotiations which were then in progress. But the effort was cut short when Cabinet rejected the Arabs' precondition that Jewish immigration be ended first. Subsequent attempts to mediate by Abdullah and Iraqi Foreign Minister Nuri Al Said broke against the same rock.⁶³

HITLER, BRITAIN AND THE HOUSE OF ROTHSCHILD

In the meantime Hitler had briefed his closest aides, Göring and Blumberg, on the need to prepare for war within four years. This required economic and strategic planning to raise military strength to the limits of Germany's potential.⁶⁴ This, in turn, required the utilization of the entire raw material, food resources and manufacturing capacity of the entire German nation. In Hitler's view that included his native Austria and "the artificial state of Czechoslovakia which the Great Powers had established after the Great War as a means of preventing national reunification" which was vital to enable the German race to take its proper place in world leadership. Göring was made responsible for the four-year plan. The urgency of the situation, Hitler said, did not permit gentle scruples in dealing with those whose cooperation was necessary. Nothing was to stand in the way of German self-sufficiency for war. Government planning and diplomatic activity, especially in solidifying connections with Britain, were to be pursued relentlessly. King Edward VIII had succeeded to the throne only a few months before and as he was known to favour peace, with close relations between Britain and Germany, he was to be a particular target of diplomatic activity.⁶⁵

Hitler was in a very strong position at that time, both in foreign and domestic affairs, although he knew just as well as his military leaders that he had to rely largely on bluff and division between the Western powers to achieve his aims. Germany simply did not yet have the military capacity to enforce them.

So Göring set out on his none-too-diplomatic efforts to coerce Austria and Czechoslovakia into industrial cooperation. It was made quite clear to Austria's Chancellor, Dr Von Schuschnigg, that, as part of the German race, Austria was to link its industrial production into the Göring plan and that the alternative was a "spontaneous uprising" of the kind the West had been so expert at producing. The result of that would be the reunion of the German-speaking peoples of Austria and Germany, and relief for Austria's Germans from economic oppression by non-Aryan minorities. That was simply another way of saying that the Jews of Austria would be brought under the same regulations as those in Germany and that they would forfeit all property to Aryans.

The implications for Austria in either course were abhorrent, and its independence was likely to be short-lived unless it was assured of support from Italy, France or Britain in the event of a showdown with Hitler. Schuschnigg stalled for time and discussed the German "proposals" with the three Rothschild brothers with whom he was on close terms and who were among the chief financiers and industrialists in Austria. He had no real alternative to political appeasement and with time running out he signed a cooperation agreement with Germany on July 11, 1936. He hoped it would be a workable compromise under which Austria could preserve its independence and safeguard its citizens. But in secret clauses he had agreed to pardon Nazi offenders and to allow Nazis to occupy important government positions, so Hitler had more than a toe in the door and the Rothschilds knew it.⁶⁶ However there was a shock in store for Schuschnigg that day – and a boost for Hitler – when they learned of two reports in the London Times. One concerned the Austro-German negotiations. It noted the relief for Germans in Austria who were linked by race but left “sulking in the corner.” Germany’s proposals would bring not only “mutual economic concessions” but also “restoration of normal political collaboration between two peoples closely related by race and language, having common interests and equally affected by policies running counter to their requirements.” The word “Jews” was not used at all. But the other directly concerned the Jewish question and referred to debates in the House of Commons over claims that police were favouring Fascist groups and oppressing Jewish groups. Though the government tried to play down the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Britain it could not deny it, and it had to be very careful to ensure it retained the confidence and support of the leading representatives of Britain’s Jewish community at a critical time in Britain’s affairs. But, of equal importance, with the Royal Commissioners about to embark for Jerusalem in response to the Arab Revolt, the government could not afford to alienate the House of Rothschild at a critical stage in negotiations over the future of Palestine.

Four days later, July 15, 1936, the Times said in an editorial that Hitler was to be congratulated on the conclusion of the cooperation agreement between Germany and Austria. It was welcomed as “freely made (with Hitler) by the Austrian Government (and it) cannot but help to stabilize and pacify Central Europe, improve its economic conditions, and pave the way for a permanent settlement between the two main branches of the German race.” The Times was arguably the best informed and most influential newspaper in the world. Diplomats and other well-informed readers who knew how Hitler worked and what was going on in Europe were staggered by the use of the expression “freely made.” The credibility of the Times began to come under scrutiny and a few people began to wonder what was going on.

Among those who knew all too well were the Rothschilds. Two of the brothers, Alphonse and Eugene, promptly transferred their wealth and moved their families to France and Switzerland but Baron Louis refused to flee before it was clear that his immense business empire and the network of industries he controlled throughout central Europe was irrevocably lost. The cornerstone of his empire, and a resource which was vital to Hitler if he was going to achieve his four year plan, was the vast complex of coal mines, (among the largest in Central Europe), and iron and steel works, Vitkowitz, at Moravska Ostrava in Czechoslovakia.

Baron Louis reasoned that if Vitkowitz was transferred from Austrian to British ownership it would help to secure his own position and that it would also be of benefit to each of Austria, Czechoslovakia and Britain. He summoned legal advisers from both Prague and London to Vienna to begin the long and complicated process of transferring the shares in Vitkowitz from his company in Vienna to Allied Assurance which was still controlled by the House of Rothschild in Britain.^{67 68} He appears to have had little difficulty persuading each of the governments to his point of view. For Austria the transfer meant a loss in government revenue, but this was more than offset by the elimination of a point of friction with Czechoslovakia, the continuing goodwill of the House of Rothschild, the undermining of Hitler’s demands for economic “cooperation” from Austria, and the assumption of a greater level of support from Britain in the government’s efforts to resist Hitler.

Baron Louis was able to tell the Czech government that continued Austrian control posed a threat to it because of the growing influence of the Nazi Party through senior appointments in Austria's government services. However there was a much greater benefit for Czechoslovakia in having an increased British stake in the country. Hitler would be much less likely to force a showdown with it if substantial British interests were involved. It was therefore implicit, if not explicit, that Czechoslovakia would have British backing if it had to tough-out a takeover bid by Germany of the type that Austria was then facing.

The British government was not blind to the situation which it was accepting, nor to the fact that a commitment to Czechoslovakia was in conflict with the ruling Conservative view that Hitler was a buffer against Communism and that he should be encouraged to look east. A greater British stake in central Europe must have a bottling-up effect on Hitler if Britain were to adopt the same militaristic posture in Czechoslovakia as it had always done elsewhere in protecting the commercial interests of its nationals. But there were several benefits for Britain in the transfer. There were financial benefits for both the government and investors and there was increased political bargaining power in dealings with both Czechoslovakia and Germany. There was also an important benefit in having direct access to, and British commercial control of, a major European iron and steel complex because the government was embroiled in a serious domestic political controversy over the state of the steel industry in Britain. Official predictions for steel supply and demand during the 1930's had proved wildly astray and the scrapping of plans by an industry consortium for a major new steel works at Jarrow-on-Tyne had been announced on July 10, the day before Schuschnigg signed his cooperation agreement with Hitler. Socio-economic impact studies by local government and health bodies, environment protection groups and labour organizations had lead to strong opposition to the project and to conditions being imposed which made the project uneconomic.⁶⁹

But there was to be no respite for the British government. While Baron Louis pressed on with his plan to circumvent that of Hitler, and the British government pressed on with its efforts to prevent the loss of its imperial benefits, another crisis erupted in Europe to further complicate Britain's already difficult position. As expected, Spain was engulfed in civil war.

THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR

After the election in February and in spite of the signs that a right wing coup was still a real probability, major agrarian reforms were carried out and anti-clerical measures were tightened again by the Popular Front coalition of radicals, socialists and Communists. This drew together even more firmly the traditional alliance of the landed gentry and the church. The murder of a monarchist deputy early in July provided the justification for a Nationalist military rebellion and on July 17, 1936, a well planned military uprising began in garrison towns throughout Spain. It was backed by the Vatican, Mussolini, Hitler and Portugal's arch-conservative Premier Antonio Salazar. Each was honoring the spirit of their concordats, of course. This collaboration in a rebellion to bring down another legally constituted government occurred two years after the Reich Church had been established at Hitler's direction, while the churches in Germany were suffering severe oppression and while Cardinal Pacelli was using all his influence to suppress opposition to the continuation of the Reich Concordat. It illustrates the parallel lines along which the Vatican and the Nazis were running and the expectation which the Curia was clinging to that the Vatican's fortunes and its role in the world could be sustained through collaboration with Hitler and other Fascist regimes.⁷⁰

Britain, to which many countries turned for a lead, was facing its enormous conflicts of interest and opted for a policy of nonintervention. That meant it sat on the fence. So did France. Both governments were supposedly committed to the principle of popularly elected responsible government and therefore they could have been expected to support the elected national government. But with Hitler and Mussolini lending their support to Franco's forces and in view of Hitler's occupation of the Rhineland, neither could afford to intervene on the side of the elected government unless it wanted to risk an escalation of the Spanish Civil War into a European war between the great powers.⁷¹ Britain also had to remember that a popular front government was likely to demand the return of Gibraltar to Spain; that the king in exile, who had not renounced the throne, was connected through marriage to the British monarchy; and that some of Britain's prominent finance houses were involved in key resource extractive industries in Spain. Notable among them was the House of Rothschild with Rio Tinto copper mines and the Almaden mercury mines which would both be high on the list for nationalization if the Socialists and Communists dominated the popular front government. And if Britain would not collaborate with Soviet Russia in an effort to clip Hitler's wings there was no real likelihood of it collaborating in a scheme to support a government which included Communists in preference to a right wing Fascist regime.^{72 73} Officially, therefore, Britain supported French efforts to get each of the major powers to adopt a policy of non-intervention while its own conservative groups quietly but actively supported the military rebels.

Italy's position was quite clear. Mussolini wanted a Fascist government. He also wanted an agreement for naval bases in Spain so that he could challenge France's position in the Mediterranean and Britain's at Gibraltar. And he also needed the Vatican's support for his annexation of Abyssinia, although that was reasonably assured by the Vatican's opportunity to gain control of the long-independent Ethiopian Orthodox Church.

Hitler's position was equally clear. He wanted to destroy the possibility of a Communist or Socialist power to his west involving, probably, an alliance between France and Spain; he wanted to encourage dissent between France and Italy; and he hoped for an ally with Nazi sympathies controlling the gateway to the Mediterranean.

Russia welcomed the idea of a republic with a popular front coalition which could well become the first Communist government in the Western block, although there were those who said that it was in Russia's interests to encourage Hitler to look westward. Russian support for the leftist forces was soon forthcoming.

France, which could have been expected to support the republic as a matter of principle, was caught in a bind too. It shared Britain's conflict of interest because of its citizens' investments and it also feared the prospect of being in league with Russia in sponsoring a potentially Communist dominated government on its southern border. It was embarrassed that Paris was home to the Communist International Comintern.

Without immediate help from Salazar the revolt would have collapsed very quickly, but when Hitler and Mussolini both responded to urgent appeals from the commander of the main Nationalist forces, General Francisco Franco, a long drawn out civil war was assured. The legally elected government was pushed aside in the rush and competing governments were set up by the Nationalists, supported by the bulk of the army which had been officially dissolved, and the Republicans, dominated by the trade unions and supported by workers' militias in place of the dissolved army. Mussolini sent ground forces, but Hitler, having extracted an agreement for mineral concessions from Franco, sent one hundred aircraft, including twenty transport planes, which helped ferry Franco's troops from Morocco (over which he gained control in only four days from the initial uprising) to enable him to march on Madrid. To offset that support for the gaggle of right wing Nationalists, the Soviet Union supplied tanks, aircraft and a military mission to assist the Republicans. But there was yet another sideshow for the politicians to step around.

THE WORLD CONGRESS OF FAITHS

The World Congress of Faiths was actually meeting in London to encourage peace through religious understanding at the time that the Spanish Civil War erupted, but few people in Britain would have been very concerned with it. It was widely considered to be a bit of a colonial novelty because Christianity was paramount and it was going to replace all the other faiths in due course anyway, and passions were running high around the Western World over the Spanish question. The whole world was still struggling to shake off the Great Depression and the alternatives of government by popular will, or by traditional power brokers backed by military force, appeared to be more clearly illustrated in Spain than anywhere else.⁷⁴ Then there was the question of the 'right' – or the disgrace – of the Vatican's interference in it as one of those traditional power brokers.

The World Congress of Faiths, to which Britain played a somewhat reluctant host, provided quite a boost for each of the pre-Messianic faiths of Asia, and for Buddhism and Hinduism in particular. It also drew attention to the existence of Islam as a competitor to Christianity but the British authorities, the churches and the compliant media were eager to play this aspect down. The fact that they were to be involved in the congress at the heart of the empire which had actively sought to supplant them with its own church – together with that church – was a challenge to the self-understanding of both the British government and the church-at-large, and an embarrassment to them as well. It is to the credit of the hierarchy of the Church of England that it cooperated, at least to the extent of allowing the hallowed sanctuaries of St. Paul's and Canterbury Cathedrals to be used for interfaith worship services, and a number of Reformed churchmen participated, while the Vatican, consistent with its attitude to other churches let alone other faiths, does not appear to have recognized the Congress in any way.⁷⁵ Jewish participation in the Congress did not seem to pose such a challenge as the participation of the other faiths. Jews and Judaism did, after all, have recognized roles in British life.

The organizer for the Congress, Sir Francis Younghusband, was an Indian-born British soldier, explorer and authority on Asian religions. Its President was the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda, and among the participants were the Aga Khan, Sir Herbert Samuel, and the president of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Dr. J.L. Magnes. In a paper read on his behalf, Dr. Magnes told the congress that fellowship between people of different faiths was difficult enough in times of peace. He queried whether it was possible in times of war. A large part of the world was already at war and the whole world soon would be, he said. Then, in a remarkably accurate and frank assessment of the situation, he added that the religions of the world had done nothing to inculcate a spirit of unselfishness, disinterested service and reconciliation.⁷⁶ He could have laid responsibility on the politicians who manipulated the faiths and not on the faiths as such.

A general meeting which followed the congress took up the spirit of Dr Magnes' challenge and set up a committee with members drawn from several religions and several nations. It was instructed to continue the work begun at the congress with the aim of continuing to spread world fellowship through religion. But, as with the ecumenical movement, the establishment of the interfaith dialogue movement was a response to a crisis situation. Unfortunately the Christian Church, which has to accept the greatest share of responsibility for both the crisis and the solution, had very few people who understood the situation. Those who did understand were in no position to take initiatives which could bring quick results. However, although the churches sought to play down the significance of the Congress, it is reasonable to assume that the proceedings of the World Congress of Faiths, coupled with the political turmoil in India and South East Asia, were an important consideration in the planning for a series of ecumenical conferences, and in the debates and decisions of those conferences, including the International Missionary Conference at Tambaram which was planned for December 1938.

But back to Spain ...

In spite of the civil war and the fact that Nationalist forces had gained control of some regions, the fragmented and ill-coordinated Republican government pressed on with programs of industrial and farm collectivization. There were fantastic atrocities committed by both sides and it was inevitable in the circumstances that the Catholic Church suffered heavy losses in priests and religious killed and properties destroyed or commandeered. The Vatican had, as already noted, been heavily involved in precipitating the overthrow of the constitutionally elected Republican governments and as the war progressed it threw its diplomatic weight behind the Nationalists. In September Pius XI said publicly that it was the "Satanic enterprise" of Marxism that had prompted the war and he blessed those who, he said, were defending "the rights and honour of God against a wild explosion of forces so savage and so cruel as to be well-nigh incredible.” Probably in response to such glowing tributes Franco declared that “Spain shall be an empire turned toward God.”⁷⁷ On October 1 he assumed control of the Nationalist government, gathered the Fascists, Falange and Carlists into a unified movement and the tide began to turn against the Republic. At that time the Communist International, operating from its headquarters in Paris, set out to recruit and train International Brigades to support the Republican forces and the first contingent of 500 trainees arrived in Spain on October 14, 1936. They were followed by a total of about 60,000 volunteers organized into seven brigades with a maximum strength at any time of 20,000 troops, including some women, from fifty countries. France was the source of nearly half of the total (28,000), while substantial numbers came from Germany, Austria, Poland, Italy, the United States, Britain, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Canada, Hungary and Belgium and formed, where they could, battalions carrying their national name. The American unit took the name ‘The American Abraham Lincoln Battalion.’⁷⁸

A REPRESENTATIVE OF ‘CHRIST’S VICAR’ IN NEW YORK

Just as the recruiting campaign for the International Brigades was getting under way, on October 8 Pacelli sailed for New York on another of his missions as a papal legate or, in the words of Pius XI, “as the representative of Christ’s Vicar on earth abroad.” In fact while Pius XI was trying to consolidate the Vatican’s position and gain support for its policies by having Pacelli make these journeys he was also trying to impose Pacelli, “his favoured protégé,” on the Catholic Church as his personally chosen successor. “I make him travel so that he may get to know the world and the world may get to know him. He will be a splendid pope,” he told a senior Vatican official.⁷⁹ This was the first visit by a Vatican secretary of state – or a papal legate – to North America and its primary objective was to secure an exchange of diplomatic representatives between the United States and the Vatican, but it took on even more significance because of the need to justify Vatican and Italian policy in both Abyssinia and Spain. Pacelli had to ensure that the United States neither threw its weight behind the Republicans in Spain nor encouraged Americans to enlist as volunteers in the International Brigades. The United States certainly had security interests to consider. This was clear from the debates over its involvement in Europe. But Pacelli need not have been too worried about US intervention. It had so many commercial interests to consider that it was bound to shelter behind its Neutrality Act.

On one hand the Roosevelt administration was well aware that the involvement of both Hitler’s Germany and the Soviet Union in the Spanish Civil War “raised the spectre of threats to American security and interests.” On the other hand its petroleum industry and its arms manufacturers wanted open access to those markets for death and destruction and the US would forfeit the opportunity for profits and employment to someone else if it did not oblige. Public opinion, being moulded largely by commercial interests, was overwhelmingly in favour of “impartial neutrality.” Thus the Neutrality Act, again due to expire, was retained but with yet more features. The president was given discretionary power to authorize the sale of goods to belligerents, for cash, provided the goods were not carried in American vessels. Long term loans and arms shipments to belligerents were still not approved, but there were back doors as every good salesperson knows. United States power brokers “hoped to gain all and sacrifice nothing.” National interest and profits could be preserved by the selective application of ‘cash and carry,’ but restrictions on the sale of arms, long term loans, and travel by American citizens on belligerent vessels would prevent the nation from becoming directly involved in war.⁸⁰

A visiting secretary of state would normally expect to negotiate with the secretary of state in the host country and perhaps a courtesy call on the head of state may be on the agenda. But Pacelli was not content with that. As papal legate he expected to talk business – diplomatic business – with the head of state personally. However there was a presidential election in full swing and Roosevelt certainly did not want religion elevated to a bigger issue than it already was. Pacelli was kept waiting until immediately before he was due to return to Rome, after the election, but he was then one of the president’s first callers. Cardinal Spellman had arranged for him to lunch privately with Roosevelt at Hyde Park on November 6, the day after his landslide re-election. Using Vatican concern that the United States had recognized the Soviet Union as a lever, Pacelli secured the president’s agreement that he would reinstate the diplomatic links which had been severed in 1870, in the wake of Protestant hostility to the anti-democratic Syllabus of Errors, when the papal states were dissolved and the papacy lost its temporal authority. However that agreement came at a price. Roosevelt expected a favour in return. In Detroit there was a Catholic priest, Fr. Charles Coughlin, whose weekly radio broadcast reached an audience of fifteen million. Coughlin was “anti-New Deal and blamed America’s ills on Roosevelt, the Jews, the Communists, and the ‘godless capitalists.’” He was an electoral embarrassment and Roosevelt wanted him ‘muzzled.’ Pacelli obliged. Two days later Coughlin announced that he was making his last broadcast.⁸¹

So the civil war in Spain dragged on, and despite the deep ideological divisions it generated between people of opposing sympathies in both of their countries, the governments of Britain and France successfully reduced it, in the words of one historian, to a “noisy, emotive and cruel sideshow.”⁸² France’s capacity to intervene was undermined even further by attacks on Premier Leon Blum, founder of the modern French Socialist movement and the first Jew and the first Socialist to serve as premier of France. He had offered support for the Popular Front but non-Jewish bankers mounted a campaign to discredit him. The Fascist Conspiracy of the Hooded Men, which was something akin to the Ku Klux Klan, mounted a political campaign to bring his government down.⁸³ Many Roman Catholic schools continued to use Pascal’s bigotted fantasies as text books on Christian-Jewish relations and “the terrible punishment which weighs down that decide race”⁸⁴; and some French commentators even went as far as to preach “better Hitler than Blum.” The atmosphere was so bizarre that for a time Blum was fearful that the Spanish Civil War could even envelop France.

But within a few months there was another sideshow – out of sight and out of mind as far as the British public was concerned – almost a hemisphere away. This one demonstrated the hypocrisy of the US position even more than the one in Spain and made the Roosevelt administration aware that neither isolation nor neutrality towards belligerents were realistic policies in a world of instant communications, high speed long distant transport and intense competition for trade. The second sideshow was Japan's attack on China in July 1937. We shall come to it shortly.

PALESTINE, THE AXIS ACCORD AND THE ANTI-COMINTERN PACT

In the meantime, Britain continued to contend with its other sideshow, in Palestine. In the context of the increasingly critical international situation in which Britain was enmeshed, the significance of the wider interests that centred on Palestine was enormous and Peel's task was of far broader import than merely the settlement of the immediate conflict between Jews and Palestinian Arabs. Those wider interests made his task extremely delicate. On the one hand, given her parlous financial position and her increasing rearmament needs, the need for the British Government to retain the strong support of the international Jewish community to weather the impending crisis was paramount. On the other hand, however, it was equally vital that Britain retained stability in the Middle East. Further conflict in Palestine would not only jeopardize continued support for Britain in the Arab world, it might well tempt Mussolini into launching a 'mad dog' attack on British interests in the Mediterranean and the Middle East. With the likelihood that Italy may soon seek an alliance with Germany, the threat of such an attack had become more important. The Austro-German friendship agreement of July, 1936, coming only four months after Hitler re-occupied the Rhineland, had effectively ended Mussolini's hope of preventing a German takeover of Austria, and this meant that Germany and Italy were free to seek a rapprochement at Britain's expense.

As if to reinforce Britain's concern at the increasing interest shown by other Arab countries, at the end of August, 1936, a group of 200 Iraqi, Syrian and Trans-Jordanian volunteers, headed by a former Ottoman officer, arrived to assist the local forces. By that time the Mandate authorities had concluded that either the Arab demand for the cessation of immigration would have to be met, or Britain would have to declare Martial Law and wage all-out war on the rebels. On September 2, cabinet weighed the arguments. The Colonial and Foreign Secretaries favoured the suspension of immigration but the War Secretary opposed it, arguing that there should be no surrender to violence. He noted that the re-disposition of British forces under the recently concluded Anglo-Egyptian treaty had increased Palestine's importance for imperial defence, and that while the Jews would never accept Arab terms, "it was open to us to make terms with the Jews with which in the long run the Arabs would acquiesce." In line with his recommendations, Cabinet ordered that Martial Law be declared and that the Palestine garrison be reinforced from Britain with a full army division.⁸⁵

Two days later, on September 4, with little progress in negotiations towards the Five Power Conference which had been agreed to in the wake of Hitler's reoccupation of the Rhineland, David Lloyd George, the former prime minister whose influence had weakened during the 1930's, joined the growing list of British dignitaries who called on Hitler in an effort to avoid a breach between Britain and Germany. He told Hitler that action was needed for the two countries to reach agreement within a few months, otherwise they would drift apart.⁸⁶

Then, in the face of Britain's declaration of Martial Law, and with the onset of the agricultural season leading to calls from Arab citrus growers to end the strike, the HAC began to look for a face saving way to end the revolt. They promptly requested that Britain invite the Arab kings to call for the end of the disorders, but the government refused, suggesting instead that the HAC approach the Arab rulers directly. Not content with Britain's attitude, the Arab Chamber of Commerce in Jerusalem submitted a petition through the then German Consul, Dohle, urging a revision of the Transfer Agreement and the opening of trade with Germany to the Arabs, and advising that if the Zionist monopoly of trade with Germany continued it would result in a Palestinian boycott of German goods. In spite of support from Dohle, the petition was rebuffed by authorities in Berlin.

However other people were having private talks at that time, also, and neither Britain nor the Arabs could have known of the understanding reached between Hitler and Mussolini in September, that Italy was to have "a free hand" in the Mediterranean Basin and the Arab World. What the Arabs did know was that, on one hand, Hitler was not willing to listen to reason and to stop the flow of German Jews to Palestine under the Transfer Agreement, and Mussolini's forces were already occupying Libya and Abyssinia without being seriously challenged by Britain, France and the League of nations. This therefore made Mussolini very attractive as an ally in the Palestinian Arabs' worsening struggle with Britain after its crackdown against the Palestinian National Movement. Secret contacts were arranged between some Arab leaders and the Italian Consul in Jerusalem. On the other hand Italy's obvious ambitions in Egypt and Tunisia, its penetration of Yemen and its approaches to Saudi Arabia were "becoming too ominously conspicuous to be ignored," and this led some other Arab leaders to lean towards further approaches to Hitler to offset Italy's influence and in a direct bid to have him curtail Jewish immigration to Palestine.⁸⁷

After much wrangling between them, the strike and the revolt were called off by the HAC on October 10, in response to appeals by Arab leaders in Iraq, Transjordan, Arabia and Yemen. Over the next few weeks the revolt therefore gradually petered out.⁸⁸

Lloyd George's fears that Britain and Germany were 'drifting apart' proved well grounded. On October 24, 1936, only six weeks after his talks with Hitler, Germany and Italy confirmed the thrust of the Hitler-Mussolini talks by signing the Axis Accord. Hitler believed that this would enable them to defeat Bolshevism in the east and then turn towards Britain which, he expected, would seek "an accommodation" with them. The accord committed the two governments to cooperate closely on a wide range of matters, including membership of the League of Nations, commercial policies in the Danube region, and the protection of Europe against Communism. In return for German recognition of the incorporation of Abyssinia into the Italian Empire, Italy agreed to support Germany's colonial claims. Both governments agreed to recognize the Franco government "as soon as possible."⁸⁹

Britain's situation was indeed complex and it was complicated even more by reports coming from the Far East. Early in the year there had been rumours of a Sino-Soviet military cooperation pact and in June Chiang Kai-Shek had openly asked the British Ambassador what his government's attitude would be to a Sino-Soviet alliance. The Foreign Office assessment was that it was all a Chinese exercise to discourage Japan's ambitions from spreading beyond Manchuria and Mongolia, that Chiang Kai-Shek was "too astute to risk resistance against Japan" and that he was trying to persuade the Western powers to "restrain Tokyo." Shortly afterwards, a new Japanese government offered him cooperation based on four points. They were: cooperation in the suppression of Communism in China; recognition of an "independent" Manchuria; the establishment of an economic block of Japan, China and Manchuria; and Japanese advisers in place of Europeans. Relations began to improve as negotiations continued, but the Foreign Office assessment changed dramatically on September 28 when Chiang Kai-Shek told the British that he would order general mobilization if there was any further Japanese aggression. Next day Britain's ambassadors were instructed to tell Japan that harsh demands on China would lead to "further incidents and harm Anglo-Japanese relations", and to urge China "to curb anti-Japanese activities." Then on October 7 the Joint Intelligence Sub-Committee advised that Japan had developed naval radio silence techniques such that it could launch an expedition towards either Hong Kong or Singapore from Formosa with no guarantee that Britain would have any warning.⁹⁰

As a result, the reaction in Britain to the signing of the Axis Accord was prompt. With Italy posing the most pressing short-term threat to British interests, and in the absence of any other plans to conciliate Germany, attention quickly turned to Rome. An Anglo-Italian understanding, it was felt, might prevent the Axis maturing into a military alliance, reduce the possibility of a sudden Italian attack against Britain in the Mediterranean and Middle East, and give British security in the Mediterranean in case of war with Germany or Japan.⁹¹ Towards that end, on November 5, six days before the Peel Commissioners were due to arrive in Palestine, Eden made a conciliatory speech towards Italy in the Commons. By coincidence, in an interview in the Daily Mail published on the same day, Mussolini had broached the idea of a 'gentleman's agreement' between the two countries.⁹² The stage thus seemed set for an accommodation between the two powers.

Lord Peel finally arrived in Palestine on November 11 to lead the British commission of enquiry into the causes and prospects for settlement of the conflict and the future of the mandated territory. By the end of the year when the revolt was finally suppressed there were 300 deaths and about a thousand other casualties, though pockets of trouble continued for some months. [During that time the unofficial Jewish defence force, Hagana, was reorganized, secretly armed by Britain, and split into parallel groups, some of which became tenaciously offensive rather than defensive.^{93]}

However, the announcement of the recognition of Franco's regime by Germany and Italy on the day of Peel's arrival in Palestine, and the events which followed, soon spoiled the mood. Although Hitler refrained from committing large forces to the conflict in Spain which he considered to be a useful diversion, drawing attention away from Germany, Mussolini immediately increased his aid to Franco on the grounds that continued intervention by the Soviet Union posed a threat to the balance of power in the region. With its naval interests under threat from Italy's military buildup in the western Mediterranean, Britain was forced to consider abandoning its negotiations with the Duce. Despite Eden's misgivings, however, it was decided to pursue an agreement as a test of Mussolini's good faith.⁹⁴ On November 18, Eden reported to Cabinet that negotiations with Italy were proceeding smoothly.⁹⁵

SOVIET RUSSIA WEDGED BETWEEN TWO POWERS

The effort to achieve such an agreement became even more important on November 25, when Germany and Japan signed the Anti-Comintern Pact to safeguard their common interests against the Soviet Union. Under a secret annex to the agreement, the details of which were soon made public, both countries pledged not to conclude any political treaties with the Soviet Union "contrary to the spirit" of the pact, and to assist the other in the event of an unprovoked attack "or threat of attack" by Russia.⁹⁶ Though clearly in line with the anti-Soviet views of the British Government, the pact just as clearly signalled, for Britain, a dangerous strengthening of the relationship between the two powers. In addition, when combined with the Axis Accord, the Pact also signalled an emerging three-way anti-Russian front that Hitler would use to expand into central and eastern Europe.

Japan's signing of the Anti-Comintern Pact therefore complicated world relationships considerably and international reactions were prompt. Japan was antagonistic to Chiang Kai-Shek, even though he shared Japan's concern about Communism, because he was under European domination. But Britain and the United States, preferring Japan's brand of Fascism to Communism, modified their pro-China stands to ones of benevolent neutrality towards Japan's claims in China. Bolstered by that shift in position by the major Western powers, Japan again became more aggressive towards both Chiang Kai-shek and the Red Army. Hitler became more aggressive in Eastern Europe, bolstered by the expectation that Japan would divert Russia's attention if need be. Then on December 12, within weeks of the signing of the pact, the Chinese Red Army kidnapped Chiang Kai-shek and would not release him until December 25 when he agreed to end the civil war and unite with it in a major effort to repulse Japan.

In the meantime, on December 16, while Chiang Kai-Shek was still detained, Vansittart at the Foreign Office provided a report on the world situation and British rearmament in which he said that the Anti-Comintern Pact clearly "introduced Japan into the orbit of European affairs at a particularly delicate and dangerous phase" and increased the probability that, "in given circumstances, Germany and Japan will now act together.” He proposed that the government adopt a new policy towards Japan to counter any strengthening of Japanese-German ties, including close liaison with those in Tokyo who opposed the German connection and improvements in Britain’s naval defences in the East.⁹⁷

It was the Chinese Nationalist leader’s turn to about-face. Chiang Kai-shek’s Kuomintang formed a united front with the Chinese Communists for the second time. He began to launch vitriolic attacks on Japan, he sought closer relations with each of the United States, Germany and Italy and it appeared that China would be able to resist the steady advance of Japan. But there were too many “ifs and buts” and the Western powers had too many conflicts of interest. Whichever warring parties they supported, one or more of the Western powers faced the loss of significant privileges from the other warring party.

So Eden continued his discussions with Italy and by January 2, 1937, negotiations towards the “Gentlemen’s Agreement” between Britain and Italy were complete. Under the agreement both countries recognized the importance to the other of free transit through the Mediterranean, pledged to uphold the territorial status quo in the Mediterranean area, and agreed to cooperate to limit intervention in Spain. In addition, Britain received Italy’s assurance that it would cease stirring up trouble in Palestine with its propaganda broadcasts into the Middle East.⁹⁸ It seemed that Britain had at last won back some lost ground and the agreement was greeted with a burst of optimism in the British Foreign Office. On January 5, the First Sea Lord, Admiral Chatfield, noted: “An understanding with Japan ... is ... the first essential and, difficult as it admittedly is, should not be unobtainable if we make it not a weak aim but a decided policy. Having thus secured our Eastern Empire against our first commitment, we should be in a stronger position to sit on the fence in Europe.”⁹⁹ Italy might now be detached from Germany, and as a result Germany may become more ‘reasonable.’¹⁰⁰ The prospect for a settlement in Europe therefore seemed less remote. But the optimism was short lived. Within a month Mussolini had blown the agreement apart, and the British government was again looking for ways to conciliate Hitler. However, it is doubtful whether the British public shared the government’s disappointment. In fact, it is highly unlikely that many people were even aware of the ‘Gentleman’s Agreement’ at all, or of the massive fallout in the Far East from the Anti-Comintern Pact which further strengthened Hitler’s hand, or of the continuing haggling in cabinet over how to handle relations between China and Japan, and Britain’s precarious position in the East.

WHAT PARTITION PLAN?

Neither was the British public aware that a new concept had just been introduced into the discussions about a Jewish Homeland. Early in January, 1937, towards the end of its two-month investigation in Palestine during which it held sixty-six meetings, the Peel Commission invited Dr. Weizmann to appear before it for a second time, in closed session. The members of the commission were inclining towards cantonization, but one member, Professor Coupland of Oxford, eventually reached the conclusion from the discussions that cantonization did not go far enough and a more radical approach was needed. It appeared, he said, unlikely that harmony between Jews and Arabs could be restored in the near future and that, if that was the case, “there was no other way to peace than the termination of the mandate by agreement.” This would mean splitting Palestine into two and “consequently the emergence of an independent Jewish and an Arab state.”

That was the first time that the idea of partition had been raised with Weizmann. He did not respond immediately but asked for time to reflect and consult his colleagues. Then, favouring the idea all the more, the more he thought about it, he sought a private meeting with Coupland at which they discussed the idea at length. As a result, “Coupland took it upon himself to persuade his colleagues that cantonization, favoured by the mandatory administration, would not work, and that partition was the only way out.”

Weizmann’s comment to farmers gathered outside the “secret” meeting as he left was “Hevra [comrades], today we laid the foundation for the Jewish State!”¹⁰¹ From that moment, as far as Weizmann and the Zionist leadership were concerned, there was no turning back. They no longer needed to be concerned about seeking harmony with the Arabs as a means of supporting their claim to a national homeland in Palestine. In fact the opposite was the case. They were assured that continued disharmony was the quickest route to not only a national homeland but a Jewish State. It was not intended as such, but in reality the understanding between Coupland and Weizmann was a signal that the Zionists should increase their pressure on Britain through an uncompromising policy towards the Palestinian Arabs. But it would be six months before the Peel Report would be published. That discussion between the two, and the proposal which would be made to the British government would remain privy to a select group – certainly not including the Arabs – until then. The Zionists had a good lead time in which to plan their response and their strategy uninhibited by public debate.

However there was debate continuing in another forum, and that would prove quite inhibiting in due course. About the time that Weizmann had his discussions with Coupland, the German emissary in Baghdad, Fritz Grobba, was approached by an influential Palestinian delegation. They appealed once more for the cessation of German Jewish immigration to Palestine and coupled with it a strong demand for German backing for their nationalist struggle and for the establishment of an Arab state in Palestine. Grobba’s advice was that the matter of Jewish migration to Palestine was then being reconsidered in Berlin but apart from that he could do no more than offer moral encouragement. However the Arabs did not let the matter rest there. Over the following months contact with Grobba was maintained by the Iraqi Prime Minister and the Saudi Deputy Foreign Minister as well as a key Palestinian representative and, concurrently, Consul Dohle submitted to Berlin an assessment which was clearly sympathetic to the Palestinian position. He questioned Germany’s 1933 agreement with the Zionists, and raised alarm over the effects of the British plan to establish a Jewish state in Palestine.¹⁰²

So: the British public was kept in ignorance. But in any case its attention was focused entirely on matters closer to home. Amid a storm of controversy, the King of England had abdicated the throne.

THE ABDICATION CRISIS

When he succeeded to the throne in January 1936 as a very popular bachelor-king, Edward VIII stirred the popular imagination because of his concern for the welfare of ordinary people of all creeds and races.¹⁰³ He was intent on reforming and democratizing the monarchy and he was quite prepared to use his position in an effort to change government attitudes and to improve the lot of communities caught in the maze of industrial society. His popularity with ordinary people was therefore not reflected in the attitudes of the aristocracy, the industrialists and landlords among whom the feeling was growing that Britain could be headed for its own version of the French Revolution if he were to stay. And even if the change from a constitutional monarchy to a republic was nonviolent, the links which held the dominions and colonies together would be broken and the trade advantages – the basic reason for the empire-grab in the first place – would be irretrievably lost as each country went its own way. The Jarrow affair, in which Edward's sympathy gave those who were pressing for industrial justice a lot of encouragement, showed that there could be quite important economic and social change even well short of the end of the monarchy. With serious troubles throughout its empire Britain's ruling groups could do without boat-rocking at home. They were quick to criticize Edward's slapdash approach to the constitutional duties and office work which was the lot of the monarch.¹⁰⁴

To remove Edward as a constitutional monarch in twentieth century Britain would have been very difficult in ordinary circumstances but because of his determination to live his life his own way the task was made easy with the ready collaboration of the church. Edward was determined to marry an American divorcee, Mrs. Simpson. Although Britain's aristocracy included many men who had married divorced women it was declared incompatible with his role as Defender of the Faith and chief model for public conduct for the king to do so. The Church of England was caught in another dilemma over its constitutional role and the question of church state relations. However senior churchmen, having been briefed on the king's links with Hitler's regime, and having an attitude similar to the Roman Catholic Church on the question of divorce, supported the Baldwin Government's decision that Edward should be forced from the throne on moral and religious grounds rather than political grounds. He would be seen as choosing between Mrs. Simpson and the throne.

Many of the people who were in a position to influence the church's decision were among those who also wanted the king's demise for political reasons, and it would not have escaped their notice that an alliance between the government and the church would help prevent a political coup by Winston Churchill, Edward's principal supporter, and a far more serious constitutional crisis that would follow. Churchill, who was not at that time a member of the government, had already made it known that if the government resigned over the king's refusal to abdicate he would be prepared to accept a commission from the king to form a new government without an election. Such a government would have had very little support and could have survived only long enough to fight an election around the issue of support for the king against the previous lawful elected government.¹⁰⁵ In supporting Prime Minister Baldwin's position and the demands for the king's abdication the church was therefore not only involved in consideration of moral issues but it was party to political and constitutional plots and decisions which had far-reaching consequences. But it was probably not conscious of this. It would have seen its action as providing continuity in moral guidance and as avoiding a very divisive public debate with an election that could have turned violent at a time of international crisis when the stability of the nation was at risk.

Edward VIII dutifully, but very reluctantly, avoided that crisis by abdicating on December 11, 1936.^{106 107} This meant that from his father's death almost a year earlier until after his brother's coronation as George VI, on May 17, 1937, the British public was held preoccupied with the pageantry and crisis of constitutional monarchy. Consequently, those who influenced and conducted foreign policy, whether they were hell-bent on appeasing Hitler or forcing his hand, or whether they were juggling Britain's trade relations with China and Japan – and the defence requirements which went with the juggling – could do their politicking with much less scrutiny than otherwise would have been the case. Under the auspices of the League of Nations trade negotiations began in Geneva in March, about the time that Mit Brennender Sorge and Divini Redemptoris were both issued, with Germany absent but with Japan as an observer. Britain sought to exclude trade with India from the discussions and to restrict Japan's access to African markets. On the other hand Japan "desired freedom of distribution of raw materials, free access to the development of backward areas, an end to restrictions on access to markets, and free movement of people." On March 24, Foreign Secretary Eden proposed the establishment of a trade policy committee which would study, in particular, trade relations with Japan. He pointed out that Britain was "engaged in damming back Japanese goods from our colonial empire, and elsewhere if we can (by a) policy of quotas which we are the first to condemn in other countries; while the Japanese, cut off from normal economic expansion and nervous about their supply of raw materials, are busy establishing by force of arms a preferential area in Manchukuo and North China." Eden told Chamberlain, the 'prime minister-in-waiting', that it could not be regarded as an ideal state of affairs and that a settlement with Japan was "not unobtainable."¹⁰⁸

A special interdepartmental trade committee was set up and began work in May, coinciding with a visit to London by the Chinese Finance Minister conveniently arranged at the time of the coronation and an Imperial Conference, and talks concerning the possibility of loans from both the UK Government and the Hong Kong Shanghai Bank for a series of railway projects.¹⁰⁹ During the Imperial Conference the Australian Prime Minister, Joseph Lyons, proposed that a new enlarged version of the 1922 Four Power Pact between Britain, the United States, France and Japan should be negotiated to uphold the status quo of Colonial possessions in the Asia-Pacific region and to provide an apparatus for economic and cultural collaboration. However that proposal lapsed, partly because the Foreign Office, while agreeing with the idea in principle, doubted that a multilateral approach was any longer practical, and partly because to seek the support of the US would be tantamount to admitting that Britain could no longer defend its empire. The newly appointed ambassador to Japan, Sir Robert Craigie, later noted that “a wiser procedure would be confine our efforts at first to the settlement of some of the outstanding problems in Anglo-Japanese and Sino-Japanese relations (and) if success can be achieved in these two fields, the way would then be open for an advance to a wider international settlement.”¹¹⁰ His note was consistent with a strongly held view in the Foreign Office that Britain’s policy towards Japan had been “nothing more than a set of delaying tactics, that it was necessary for a more active policy to be pursued.” Britain’s position could only be improved if there was a substantial effort to improve defences in the region and it would then “be easier to persuade Japan to agree to engage in serious negotiations about its grievances.”¹¹¹ Thus, just a week before the Imperial Conference opened, Eden argued in cabinet for a two pronged approach: a new standard of naval strength coupled with an effort to improve Anglo-Japanese relations which ‘rested on a community of interests as regards the joint policy of England and Japan towards China.’¹¹²

But from the time of Edward’s abdication to well after George VI’s coronation on May 6, the Imperial Conference which opened on May 19, and Edward’s marriage on June 3, the manipulation of the media and the wall of silence which so concerned Vansittart reached a level of obscenity that had not previously been known in Britain’s free press. While the press in America had published stories of King Edward VIII’s relationship with Mrs. Simpson for some months, the level of collusion between the British government, the press and the king was such that virtually nothing was published in Britain until a week before the abdication. The crises in Europe, China and in the Middle East were very effectively submerged when the flood-gates damming the abdication propaganda were finally opened on December 3, 1936. The politicking behind Belgium’s declaration of neutrality in January 1937, the separation of Burma from India, the Imperial Conference, the Sino-Japanese controversy, the results of the Peel Commission on Palestine, and the Anglo-Japanese trade war crisis were effectively swamped by a flood of royalist propaganda and sentiment.

THE CONSPIRACY THICKENS

Within days of the signing of the Anglo-Italian “Gentlemen’s Agreement” in early January, 1937, Mussolini had demonstrated his ‘good faith’ by landing three thousand Italian volunteers in Spain in support of Franco’s right wing Nationalists. By the end of January it was also clear that he had no intention of ending his anti-British propaganda broadcasts in the Middle East either. Britain’s hopes of ‘detaching’ Mussolini from Hitler were therefore abandoned – for the present – but Cabinet rejected Eden’s recommendation that Britain mount a show of naval force of the coast of Spain to deter further intervention by Italy and Germany.¹¹³ Attention soon shifted to finding some other means of persuading Hitler to be more ‘reasonable.’

In the meantime Hitler was wooing Britain in numerous ways. He wrote to Lord Rothermere advocating Anglo-German understanding and the Daily Mail published his letter on January

1.¹¹⁴ At the same time, and in spite of Churchill's backbench status and his vigorous condemnation of Nazi policy, Hitler extended an invitation for Churchill to visit Germany for talks. This time it was Winston's decision to rebuff the dictator. In April 1932, before Hitler had gained power, Churchill had invited Hitler to dine with him during a private visit to Munich. Hitler had declined against the advice of his staffer Putzi Hanfstaengl, an acquaintance of Winston's son Randolph, asking what he would be able to discuss with the English MP. He would have received a shock. Louis Kilzer reports that during dinner Churchill asked Hanfstaengl how his chief would feel about an alliance between Germany, France and England.¹¹⁵

But despite Hitler's apparent interest in a deal, Britain was yet to come up with a formula that would meet his demands. Throughout 1936, work had continued on plans for a Five-Power Conference which would develop a replacement Pact for Locarno. Britain's efforts to engage Germany were consistently blocked by Hitler's refusal to consider any discussions while France insisted on maintaining its commitments to help Czechoslovakia, Poland and USSR against aggression. According to Hitler, such commitments invalidated in advance any French pledge not to attack Germany, and so made pointless any western pacts of mutual guarantee.¹¹⁶ Hitler's arguments found considerable sympathy in Britain, where many people were opposed to any moves that might be seen as supporting Russian interests. At the same time, as the Foreign Office repeatedly emphasized, Britain still had to rely on its alliance with France and could not afford to simply cast her interests aside.

But Germany was not the only country that disliked the French insistence on linking security pacts in eastern and western Europe. Belgium did also. Throughout 1936 the Belgian government, under pressure from public opinion, had steadily moved away from alliance with France towards a position of armed neutrality.¹¹⁷ For France's military planners the Belgian moves were disastrous. France's line of fortifications against German attack, known as the Maginot Line, did not extend along the Belgian border. In the event of war between France and Germany, a German invasion of Belgium would be a 'one-way street' from Germany into France. Moreover, Belgium was considered the best location from which to launch a counter-offensive into Germany. But French concerns were not shared by the British, who considered an armed and neutral Belgium less likely to invite German aggression.¹¹⁸ When Hitler applied further pressure on January 30, 1937, by announcing to the Reichstag Germany's formal withdrawal from any obligations under the Treaty of Versailles and offering to guarantee Belgian neutrality, French resistance was further undermined.

With little progress towards a Five Power Conference, Chamberlain turned to the idea of offering Hitler colonies as a means to buy his cooperation. In late 1936, both the Government and the Conservative Party had ruled out the return of any British colonies to Germany. In early 1937, however, a report reached Chamberlain through Treasury channels that Germany's Finance Minister, Hjalmar Schacht, wished to discuss the return of French colonies in West Africa as a means of inducing Hitler to behave peacefully. The French Government, according to Schacht, had indicated to him its willingness to discuss the issue.¹¹⁹

At that time the Committee for Imperial Defence (CID) was reviewing the formula used to determine rearmament and in the light of the Mussolini's apparent disregard for the 'gentleman's agreement' the Foreign Office argued that the assumption of Italian friendship as the basis of operations was outdated and the Admiralty agreed that it was folly to ignore the possibility of a Mediterranean war. However the Admiralty drew attention to the "prohibitive expenditure" involved in some of the proposals such as a naval base on Cyprus. Influenced by that, on February 11 Cabinet accepted Chamberlain's argument that it would be unfortunate to install 15-inch guns in the Mediterranean as a follow up to the 'gentleman's agreement.' The rearmament formula was slightly revised but the policy that Italy was not to be regarded as a probable enemy and that major expenditure was not to be committed to the Mediterranean was continued.¹²⁰

On March 18, despite Foreign Office demands that discussions be placed on a formal basis with German Foreign Minister Von Neurath, Cabinet's Committee on Foreign Policy supported the initiative towards third party colonial concessions. Nevertheless, against Treasury advice it agreed with Eden's view that concessions should only be proposed if Germany pledged something concrete in return. Soon afterward, however, the initiative was abruptly ended when discreet inquiries with the French Government produced a polite but firm no.¹²¹

Britain's pro-appeasement forces were becoming increasingly frustrated at the lack of progress. On March 17 Hoare had written to Chamberlain that the Foreign Office was so inclined toward making agreements with France and "so much biased against Germany (and Italy and Japan) that unconsciously and almost continuously they are making impossible any European reconciliation."¹²² Agitated at the delay in Baldwin giving way to Chamberlain, Britain's pro-German right wing elements were sharing their own confidences. Dawson, Lord Astor, J.L. Garvin, Lord Beaverbrook (proprietor of the Daily Express, the Sunday Express and the Evening Standard), and Lord Rothermere (Daily Mail and Evening News), all shared a sense of urgency on the question of the settlement with Germany and the accession of Chamberlain. Garvin wrote to Lord Astor that Czechoslovakia and Austria should be excluded from any continental obligations, that the new Reich was destined to be a great Reich and it must therefore have a big show somewhere. Garvin's view, expressed in personal correspondence with anti-appeasement MP Leo Amery, was that not only Cameroon and Togoland but the British colony of Tanganyika should be given back to Germany as part of a general settlement.

MIT BRENNENDER SORGE, DIVINI REDEMPTORIS

Then three days after those cabinet discussions on concessions for Hitler, on March 21, 1937, the spirit of expectation which Palm Sunday is supposed to evoke among Christians was dampened, perhaps undermined, by the widespread publication of Divini Redemptoris and the carefully managed release in Germany of Mit Brennender Sorge. In view of that timing it is now appropriate to look again at those two encyclicals. [See chapter 18, pp. 58–62 for discussion of some aspects of both documents.] Mit Brennender Sorge has usually been viewed as essentially an apologia for the German Concordat and a lecture to Hitler on social policy. Divini Redemptoris combined an attack on atheistic Communism, a warning for the faithful to have nothing to do with Soviet Russia, and a bid for greater support from governments for the Catholic state-church system and more concordats to enable the Vatican to extend its influence over social and economic policies. But with a careful examination of both encyclicals and the manner of their release in the context of the political decision making of the day, other implications and motives behind the preparation of the two carefully contrived documents become apparent.

If Mit Brennender Sorge had been intended to undermine or to isolate Hitler and Germany rather than to just recover some of the church's lost influence and to influence policies within Germany there can be little doubt that it would have been distributed internationally. It was not. It was issued very quietly in the Vatican and then distributed only in Germany. That can only indicate that Pope Pius XI, or his Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, and his other advisers were deliberately avoiding undermining Hitler's position and avoiding antagonizing him. The fact that Hitler did not object to the encyclical supports this assessment. In contrast, Divini Redemptoris was very definitely intended to isolate and undermine the Soviet Union. The widespread publicity given to it made it virtually impossible for France to continue to pursue its policy of isolating Germany through a system of mutual support or defence arrangements involving each of Czechoslovakia, Poland and Soviet Russia. At the same time it undermined the influence of those in Britain who wanted an alliance with Russia in place of a policy of appeasement of Hitler. In fact, as the figure most trenchantly opposed to Russia's political philosophy, Hitler's position was strengthened considerably, especially in any negotiations towards a Five Power Conference and a replacement for the Locarno Pact.

The Vatican's attack on the Jews in Mit Brennender Sorge was, in fact, strong encouragement to Hitler to pursue his expansionist policy towards both Czechoslovakia and Poland. Hitler must have seen immediately that the Pope was eager to take advantage of the opportunity (as much as an obligation) to send his 'storm troops' – priests in the role of chaplains to the Nazi invaders – into Poland under the secret annex to the German concordat. It is no coincidence that the encyclical was issued on the day when Christians celebrate Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem as a prelude to the culmination of his ministry, his rejection by the Jewish authorities, and his crucifixion. The release of every papal encyclical is timed with great care to achieve greatest impact. Similarly, the use by the pope of expressions which reflect the tenor of Mein Kampf in Hitler's attitude to the Jews is no coincidence. It is consistent with the nature of Mein Kampf as a parody of the amorphous Christian gel. It is consistent with the Pope's remarks to Vice Chancellor Papen during negotiations for the concordat that he was pleased that the German Government "now had as its head a man uncompromisingly opposed to Communism and Russian nihilism in all its forms."¹²³ It was consistent with the pope's insistence on the conclusion of a concordat "because he wanted to come to an agreement with Italy and Germany as the countries which, in his opinion, represented the nucleus of the Christian World."¹²⁴ And it was also consistent with Papen's statement that the pope had pressed on with a concordat in spite of warnings that he should not conclude a treaty with "so unworthy a partner as the German Reich led by Adolf Hitler." Pius XI told Papen that "he had full confidence in the assurances of the Reich Chancellor that the national renaissance would be carried out upon the sole foundation of Christianity" and he had agreed to the form of the treaty "in the recognition that the new Germany had fought a decisive battle against Bolshevism and the atheistic movement."¹²⁵ Some illustrations.

Hitler in Mein Kampf, chapter 2:

...I am acting in accordance with the will of the Almighty Creator: by defending myself against the Jew, I am fighting for the work of the Lord." And chapter 11: "... the great founder of the new doctrine ... made no secret of his attitude towards the Jewish people, and when necessary he even took to the whip to drive from the temple of the Lord this adversary of all humanity, who then as always saw in religion nothing but an instrument for his business existence. In return, Christ was nailed to the cross ..." And: "To what an extent the whole existence of this people is based on a continuous lie is shown incomparably by the Protocols of the Wise Men of Zion, so infinitely hated by the Jews. They are based on a forgery, the Frankfurter Zeitung moans and screams once every week: the best proof that they are authentic."¹²⁶

Compare that with Mit Brennender Sorge:

God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke in times past to the fathers by the prophets, in these days has spoken to us by his Son. ... The sacred books of the Old Testament are all God's word ... Corresponding to the gradual unfolding of the revelation ... they are the reflections in many particulars of human imperfection, weakness and sin. Side by side with innumerable touches of greatness and nobleness they relate the dissipation and worldliness that occurred time and again among the covenanted people who bore the revelation and promise of God. ... Yet for every eye not blinded by prejudice and passion, out of the human failings, of which the Bible history speaks, shines forth all the more clearly the divine light of the work of salvation, finally triumphant over all defects and sin. ... He who wants to see [the church's interpretation of]¹²⁷ the biblical history and the wisdom of the Old Testament banished from the church and school, blasphemes the Almighty's plan of salvation, makes the narrow and limited mind of man judge over the divine plan of history. He denies belief in the real Christ, Who appeared in the flesh, Who took His human nature from that people which was to nail Him to the Cross. He stands uncomprehendingly before the world-drama of the Son of God who opposed to the felony of His crucifiers the Divine high-priestly action of the Redeemer's death and thus brought the Old Testament to its fulfilment and completion in the New, by which it is superseded.¹²⁸

The paragraphs from which these extracts are taken have generally been represented by the church as an attack on Nazi efforts to suppress church schools. But if that were their sole purpose a much stronger reaction could have been expected from Hitler. Certainly he was upset that the church should speak out in that manner and that it should openly accuse him of violations of the concordat. The Gestapo made a show of confiscating copies of the concordat when it came across them. It closed a number of print shops which had been involved in its printing and distribution, and it protested to the bishops and the Vatican. The Foreign Ministry labelled the encyclical a grave violation of contractual obligations under the concordat and a summons to battle against the leadership of the state, and Hitler ordered the resumption of trials for foreign exchange and immorality offences against certain Catholic clergy which had been halted to avoid adverse publicity during the Berlin Olympics. But a number of observers and at least one Catholic writer regarded Mit Brennender Sorge as a moderate document which was essentially a condemnation of neopagan doctrines favoured by the German authorities and written with considerable skill in a manner that would not condemn political and social Totalitarianism.¹²⁹ It is noteworthy that neither Hitler nor the Vatican made any move towards renouncing or repudiating the concordat and Hitler simply omitted a courtesy call on the pope during his state visit to Rome a year later. It is also noteworthy that senior German Catholic clergy had been at pains to align the church's teaching with that of the Nazi authorities as the Catholic Church sought to ingratiate itself with Hitler at the expense of the Protestant churches. For example, when Bishop Berning sent a copy of his book to Hitler he asked the Fuhrer to accept it as a token of his devotion and to take note of the services which the church in the course of its history had rendered to the German nationality as a community of blood, language and culture.¹³⁰ And in a pastoral letter in 1934 Bishop Hilfrich of Limburg wrote that the church has always supported the principle of authority and she will "gladly do her share so that the idea of [secular] authoritarian leadership will also be accepted with conviction in the hearts of men."¹³¹

It therefore appears that Hitler interpreted those key paragraphs as he was intended to: as an attack against the Jews. Similarly, the paragraph which followed has generally been represented as an attack on Hitler's personal messianism and the man-god cult which he, or those around him, had encouraged in order to place him (in public acceptance) above the church. Again, if that were its sole purpose a strong reaction was to be expected. There was none and, again, Hitler appears to have been satisfied with an alternative interpretation of its very clever construction, that it was an attack against the Prophet Muhammad and Arab Muslims who were in deep conflict with Britain and the church in their bid for control of Palestine.¹³²

But in addition, the Vatican attack on 'human rights' was a warning against demands for human rights which were being used to undermine either colonial authority – existing or anticipated in line with Hitler's expansionist policies – or totalitarian government's in league with the church. Another selection of passages.

Hitler, in Mein Kampf.

... Nature as such has not reserved this soil for the future possession of any particular nation or race; on the contrary, this soil exists for the people which possess the force to take it and the industry to cultivate it. Nature knows no political boundaries. First, she puts living creatures on this globe and watches the free play of forces. She then confers the master's right on her favourite child, the strongest in courage and industry." And: "It cannot be emphasised sharply enough that any German internal colonization must serve to eliminate social abuses particularly to withdraw the soil from widespread speculation, but can never suffice to secure the future of the nation without the acquisition of new soil.” And: “... philosophy is intolerant; it cannot content itself with the role of ‘one party besides others’, but imperiously demands, not only its own exclusive and unlimited recognition, but the complete transformation of all public life in accordance with its views. It can, therefore, not tolerate the simultaneous continuance of a body representing the former condition. This is equally true of religions. Christianity could not content itself with building up its own altar; it was absolutely forced to undertake the destruction of the heathen altars. Only from this fanatical intolerance could its apodictic faith take form; this intolerance is, in fact, its absolute presupposition.” And: “Protestantism as such is a better defender of the interests of Germanism ... (but) ... it fails, however, in the moment when this defence of national interests must take place in a province which is either absent from the general line of its ideological world and traditional development, or is for some reason rejected. Thus Protestantism will always stand up for the advancement of all Germanism as such, as long as matters of inner purity or national deepening as well as German freedom are involved, since all these things have a firm foundation in its own being; but it combats with the greatest hostility any attempt to rescue the nation from the embrace of its most mortal enemy, since its attitude towards the Jews just happens to be more or less dogmatically established. Yet here we are facing the question without whose solution all other attempts at a German reawakening or resurrection are and remain absolutely senseless and impossible.”^{133 134}

Divini Redemptoris.

The pope asserted that the Christian civilization or social order was the true civitas humana, that it was based on the natural law with divinely imposed obligations which were expounded in the age-old doctrines of the church concerning the individual and social character of private property which explain the right and dignity of labour, the relations of mutual aid and collaboration which should exist between those who possess capital and those who work. He noted:

“The Communism of today, more emphatically than similar movements in the past, conceals in itself a false messianic idea. A pseudo-ideal of justice, of equality and fraternity in labour impregnates all its doctrine and activity with a deceptive mysticism, which communicates a zealous and contagious enthusiasm to the multitudes entrapped by delusive promises. This is especially true in an age like ours, when unusual misery has resulted from the unequal distribution of the goods of this world. This pseudo-ideal is even boastfully advanced as if it were responsible for a certain economic progress. As a matter of fact, when such [economic] progress is at all real, its true causes are quite different, as for instance the intensification of industrialism in countries which were formally almost without it, the exploitation of immense natural resources, and the use of the most brutal methods to insure the achievement of gigantic projects with a minimum of expense.”¹³⁵ (Emphasis added)

After claiming that the established Christian society has divine origins and is the ideal state, he made the barely compatible concession that Christian employers and industrialists “are saddled with the heavy heritage of an unjust economic regime whose ruinous influence has been felt through many generations” but proceeded to say that the poor “while engaged, according to the laws of charity and justice, in acquiring the necessities of life and also in bettering their condition, should always remain 'poor in spirit' and hold spiritual goods in higher esteem than earthly property and pleasures ... [remembering] that the world will never be able to rid itself of misery, sorrow and tribulation, which are the portion even of those who seem prosperous." The poor should be patient, the pope said, because patience comforts the heart with the divine assurance of eternal happiness, and "the more the workingmen and the poor realise what the spirit of love animated by the virtue of Christ is doing for them, the more readily they will abandon the false persuasion that Christianity has lost its efficacy and that the Church stands on the side of the exploiters of their labour."¹³⁶ The enemies of the church, he noted, "accuse her of having failed to act in conformity with her principles, and from this conclude to the necessity of seeking other solutions." But "the utter falseness and injustice of this accusation is shown by the whole history of Christianity ... (and) ... it was Christianity that first affirmed the real and universal brotherhood of all men of whatever race and condition ... (and) ... with an amplitude and conviction unknown to preceding centuries ... potently contributed to the abolition of slavery."¹³⁷

There was praise for Hitler's renaissance 'founded solely on Christianity'; a subtle attack on the exploitation of colonies which had given Britain and its allies a lead over Germany; there was mild praise for the concept of universal brotherhood which it suited Hitler to ignore rather than be seen to be arguing with it; and there was a strong attack on the Russians who were looking for solutions which did not involve the church. Because they were prepared concurrently and because of the way in which they were released, Mit Brennender Sorge and Divini Redemptoris must be viewed as two parts of a coordinated statement from the pope and the overall effect was support for Hitler and active discouragement of any plans to encircle him with an alliance involving Communist Russia. It is therefore hardly surprising that soon after their publication the Soviet authorities unleashed another anti-religious campaign and for a few months life became even more difficult for the Russian Orthodox Church.¹³⁸ From their point of view it was simply another part of the arrogant Christian church, out of touch with reality and quite incapable of reviewing either its theology or its sociology.

The Vatican appeared to be 'on a winner.' In its propaganda it could capitalize on the even more aggressive and oppressive policies of the Communist regime towards its Christian communities which the Vatican itself had triggered. But it was very hopeful that the prize which had eluded it ever since the Christian church had split into two bodies of Christ would fall into its lap. In the event that Hitler pursued his eastern breathing space plan and invaded Russia it could expect to absorb whatever remained of the Russian Orthodox Church after the invasion. Its concordat with Hitler, albeit a little tarnished, and its legions of Catholic State Chaplains who would go in with the invasion forces would ensure the Catholicization of the Russian church which had defied all of the Vatican's previous intrigues and remained vigorously independent of Rome and a leader of the Orthodox group of churches. This meant that it would also absorb Poland on the way if it had not already been able to do so.

The stakes were very high indeed and Mit Brennender Sorge and Divini Redemptoris had both been composed with equally great care in a bid to ensure the maintenance of the position of authority of the Vatican and the territorial and numerical expansion of the Catholic Church. The Vatican drafters had ensured that there would be no further talk of French guarantees for Czechoslovakia, Poland and Russia, or of a new five power pact. They had isolated Russia and encouraged Hitler towards the war for which he knew he had the obligation and the opportunity to supply chaplains, and by their continuing anti-Semitism they had encouraged Hitler to move against Poland. By appearing to show independence in spite of the German Concordat they had made another bid, similar to that of the pope's predecessor in World War One, to be dealt a hand in the international political play and to tighten the Vatican's grip on social and economic programs. They may have been fearful of the consequences of a near-exclusive intimate alignment with the German-Italian alliance which they saw as 'the nucleus of Christianity' and from that point of view they would not have been at all upset by Hitler's snub during his 1938 visit to Rome. And by authorizing the two encyclicals Pius XI had certainly encouraged Totalitarianism which offered the prospects of more concordats. Overall he had strengthened Hitler's hand and undermined the anti-Hitler alliance. At the same time he had discouraged and dampened the recognition of fundamental human rights and efforts towards colonial self determination. The downtrodden, whether at home or in the colonies, were to be patient and not rock the boat. One effect which he may or may not have anticipated was that by encouraging Hitler's designs on Poland he had also encouraged the Jewish lobby and Jewish MPs in Britain to oppose Britain's policy of appeasement and to press for rearmament and more determined government.

Why were these implications not more obvious to the governments which were jointly trying to out-manoeuvre or to restrain Hitler? Because they gave little thought to the implications behind the published clause 11 which covered the reorganization of diocesan boundaries in consultation with the Reich Government in the event of reorganization or changes which exceed the boundaries of one German state. They were not aware of the secret annexe to the concordat and therefore they had little reason to be concerned about the preferential treatment for Catholic chaplains and advance warning of mobilization. They were not able to read between the lines. But Hitler was, and he did so very well indeed, exploiting and out-manoeuvring the Catholic Church as he played it and the Protestant churches against each other – just as Britain had been playing each of the non-Christian faiths against each other for years.

A CAULDRON IN THE BALKANS

In fact Britain was so preoccupied with its inter-faith games in the Middle East and India, and with the immediate problem of relations with Germany, that it was not taking sufficient notice of what was happening in the inter-faith cauldron of the Balkans. Neither were any of the other great powers, except Soviet Russia which was having a territorial dispute with neighbouring Rumania; Hungary which had lost some territory to the same neighbour; and Italy which was eager to annex Albania which had become little more than an economic dependency. All of the major powers were smugly satisfied to leave the Balkans group of countries to sort out their own problems, both internal and external, within the framework of treaties, redrawn boundaries and constitutions which had been imposed on them after Europe's war of convenience had degenerated into World War One. But in the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, efforts to suppress the independence aspirations of Catholic Croats, Muslims in several regions, and the dominant Orthodox Serbs, and to also suppress moves for either a Greater Serbia or a Serbia-Slavic Confederation led to a change of name to Yugoslavia (Land of the South Slavs) and a period of royal dictatorship from 1929. That led to even more bitter Croatian hostility to Serbian dominance, the assassination of the king while on a visit to France in October 1934, the suspension of the constitution, the establishment of a complex system of nine banats which were devised without proper regard to ethnic concentrations or historic boundaries, operating under a regency, and all of the tensions were aggravated, but harshly suppressed.

The fledgling Yugoslavia was immediately under threat from the north-west by Hitler's policy of Lebensraum and encouragement for Croatian Fascist agitators, and from the north-east by hostile support for the Communist Party of Yugoslavia from the Soviet Union. By the mid 1930's, stirred on by those pressures, groups such as the Serbian Cultural Club were trying to generate support for another attempt to establish a Greater Serbia. While some of its leaders were prepared to accept minority communities within their Greater Serbia, others were not. They wanted minorities out. Especially Muslims. On March 7, 1937, while the Vatican drafters were presumably putting the final touches to their linked encyclicals with a view to suppressing the Jews, Professor Vosa Cubrilovic of Belgrade University presented his plan for the expulsion of all 'Albanians', meaning, roughly, Muslims, from Yugoslavia. In terms comparable to those used later by Hitler about the Jews, but going even further than any of Hitler's public pronouncements up to that time, he proposed the total expulsion of all Kosovar Albanians, preferably to either Albania or Turkey, saying that if there were any objections the Albanian government should be told that "we shall stop at nothing to achieve our final solution to this question." Steps to "create a suitable psychosis" were to include bribing and threatening the Albanian clergy; propaganda; coercion by the state apparatus with ruthless police powers, fines and imprisonment; refusal to recognize old land deeds; withdrawal of permits to practice a profession; dismissal from state, private or public office; 'destruction' of clergy and cemeteries; distribution of weapons to "our colonists" for use in such programs as "a tide of Montenegrins ... launched from mountain pastures," and much more.¹³⁹

Cubrilovic's plan was a portent of things to come after he became Director of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences. It cannot be 'elevated' to the level of a 'crusade' and therefore 'justified', in earlier Catholic parlance, as a bid to recover the religious centre of the universe, Jerusalem, for Christianity as a step towards the elimination of Islam. The world was no longer that ignorant in political matters or that naive in religious matters. Although some supporters of the plan later talked of expelling all Muslims to either Baghdad or Mecca it was simply a plan for 'ethnic cleansing' – the elimination of a Muslim community from within an Orthodox Christian dominated region – such that Europe was more accustomed to seeing the Roman Catholic Church implement against Jewish minority communities. Apart from the Crusades, there had been one major exception – Spain – where the same techniques had been applied against the Muslims around the time of Maimonides.

In mid April, a few weeks after the British cabinet discussions on colonial concessions for Hitler and the publication of both Mit Brennender Sorge and Divini Redemptoris, Hitler showed how sensitive he was to adverse publicity. This was in spite of his mild reaction to Mit Brennender Sorge but while the Spanish Civil War was proving an embarrassment to every government in Europe whether it sent forces to support one side or the other or not. In retaliation for the publication of a report of German planes involved in bombing Guernica in Spain a ban was placed on staff of the Times to prevent them working in Germany. Dawson wrote to his correspondent H.G. Daniels in Switzerland that he could not understand such German antagonism because he did his utmost ‘night after night, to keep out of the paper anything that might have hurt their susceptibility.’ At the same time Lord Astor encouraged J.L. Garvin, the editor of his Observer, to write editorials in praise of the territorial revision of Europe in favour of Germany.¹⁴⁰ And as a result of cabinet’s policy decision, the Joint Overseas and Home Defence Subcommittee pigeon-holed its own assessment that the defence of Malta and Gibraltar required counter-bombardment guns of 13.5 inch or greater, and ruled that lighter guns were to be installed.¹⁴¹

Then, with the gulf widening between Chamberlain and his appeasers on one hand and Vansittart at the Foreign Office, the close working relationship in which Churchill acted as a mouthpiece for Vansittart and the Foreign Office was strengthened. At Vansittart’s request Leeper met Churchill at Chartwell on April 24, 1937, and encouraged him to try to bring together all the various groups who were already concerned about the German menace. Cockett identifies that meeting as the genesis of the anti-Nazi council that became known as ‘The Focus Group.’ Focus duly tried to rectify what Vansittart had identified as the crucial flaw in Britain’s state of readiness: “the people of this country are receiving no adequate education – indeed practically no concerted education at all – against the impending tests.”¹⁴²

Then, encouraged by the amazing support which he was getting from some sections of the British press and the spin-off from the two encyclicals, and not put off by Churchill’s rejection of his invitation to Germany, Hitler instructed Foreign Minister Ribbentrop to meet Churchill in London and to discuss an Anglo-German Alliance which would allow Germany to achieve its Lebensraum in Poland, Russia and the Ukraine in return for support for Britain’s retention of its empire. The meeting took place at the German Embassy on May 21, two days after the Imperial Conference opened. When Churchill, surprisingly well briefed on Hitler’s plans after two hours of discussion, rejected the proposal, Ribbentrop said that his attitude meant inevitable war. They then parted, warning each other of their respective country’s determination, and Churchill – then better informed than ever – stepped up his anti-appeasement campaign still further.¹⁴³

THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

The abdication crisis had given the British government a perfect opportunity to call an Imperial Conference in conjunction with the coronation to brief and consult the dominions on the international crises. One matter not on the agenda was the question of India. It should have been. The appalling lack of understanding of non-Christian faiths within the British administration, and the extent of manipulation of those faiths which had become a matter of standard practice, was rapidly leading to a crisis situation.

In the run-up to the Conference, in April 1937, the potential crisis of relations between Hindus and Muslims had deepened when the Hindu-dominated Congress Party gained 711 seats in the elections for a national parliament out of a total of 1,585, with a majority in five provinces and with a dominant position in two others. At the same time, the severing from India of the Buddhist stronghold of Burma, which along with Aden had been administered from India for a long period, only added to the confusion and brought more demands for the partition of India on ethnic lines as well.¹⁴⁴ Britain's decision, and a series of long-overdue reforms which it had introduced, were partly a response to the aspirations of ethnically different communities, but they were basically a political exercise to suppress the growing mood of rebellion and to enable Britain to retain its highly profitable grip in Burma.

Buddhism in Burma had progressively become identified with, and linked to, both patriotism as a concept and nationalism as a movement as Buddhists and Marxists worked in collaboration, especially within the University of Rangoon. That trend was partly a response to the destruction of indigenous culture and the exploitation of resources and the rural population by the British banks when the world rice market collapsed during the 1930s. But it was also a response to the oppressive administration by the arrogant Christian British who could only impose their will in Burma by brute force. It was therefore only natural that the constitutional changes in India and Burma should lead to a build up of pressure for independence in Burma, but it also had a destabilizing effect in neighbouring Siam (Thailand).¹⁴⁵ The British must have anticipated those pressures. However they failed to fully appreciate that by severing Buddhist Burma from India they would leave a gap in interfaith relationships within India which would highlight and encourage the confrontation between Hindu and Muslim communities.

When the Imperial Conference opened on May 19 attention was focused on the situations in Europe and the Far East. It was clear that Britain's authority at the conference tables of Europe in both a political and military sense depended on the support it received from members of the Commonwealth. In their confidential briefings for the Commonwealth delegations, the Chiefs of the Imperial General Staff made it clear that Britain's defeat in a continental war would mean the destruction of the fabric of the Commonwealth which could not continue to exist without the political, financial and military strength of the United Kingdom. Without Britain the dominions were isolated and unable to defend themselves and, like the colonies, they would each be subject to pressure from either the victors in the war or their near neighbours. In the circumstances Britain had to commit itself to the defence of France and the Low Countries and would expect help from the dominions.¹⁴⁶ Britain's effort and expenditure would therefore be concentrated on home defence and it could not defend the countries of the Commonwealth.

Dominion leaders had made their views quite clear on the question of territorial settlements and the effects of the Treaty of Versailles, in March the previous year when Germany marched into the Rhineland. Mr. R.G. Casey, Australia, had said that the shackles had to be lifted from Germany and that France had to accept the situation in the Rhineland. Mr. Vincent Massey, Canada, expressed much the same view. The South African Prime Minister, General Hertzog, had gone further, saying that the Union would feel compelled to withhold its support if Britain took military action against Germany and that Britain had to decide between hegemony with France and leadership of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The dominion leaders were just as forthright at the time of the Imperial Conference. Hertzog said he had never changed his opinion that "the unholy work of Versailles must be undone." He said that Britain should be free (to negotiate) in respect of Eastern Europe, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Danzig, Memel, etc., that peace in Europe can be assured if Britain approaches Germany in the same spirit of cooperation that it had shown France since 1919, and that Britain's attitude towards Germany was "far too much one of cold, repelling indifference" compared with its attitude to France. And very bluntly he told the conference that if war came because the powers were unwilling to rectify Versailles, South Africa could not be expected to take part in it. Canada advocated some form of territorial appeasement and its Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, who is said to have been opposed to the concept of the Commonwealth and deeply suspicious of being tied to Britain's purpose, said Canada dreaded being committed by the conference "to some obligation arising out of the situation in Europe."

The only dominion which gave unqualified support to Britain was New Zealand which declared that if Great Britain was at war it would be at war also. Mr. Casey's comments reflected Australia's fear that Germany might demand the return of the mandated territory of New Guinea, and he was sympathetic to the incorporation of Austria and the Sudetenland into the Reich.¹⁴⁷ However it was his Prime Minister, Joseph Lyons, who raised the most embarrassing issues. He was not satisfied by Britain's assurance that Singapore would be protected by the promised 'relief armada' sailing unhindered through the Mediterranean and the Suez. He therefore proposed either a rapprochement with Japan or, a Four Power Pacific Defence Pact which would include the one power with the means to withstand Japanese aggression swiftly: the United States. Both suggestions were squashed by Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden. Either course would have been tantamount to an admission that Britain could no longer defend its empire unaided.¹⁴⁸ In fact Britain's position was so parlous that the conspiracy of silence just had to continue, even at the expense of major foreign policy and defence considerations. Self interest on the part of a number of the key players coupled with their inability to understand the script was about to lock the world into the full drama of the trouble in the triangle.

CHAPTER 21

NO. WE MUSTN'T RISK AN EMPIRE

CHAMBERLAIN TAKES OFFICE

The completion of the British Imperial Conference provided an opportunity for a smooth transition from one government to another. Stanley Baldwin stepped down as Prime Minister on May 28, 1937, and was succeeded by the man who had been the most influential minister in the government for several years anyway, Neville Chamberlain. Chamberlain immediately set about consolidating the Downing Street press office as his personal fiefdom. Cockett quotes James Margach as saying that from the moment he entered Number 10 he sought to manipulate the press into supporting his policy of appeasing the dictators.¹ But worse still: the more the Foreign Office sought to modify or to expose his policy the more he bypassed both it and his Foreign Secretary and determined Britain's foreign policy himself, without consultation. He was soon exploring ways of shifting both Vansittart and Leeper to powerless positions, and he developed a relationship with Steward such that Steward either used his own initiative (or developed a sixth sense) about when to pass on the PM's views on sensitive matters to persons whose contacts and information flow should have been through diplomatic channels, or he received informal instructions from the PM to do so.

In the meantime, in his last weeks at the Treasury, Chamberlain had set in motion a comprehensive review of Britain's defence program aimed at bringing it fully into line with his financial and foreign policy views. His instructions were that the 'rising burden of defence liabilities' were to be 'correlated' with the whole of Britain's available imperial resources. Britain's policy was to make peace not war, and rearmament should proceed in a manner consonant with maintaining the strategic advantage of long term financial and economic stability.² The government realized from its diplomatic contacts, that a territorial showdown was imminent in a general sense, both in Europe and in the Far East. What it did not realize was that Hitler had a four-year plan and that during 1937 he was gradually increasing his pressure on Austria, Czechoslovakia and the Balkans as he sought to maintain the tempo of that plan. Nor did it appear to fully realize the seriousness of the convergence of its problems in Europe, the Middle East and the Far East.

The special trade committee which Eden had persuaded Chamberlain to agree to, certainly sought to make them more aware of it. On June 7 the committee advised the government that the Far East constituted the exposed flank of Britain's strategic position, that a friendly Japan was the best way to remedy this weakness and that a trade remedy would react at once on the strength of Britain's position in Europe. It said that after years of mistrust Japan was adopting more moderate policies in China and "showing a desire for good relations with the United kingdom." It would be "a serious blunder" if Britain missed the opportunity to clear away one of the points of constant friction by refusing trade concessions which it might ultimately be compelled to grant, and any trade sacrifices by the industries of Lancashire "would be more than compensated by the larger advantages which we contemplate."

From that point the thrust of Chamberlain's initiative was directly challenged by Eden and the Foreign Office. On the European front, despite the failure of the "Gentlemen's Agreement", Italy was not yet considered a probable enemy for the purposes of defence planning. But with the Peel Report due to be handed down within a month and the fragility of Britain's relations with Japan and China, the possibility of a renewed Arab revolt highlighted the need to reconsider that status. In a submission to Cabinet on June 15, Eden put a new case for Mediterranean rearmament. It built on his view that the Mediterranean was an arterial road and that entry to it, transit and exit from it were of vital interest to Britain and it noted that Italy's expansionist tendencies had become irreconcilable with Britain's control of the artery. It then argued that although Italy would probably not start a single handed war with Britain there was a considerable danger that if conflict developed with Germany or Japan, or if the Arab revolt in Palestine was renewed, an opportunistic Mussolini may exploit Britain's weakness through blackmail or force. And while it was acknowledged that Hitler was not yet ready for a showdown in Europe it was argued that if Britain and France became entangled in a crisis in the Mediterranean Hitler might seize the opportunity to "embark on adventures likely to precipitate a general conflict". "It is surely in just such a conjunction of circumstances", it said, "that the danger of war with Germany is most readily found". Italy must therefore be counted a probable enemy and provisions made on the basis of that formula.³

Two days later, on June 17, Cabinet actually discussed the possibility of reopening negotiations to end extra-territoriality in China if Nanking raised the issue. If a decision to do so had been taken it would have changed the relations between China, Japan and Britain very radically indeed, but the Cabinet Foreign Policy Committee (which had met the previous day) had brought a recommendation to reject the special trade committee's recommendations. It said concessions should only be made "if other colonial powers reciprocated" on the matter of an open door policy.^{4 5} Thus a 'serious blunder' was made and the opportunity to dramatically improve Anglo Japanese-Chinese relations through cooperation in China's development by such means as the railway loans which it had sought was lost. However, as events would eventually show, much worse was to come.

In early July the Foreign Secretary found himself supported by the India Office and the Colonial Office, both of whom were anxious over Italy's policies in the Middle East and Red Sea region. It was left to Chamberlain to provide the decisive reply at a meeting of the Committee for Imperial Defence on July 5. In the Prime Minister's view, Italy would attack Britain only if it were sure of German support. He acknowledged, however, the conjunction between a possible crisis in Europe and Britain's problems in the Middle East: "If Germany were contemplating hostile action or became engaged in hostilities against us, there was little doubt Italy would join in and take the opportunity to fish in troubled waters." The ideal, he continued, was no doubt to be prepared to fight Germany or Italy or Japan, either separately or in combination. However, that "was a counsel of perfection which it was impossible to follow." Defence and foreign policy had to be correlated because each influenced the other. Britain's policy should be directed towards a settlement with Germany, and if this were done Italy would be unlikely to attack. In other words it was a plan to provide for war in one theatre only. But the pace of events in all of the regions critical to Britain was quickening. Two days later, on July 7, 1937, the report of the Peel Commission, recommending the Partition of Palestine, was finally published in London and triggered a new round of violence in Palestine.

PEEL AND THE PARTITION OF PALESTINE

The publication of the report, carrying the hallmarks of Professor Coupland's influence (chapter 20), coincided with the eruption of the 'Sino-Japanese controversy' with the clashes at Peking and added to the government's woes. Peel's work had been made extremely difficult because the Zionist Organization had lobbied strongly but the Palestinian Arabs refused to cooperate fully with him until Britain stopped Jewish migration, which it refused to do, and they gave no evidence to the commission until the late stages of its investigation. The Palestinian Arabs were particularly upset because a large degree of independence had been granted to – or won by – a number of Arab kingdoms while they, the Palestinians, were being refused self-determination and were losing rights and a stake in their own land as a result of policies and decisions by a foreign power, Britain, which were the result of a long history of colonial greed and arrogance. The beneficiaries of those decisions were a relatively small number of predominantly European settlers who showed 'formidable drive and capacity' and who were driven on by a fanatical belief in their God-given right to be there and the need to escape from oppression in their former homelands.⁶

The situation was thus unbelievably complex. Although no one understood it at the time, there could be no long-term solution without a comprehensive review of Britain's colonial and foreign policies. That could only be carried out within the framework of a total review of international relations and Christian Europe's self-understanding carried out by all of the imperial powers working together. But such a review was not on the agenda as far as any of the European colonial powers were concerned – except for Hitler, and he had his own agenda. Lord Peel and the British Government therefore had to do a patch-up job to camouflage the cracks as best they could with the resources at their disposal and within the constraints of the rapidly deteriorating international situation.

The Peel Commission's main recommendation was that Palestine be partitioned into a Jewish state and an Arab region which would be linked to Transjordan, plus a small British enclave covering Jerusalem, Bethlehem and a corridor to the Mediterranean. Its recommendations also included plans for an exchange of population and territory, and annual payments from the Jewish state to the Arab state to compensate for an imbalance in resources and fertility between the two regions.⁷ Publication of the Peel Plan triggered an immediate return to violence.

There had been so much politicking going on around the preparation of the Peel Report that, even though it was not known to the general public, the thrust of the commission's proposals became known to the German authorities in June, about a month before they were published. This gave them ample time to consider and crystallize their position, especially in the light of Dohle's submission and the consistent Arab approaches through Grobba, and the German Foreign Minister, Konstantin von Neurath, was able to issue a special note to German legations in the Middle East as soon as the Peel Report was published.⁸ He pointed out that:

*The formation of a Jewish state or a Jewish led political structure under a British mandate is not in Germany's interest, since a Palestine State would not absorb world Jewry, but would create an additional position of power under international law for international Jewry, somewhat like the Vatican state for political Catholicism or Moscow for the Comintern ... Germany therefore has an interest in strengthening the Arab world as a counterweight against such a possible increase in power for world Jewry.*⁹

However official German government opposition to a Jewish State being established under the British mandate in Palestine and the strengthening of the Arab position did not necessarily imply a reduction in Jewish migration from Germany. German Jewish migration into the mandated territory continued and von Neurath's stand illustrated very clearly the basis of Vatican opposition to the establishment of a State of Israel: the international and legal recognition of temporal authority for the body corporate of Judaism, the faith which, in the Vatican's view, had been superseded by Catholic Christianity and had no right to any such recognition. But at the immediate practical level von Neurath ensured more formal links and close collaboration between the Arabs and the Nazi regime. The Mufti of Jerusalem was still doing his best to make people change direction and, as Britain's resistance to change increased, his opposition to Britain's plans for Palestine naturally became more trenchant, and vice versa. He was steadily forced into alliance with the pro-Nazi groups in the Middle East, and he therefore had immediate discussions with the German Consul General and later arranged for a representative to visit Berlin.

VATICAN REACTION

It must be assumed that the Vatican Secretariat of State was also kept well informed on the preparation of the Peel Report through its very efficient network in the United Kingdom. Regardless of the pathetic protestation by the Holy Office nine years earlier, at the time that it suppressed the Friends of Israel, that the Apostolic See "condemns in the highest degree hatred against the people formerly chosen by God, the hatred that is commonly designated today under the name of 'anti-Semitism'," (chapter 17, p. 31L), highly provocative anti-Semitic reporting in the Jesuit-controlled press in Italy had continued over the years and reached new intensity at this time. Britain was being discouraged from any action which favoured world Jewry and Hitler was being encouraged to maintain his racial ambitions.

In September, 1936, while Britain and France were wavering over the question of whether to enter into a five power pact involving the Soviet Union in order to isolate Germany, La Civiltà Cattolica published articles purporting to demonstrate that "the Synagogue," or "Jewish intruders," were the levers of power behind Russia, world subversion and the Communist International. Jewish dispersion in the modern world, their control of money, preponderance in socialism and communism were said to constitute a "grave and permanent peril for society." Soviet terrorism was the shortest route to the "supreme Judaic ideal" of transforming the world into a single corporation through a five year plan which would make the work of all creatures flourish, before Israel, aided by a few puppets, would provide the dictatorial board of directors. Coming through a ghastly jumble of references to Divine Providence and perpetual plans, and to three solutions which had been offered previously – assimilation, Zionism and 'special legal status for Jews,' which meant the ghetto – the broad message was 'have nothing to do with Russia or the Jews in a push against Hitler.'¹⁰

Many other publications, both church and secular, followed the lead of La Civiltà Cattolica, which maintained that 'leadership' and developed that theme with linked articles in three issues at fortnightly intervals, the first on May 28, 1937, the day that Chamberlain took office, and the others on June 11 and 23 – in the weeks preceding the publication of the Peel Report. That series was even more disturbing. Referring to a book published in 1922 and "the clear and illuminating exposition of the illustrious English Catholic writer" Hilaire Belloc, the author noted that their dominating spirit and revolutionary tendency made Jews a disruptive element and that Judaism was "a foreign body that irritates and provokes the reactions of the organism it has contaminated."¹¹ Then, giving a lead to Hitler which bears a remarkable similarity to the operations against Muslim Albanians proposed by Professor Vosa Cubrilovic at the Serbian Cultural Club three months earlier (chapter 20, p. 748), he wrote:

The whole question consists in finding the most appropriate way of getting rid of the irritation and re-establishing, on a durable basis, the social organism's equilibrium and tranquillity. There are only two possible solutions: elimination or segregation. Elimination can be achieved in three ways: in a clearly hostile manner, through destruction; in a hostile but less cruel manner, through expulsion; in an amicable and kindly manner, through absorption. The first two ways are contrary to Christian charity and natural law. The third has proven impossible, historically. Segregation ... [or recognition] ... can be achieved in a hostile or amicable manner. In a hostile manner, without taking the foreign element into account, but considering only the contaminated organism and its interests. This manner is not in accord with charity, and moreover does not eliminate the frictions that provoke the irritation. The amicable solution takes the segregated element fully into account, and seeks to serve the interests of both parties. ...¹²

'Recognition', the author said, was a term which Belloc had chosen to avoid the demeaning implications behind either 'ghetto' or 'segregation'. However it meant the same thing, just with a tone of civility and charity, and it was considered "the only practical and efficacious means of resolving the Jewish question." It had to be "adapted to our time" and brought about, in effect, through the pressure of the dominant community and "not through officially decreed legislation." A purely political solution was not possible, he said, since this "inevitably gives rise either to anti-Semitism, which is more or less violent according to the differing interests of each nation, or to the disruptive ascendancy of Judaism." However, "politics will be able to bring about a solution – if not a definitive solution, at least a provisional one – to the Jewish question, more quickly, more broadly, and more durably, in the degree to which it is inspired by Christian charity and prudence." Charity, linked with prayer for conversion would produce rapprochement and more numerous conversions, while prudence was necessary "to eliminate any danger for Christians" from disruptive Jewish dominance, either materialistic-financial or revolutionary. [Emphasis added.] And in a pathetic bid to establish that neither he nor the Catholic Church was preaching anti-Semitism, the author wrote: "Any form of anti-Semitism is condemned by the church, and we must recognize that it is not accepted by the majority of civilized nations, which, even if they do not say so explicitly, still preserve many principles of Christian civilization which they have inherited from preceding generations." ¹³ One assumes that he was referring to non-concordat nations rather than trying to describe, or explain, the amorphous Christian gel!

FROM POLITICS TO ECUMENISM

While the British government, through the report of the Peel Commission, was seeking to resolve, or at least to divert attention from the consequences of religious discord by political means, and while the Vatican was doing its damndest to encourage Hitler to eliminate one of the parties to the discord by political means, another body was being formed in a bid to resolve it by alternative means. Delegates from around the world gathered for a relatively small meeting at Westfield College, Hampstead, from July 8–10, 1937. There were only 35 people present but, as representatives of most branches of the ecumenical movement, they were expected to make a decision of far-reaching importance which would greatly influence not only the tone and decisions of two major ecumenical conferences which were to follow, but also the future direction of the church world wide. They were expected to recommend the establishment of a World Council of Churches.

As expected, the Westfield Committee did resolve that a draft constitution for a World Council of Churches should be drawn up by representatives from the 'Life and Work' and 'Faith and Order' conferences jointly and that the council, when established, should carry out the programs of those two bodies and act as a coordinating body for the whole of the ecumenical movement. In turn the basic proposals of the Westfield Committee were adopted by both the Life and Work Conference which met at Oxford from July 12–26, and the Faith and Order Conference at Edinburgh from August 3–18. They were to be followed in December, 1938, by the International Missionary Conference at Tambaram, India. Together the three conferences involved the main thrusts of the ecumenical movement which had been going along in parallel for some forty years.¹⁴ The first two appointed seven representatives to meet as a Committee of Fourteen to draft a constitution for a World Council of Churches, but when that committee met in London immediately after the Edinburgh Conference, the world situation was very tense. And it was not only Hitler's conduct, the political situation and relations with the Roman Catholic Church which they had to consider. The theological debates within the church-at-large had gradually intensified during the previous ten years as well. Karl Barth's Doctrine of the Word of God had been in circulation in German for several years and in English for about two years. Possibly the outstanding contribution to Christian thinking since Paul wrote his letter to the church at Rome, the work had sent another surge of Barthian controversy through the great halls of theology. The Committee of Fourteen therefore had to wrestle with the question of what constituted basic Christian belief and, consequently, which churches would be eligible for membership of the World Council of Churches. It therefore decided to consult even more widely with the churches through a special Advisory Conference which would meet at Utrecht in May, 1938.

Until Barth, the answer to those questions, within the mainstream non-Catholic churches anyway, would have been fairly straight forward. Those who accepted the Nicene Creed with its Trinitarian statement were Christians and those who did not were heretics and one step worse than Jews. But Barth had introduced both clarification and confusion. He had raised doubts about the validity of the Doctrine of the Trinity, saying there was no basis for it in the Gospels, but he had then backed away from issuing a full blooded challenge, declared that he had no option except to take it as his starting point if he wanted to be considered a Christian, and proceeded to write the most complex justification and explanation of the Doctrine of the Word of God which the world had seen to that time. The answer was therefore no longer as simple as 'yes' or 'no'. In the circumstances it is not surprising that for some of the churches and their representatives the concept of a world body which would speak as "the voice of non-Roman Christendom" offered a way to avoid a definition, either supportive of, or rejecting that definition. But to others it suggested a 'super-church', the loss of constitutional independence, and the acceptance of an agreed statement of beliefs which they simply could not acknowledge. The outcome, after very vigorous debate, was therefore agreement that the World Council of Churches would not be a 'super-church'; that it would not have constitutional authority over its member churches; that its authority would be dependent upon the wisdom which it could demonstrate; and that in line with established Trinitarian belief it would be "a fellowship of Churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour."

In fact the conferences and committees had no real choice. Debate on the issue at Edinburgh had been very lively with the majority insisting that the only Christian belief was Trinitarian belief. "Strong emphasis was laid on the guarantee concerning the basis, and it was urged that the Trinitarian basis should be maintained as the basis of all work in the field of Faith and Order." ¹⁵ Therefore if the committee had resolved otherwise, the movement to establish the World Council of Churches would have been thrown into disarray and a world council may not have come into being for many years. The world situation was so critical and the need for a body which could act for, support and coordinate the work of the Orthodox, Reformed and Protestant wing of the world church was so urgent that the Council simply had to be established. It was a giant leap forward and theological reassessment and refinement would simply have to wait.

The flash of inspiration which could have followed the decision to proceed was unfortunately dampened by several things. There were the storm clouds of persecution hanging over both the church as a whole and Jews in Germany. There was the Vatican's opposition to the ecumenical movement and the tensions which that caused for the Orthodox and Conformist churches who saw themselves as something of a bridge between the Catholic and Protestant wings, and there was the gnawing fear that another major war was likely. But while those things were very depressing they were equally a series of challenges, and the churches knew that if they were going to do anything about them, then they would be better able to do it in cooperation. Accordingly a provisional committee for the World Council of churches was established. Of course the theological debates continued, somewhat muted, while Hitler attended to some much more immediate practical matters. He had gone to Rome where it was the pope's turn to make himself conspicuous by his absence,¹⁶ to build on the pact which had been negotiated during the previous few months with Mussolini and which split the Four Power Pact of 1933 neatly down the middle. And although the world didn't stand still and wait while the "separated broken pieces" of the church got themselves together in some sort of unity, they had Pastor Martin Niemöller, who had been arrested immediately before the Oxford Conference, as a symbol both of Christian resistance to Nazism and for the Ecumenical Movement. He was not brought to a show trial until February, 1938.

SINO-JAPANESE CLASH

On the same day that the Peel Report was published, July 7, 1937, and as the Oxford group was preparing to meet to set up the World Council of Churches, Japanese and Chinese forces clashed on the outskirts of Peking. Within days the incidents between Japan and China worsened, not by decisions of the respective governments but because of the decisions of local commanders. When the Japanese commander launched a major attack, full scale war developed. Western interests supporting China came under attack, and it became apparent that British insecurity in the Mediterranean could be a grave handicap in dealing with the 'China crisis'. On July 12 Eden warned the Japanese ambassador that an escalation of the fighting would undermine chances of an Anglo-Japanese settlement and, next day, he requested US collaboration in a joint approach to Japan to advise it not to move troops into North China. His request was rejected. The US was “determined to avoid joint action” and it was supporting Chiang Kai-Shek. On July 16 Britain’s ambassador, Knatchbull-Hugessen, proposed that Japan should withdraw its forces from Shanghai and that the European powers and the United States, with rights in the International Settlement, should take responsibility for protecting Japanese commercial and diplomatic interests and civilians. Whether the US would have agreed to that degree of joint action is problematical. It was not put to the test. Chiang Kai-Shek declared on July 17 that he would not agree to any further infringement of China’s territorial integrity or sovereignty. When, in the absence of a declaration of war, the United States did not invoke its Neutrality Act the situation was complicated considerably. It adopted a policy of non-intervention in what was still euphemistically called “the Sino-Japanese controversy” in order to minimize international concern within the framework of the conspiracy of silence. In fact the ‘controversy’ was, by that time, open war in which Japan was blockading the Chinese coast, invading the mainland and gradually pushing Chiang Kai-shek backwards into Central China.

On July 21, Japan rejected the proposal on the grounds that the forces of the other powers were too few for the task. On the 23rd, China accepted the proposal then, on the 24th, Knatchbull-Hugessen was seriously injured in a Japanese naval air attack when he drove through the war zone “without having had the sense to inform the Japanese military authorities in advance.”¹⁷ While the Soviet press exercised “remarkable moderation”, the US press was critical of Japan but restrained, Germany was careful not to antagonize either trading partner, and Italy lost no opportunity to encourage Japan, but the British media attacked Japan with “dangerous emotionalism” and promoted the view that China was more interested in peace than Japan.¹⁸ The Times carried what has been described as an hysterically anti-Japanese editorial which antagonized the Japanese government greatly because, like other foreign governments, it saw the Times as the voice of the British government.¹⁹

If Japan had agreed to the British proposal it would have been, in effect, accepting a greater role for the European powers and the United States in Asian affairs and this would have been a total contradiction of its efforts to remove their influence and to eliminate Western exploitation. On the other hand Chiang Kai-Shek required greater support from Britain and the United States unless he was prepared to either accept Japan’s plans for regional economic cooperation and evict the European powers and the United States, which would have weakened his position in relation to the Chinese Communist Party, or cooperate more fully with the Communists and accept a full scale war to push Japan out of continental Asia. Chiang Kai-Shek could not have known that the British cabinet had already discussed the possibility of relinquishing its extra-territorial rights in China because it could no longer defend them and confront either Germany or Italy in Europe at the same time that vital resources were diverted to secure the Middle East. If he had known that, he may have made a different decision. He would have been well advised to make a different decision. But he was already so dependent upon British and United States support that without that knowledge he could not act on either of his other alternatives.

While Chiang Kai-Shek sought to hold Britain’s support, the Twentieth Congress of the World Zionist Organization meeting in Zurich from August 3–16, considered and rejected the Peel Partition Plan and asked the Jewish Agency Executive to ascertain Britain's terms for the establishment of a full Jewish State.²⁰ At first sight that may appear unexpected in view of the discussions between Weizmann and Coupland six months earlier. But in fact it was straight forward logic. It is most unlikely that the British cabinet knew the content of the Weizmann-Coupland discussions. Ministers would have only received the recommendations which flowed from them. In the circumstances the Zionist leaders were justifiably confident that they could maintain a position of disharmony with the Arab Palestinians and their goal of a Jewish state would be granted. They wanted that goal on the most favourable terms possible. Why should they agree to the first offer which was placed on the table? They were no different to any of the powers, great or small, which were trying to negotiate territorial advantage, and they had learned very well from their British mentors.

Japanese forces reached the perimeter of Shanghai on August 9 while the Zionist Congress was still in session. Roosevelt still chose not to invoke the Neutrality Act in order to avoid cutting off American arms sales to China which the US was favouring. Naturally the arms and strategic materials sales to Japan, including petroleum, also continued. The United States was therefore, in fact, fuelling the conflict and any intention to favour China by leaving access to arms open was undermined because China did not have sufficient funds or trade credit to buy what it needed to repulse Japan's venture into war games.²¹ In doing so, whether by intent or not, United States policy was further aggravating the crisis in which Britain was embroiled because of its own policies. The bombardment of Shanghai began in mid August and the Japanese accidentally bombed Britain's Christian missions which were, naturally, integrated into its commercial community in the International Territory. But the British press did not report it as an accident: it was portrayed as a deliberate attack on Britain's Christian institutions and that made it reason enough for reprisals or disciplinary intervention. Many people in Britain again began to stir from the gripping interlude (or was it the dream world?) of royal religious and moral misdemeanor, pomp and circumstance, to the reality of the world around them and to wonder what those nasty Japanese were up to.

Perhaps the Japanese had forgotten the lesson of 1868 that they could not have trade with Britain without having Christian missions as well. If the French had swooped on DaNang in Indo China in 1858 when Tu-Duc was said to be breaking up a Christian mission, and if Britain had pounded the Japanese Shogunate into submission and into the history books in 1863 when Christian missions (non-British at that) were being persecuted at Kagoshima, (chapter 15, pp. 14–16), what was the British government waiting for now? Had it forgotten its missionary commitment? The Japanese certainly had not forgotten that they were not allowed to trade in competition with the successors of those deeply committed British Christian administrators. Perhaps the British government was distracted by other matters. Like holding an empire together!

The pace of action continued to accelerate. In quick succession China sought League of Nations intervention in 'the Sino-Japanese incident', the denial of credit and munitions, and the imposition of sanctions against Japan; Japan and Germany were drawn closer together as a result, and Craigie warned Eden of his fears that Hitler would take full advantage of it. On September 8 Chamberlain raised in cabinet the question of some movement of naval forces to the Far East in view of the war in China, the destruction of British assets and the threat to its nationals. The dogmatic pursuit of his 'plan for war in one theatre' was now, very quickly, driving him to desperate lengths and about that time he determined that the next step towards achieving dialogue with Hitler and thereby reaching a settlement with Germany was to establish some points of personal contact between Downing Street and Berlin. This is illustrated by a letter he wrote to his sister Hilda on September 12. He wrote that he was resolved to embark upon a 'double policy of rearmament and better relations with Germany and Italy which will carry us safely through ...', the only obstacle being the Foreign Office, which he was afraid would not 'play up'. The FO had no imagination and no courage to pursue a settlement with Germany, he told her.²²

ARAB REACTION

But while Chamberlain contemplated splitting the Royal Navy, delegations of leaders from several Arab countries met with the Arab Higher Committee at Bloudan, near Damascus, Syria, in early September, and also formally rejected the Peel Plan. They treated the continuation of the mandate and the suggestion of any alienation of Palestinian land with contempt. The Arab Rebellion was then renewed with great ferocity, the British District Commissioner in Galilee was murdered and, in retaliation, the Arab Higher Committee was dissolved and the Grand Mufti was stripped of his non-religious duties. This further inflamed the situation. The Grand Mufti fled to Lebanon and supported the continuing Arab revolt against British authority from there²³ ... and two other dignitaries visited the region about the same time. The director of the Jewish Department of Germany's Security Service (SD), Herbert Hagen, and one of his expert staff, Adolf Eichmann, visited Palestine and Egypt to study Zionism and the political situation. At the end of his visit report Eichmann concluded that the Third Reich should not step up emigration of Jews to Palestine because "as far as the Reich is concerned, the creation of an independent state by the Jews in Palestine should be impeded."²⁴ It is noteworthy that he did not recommend that emigration be discontinued and it is reasonable to assume that his reason was that it would have conflicted with Hitler's policy of removing them from Germany as quickly as possible. However, because of its lack of understanding of the fundamental causes of the crisis, Britain further aggravated the overall situation and helped Eichmann's ultimate cause along by supplying arms to Zionist colonies for defence against Arab attacks and this period saw the rise of the organized Zionist guerrilla and para-military groups which later turned violently against the British administration as well. Britain could barely prevent a total collapse of its mandatory authority and civil war, and its position was gradually becoming untenable.

On September 23, Eden pressed for cabinet support and aid for China which he believed was fighting "Britain's war." However cabinet had before it a response from the Chiefs of Staff and the Admiralty, to Chamberlain's proposal of September 8, and a recommendation that the Royal Navy should not be split, with half of it going to the Far East. Their advice was that to divide the Royal Navy between the Eastern and Western hemispheres by sending two battleships to Singapore "was more likely to encourage the revisionist powers than to deter them."²⁵ Accordingly, no specific initiatives were taken. Two days later, on September 25, Craigie pressed for support for a Japanese peace proposal which involved the declaration of a neutral zone in China south of Peking and Tientsin; a friendly Chinese regime in North China with Japan having the right to station 5,000 troops there; economic concessions including the lowering of Chinese import duties; cooperation against Communism; autonomy for Inner Mongolia; and de facto recognition of Manchukuo as an area of Japanese influence. In view of the extent of Japanese victories to that stage, European and American reluctance to intervene to support China directly, and the need to loosen the ties between Germany and Japan, Chamberlain supported the proposal and persuaded a reluctant Eden to forward the Japanese proposals to the Chinese on September 29. Chiang Kai-Shek dismissed it as unacceptable. The situation in the Middle East was an ingredient in both recommendations.

During this period the deepening crisis in Palestine provided the stimulus for steps within the Muslim world community to recover the cohesion which had been lost as a result of the British-French carve up of the Arab region of the Middle East and the abolition of the Ottoman Caliphate. In West Asia and the Middle East two groupings were emerging more or less on a regional basis and the first of these was set up under the Saadebad Pact while the Peel debate was raging. Its members were Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Afghanistan which, together, formed a continuous chain from the Bosphorus to India along the southern flank of the Soviet Union. That development must have given Britain's strategists much cause for concern. At the same time, Mein Kampf was having a strong impact in the Arab world and it became very clear to the British government in the final quarter of 1937 that support for Hitler was increasing among the Muslim communities of North Africa and the Middle East. If war broke out and they supported him, he could well gain control of Britain's oil supplies.

Thus, at one level, the Arab revolt "constituted a troublesome policing operation for the War Office and an unpleasant political dilemma for the Cabinet." But: "seen against the darkening background of world politics, however, the revolt was a strategic complication of the first order." Palestine's role in Middle Eastern and imperial strategy was vital. First, it was intended to serve as a buffer and reserve for the defence of Egypt and the Suez. Second, it was the route for Britain's air communications with India and the Far East and the overland route linking Egypt with Britain's bases in Iraq. Third, in contingency planning for the closing of the Mediterranean and Red Sea Routes, it was the terminus of the alternative reinforcement route from India via the Persian Gulf. And fourth, the port of Haifa was not only the Mediterranean terminus of the oil pipeline bringing supplies from the oil fields of Iraq and Iran, it was also a potential base for light naval forces operating in the East Mediterranean. None of these things could be considered secure while the revolt continued. In addition to that, the sheer number of troops needed to deal with the revolt was seriously weakening Britain's capacity to field an expeditionary force to France. Within a year of the Peel Plan being published, Palestine would become “a crippling liability for an imperial power already badly over-extended and under duress” instead of providing the strategic depth and reserve for the defence of the Middle East nexus which those who drafted the Balfour Declaration had anticipated.²⁶

The consequences of the Christian Western World's self-understanding, based on that of the church, the policies pursued throughout the amorphous Christian gel and the parody of Mein Kampf were combining to drag the Western powers, and Britain in particular, deeper and deeper into a quagmire of confusion. The result was that almost any actions which Western powers took to stabilize affairs in Asia – from their point of view anyway – strengthened the hands of either Japan, Hitler's Germany, or Russia and international Communism. But the Western Christian sense of indignation and superiority became even more inflated, especially when Japan's atrocities became fodder for another round of propaganda. The Archbishop of Canterbury contributed to the controversy when he insisted, against the protests of the Ambassador Craigie in Japan, on addressing an anti-Japanese meeting in the Royal Albert Hall on October 5.²⁷ No Christian powers would commit the sort of atrocities which Japan had committed in China. Would they? On the same day that the Archbishop spoke out, Roosevelt publicly called for aggressor nations to be “quarantined.” He was just ahead of a call by the League of Nations Advisory Committee for League members to do nothing to hinder China in the war pending a meeting of members of the Nine Power Treaty. So Eden worked for Anglo-American cooperation in the Far East and for sanctions against Japan which China wanted, but Chamberlain was in contrary mood. He told cabinet on October 6 that he could imagine nothing “more suicidal than to pick a quarrel with Japan at the present moment.” He said that with the European situation so serious, if Britain “were to become involved in the Far East the temptation to the Dictator States to take action in Eastern Europe or Spain, might be irresistible.”²⁸

An invitation received in early October for Lord Halifax to attend an international sporting exhibition in Berlin provided the opportunity for the personal contact between Downing Street and Hitler which Chamberlain was working towards. Eden accepted the proposal but Vansittart argued strongly against it. Hitler, who, as we have already seen, also wanted an Anglo-German understanding, asked that the planned diplomatic discussions be kept secret, and Goebbels asked the new British Ambassador, Sir Neville Henderson, to see that the British press was kept quiet. But on the day that Henderson met Goebbels to discuss details of the Halifax visit the Evening Standard reported details of an offer by Hitler that he would make no colonial demands for ten years if he was given a free hand in Eastern Europe – basically the same proposal which Ribbentrop had relayed to Churchill in May. The Evening Standard's source was the Foreign Office. Sparks flew in both countries over the publication. Then on October 11, before a final decision on the proposed Halifax visit had been made, the Duke and Duchess of Windsor arrived in Berlin, against the wishes of the Foreign Office, for private meetings over two weeks with Göring, Hess, Himmler, Goebbels and Hitler at the Berghof.²⁹ At that time Leeper gave the press a note to the effect that the proposed Halifax visit was also an informal private initiative and did not mean any change in foreign policy.

When an interdepartmental meeting was convened to discuss sanctions against Japan on October 13 there was a "virtual solid wall of disapproval" from each of the Admiralty, Treasury and the War Office. In practice, League sponsored sanctions meant unilateral British sanctions because Britain was the League's only significant naval power. In addition to that, both the Chiefs of Staff and the Committee of Imperial Defence (CID) were opposed to any action "which would result in a diversion of our limited resources from our main objective which is the security of this country against German aggression."³⁰ (Emphasis added.) Apparently unconvinced, Eden pressed on to persuade the British Cabinet and the Nine Power meeting in Brussels on November 3 to impose sanctions, but he was undermined by technical advice that sanctions would take between one and two years to have any serious effect on Japan's war effort and strong naval opposition to Hong Kong being used as a base at which to assemble aircraft for China. Then when Italy joined Germany and Japan in the Anti-Comintern Pact on November 6, his position was virtually derailed by the knowledge that further action against Japan by Britain would actually lift Japan out of diplomatic isolation by encouraging closer ties with the Axis Powers. Mussolini's decision that Italy should join Germany and Japan in the Anti-Comintern Pact, (the result of persuasion by Ribbentrop), greatly enhanced both Hitler's and Mussolini's positions, and Britain's was further weakened. Although it was presented as a strengthening of alliances to inhibit Soviet Communist influence, all of the power brokers recognized that the German plan, well understood by Mussolini, was to increase pressure on Austria. Mussolini's aims were to strengthen Italy's "development ... concentrating its interest in the Mediterranean and the colonies" (of Africa and the Middle East) and to rid himself of the distraction of "mounting guard over Austrian independence", especially if the Austrians in "German State Number two" no longer wanted it.³¹

The British press dutifully repeated Hitler's words that the pact was intended to safeguard Western Civilization against Bolshevism even though Western Civilization was clearly the last thing Japan wanted to protect. In fact what Ribbentrop described as "the alliance of the aggressive nations against the satisfied countries" clearly contained the seeds of "global cooperation between the three signatories (which posed) an alarming possibility for Britain and France with their empires as well as the USSR," and helped to strengthen the impression that in less than five years Germany had become the most powerful country in Europe under Hitler, the most successful leader.³² Craigie introduced another dimension to that understanding of Anti-Comintern cooperation when he advised London by telegram on November 13, that Germany might undermine Britain's prestige in China by offering to mediate between it and Japan.³³

Then, ignoring Leeper's 'advice' that no special significance should be attached to Halifax' visit to Germany, the Times and the Daily Telegraph ran exaggerated reports on November 15 based on direct briefings from Downing Street, and next day the Daily Telegraph published a leader indicating the new directions the government might take in foreign policy that was 'inspired' by Chamberlain himself. Anthony Eden was 'infuriated' at both Chamberlain's view of the whole matter and about not being consulted on what the government's view was on such a basic matter. He was also distressed at the way in which Chamberlain was using the Times and the Daily Telegraph so blatantly for his own advantage.³⁴

When the matter of German intervention in the Sino-Japanese crisis was before cabinet on November 17, Chamberlain, influenced by Craigie's advice that Britain would be of little use as a friend "even to China" if its influence in Tokyo sank to zero, suggested that Britain and the United States should try to mediate jointly in a bid to shut Germany out, and discussions were quickly arranged.³⁵ On the same day, Steward briefed Dr. Hesse at the German Embassy in London on Chamberlain's anger at the Evening Standard report and on his view that rapprochement would be slow because of the nature of the English.

HALIFAX AND HITLER

Lord Halifax then arrived on November 19 for his 'private visit to the sporting exhibition' – and proceeded directly to the Berghof for discussions with Hitler.³⁶ The dictator was quite open. He told Halifax he wanted 'close union' between Germany and Austria, a solution to the problem of Germans in the Sudetenland of Czechoslovakia, recognition of Germany's economic interests in south eastern Europe, and resolution of the future of Danzig and the Polish Corridor.³⁷ And from Halifax he learned that Chamberlain was anxious for an Anglo-German settlement, that cabinet to cabinet discussions could be a starting point, that Britain wanted "a general European settlement" and that to get it the government would make concessions on colonies and on Eastern Europe.³⁸

Halifax' meeting with Hitler was critical. It put Hitler in a more powerful position than ever. He knew that Britain was desperate for an Anglo-German accord that would take pressure off its management of empire, so he showed no immediate interest in such an accord. He had previously proposed one but he no longer needed to go begging for it. He knew that he could have a few colonies back if he asked for them later, so he did not need to ask for them at the moment. And he also knew that he could demand the Austrian Anschluss and Czechoslovakia on his terms and get them. Britain would not go to war over either issue – at least not under a Chamberlain-Halifax government. It had totally undermined its European allies and the more quickly Hitler moved the more territory he could take. He moved very quickly.

At that meeting Halifax noted Hitler's absurd sensitivity to adverse press comment, that he distrusted democratic methods as inefficient, blundering and unsuited to the hard world, that democracy paralyzed a nation's capacity to face facts, and that it fed on distortions from a free-booting and licentious press which undermined international relations. In view of that, on the morning of November 21, before keeping an appointment with Goebbels, Halifax issued a call to the press corps to create the right atmosphere for discussions between Britain and Germany. He was somewhat shaken to be told by Goebbels when they met that a primary pre-condition for settlement with Germany was the cessation of British press attacks on Hitler.³⁹ From the time of that visit to Berlin by Lord Halifax to initiate a new Chamberlain-British policy towards Germany, Chamberlain had to move quickly, too. He became determined to rewrite the Treaty of Versailles to gain 'lasting peace' with Germany – or at least to gain time to resolve the crises affecting Britain's ability to hold its empire – through 'appeasement' which was a new term for giving away other people and their territory. He did not have any options left. He had totally exposed his hand.

But there was another visitor in Berlin about the same time as Halifax. The Mufti's representative, a Syrian Arab Nationalist, Sa'id 'Abd al-Fattah al-Imam, was pressing on German officials an Arab proposal which included demands for German propaganda, political and financial support for the Arab independence movement in exchange for Arab efforts to develop trade with Germany, the development of a pro-German atmosphere in the Arab World, cooperation in the struggle against the spread of Communism, and the continuation of violence to unsettle the French-occupied Arab regions. Al-Imam did not get an immediate favourable response from the Germans. They were happy to take advantage of Arab Nationalism, but they were constrained by Hitler's policy of avoiding a rupture with Britain while he helped sustain Italy's 'free hand' in the Mediterranean and North African region ... and while he encouraged Germany's Jews to quit their homes and go to Palestine. They had to wait for Hitler to decide a policy direction.

Chamberlain knew that his policy of appeasement was contrary to Britain's commitment to both the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations, and that it now involved major dangers, especially if the British public learned of the reversal of their country's policy 'prematurely'. He needed people around him who were of like mind and he needed close control over the press. Secrecy over his manoeuvring was essential. The gulf between Vansittart and the Foreign Office on one hand, and Chamberlain and Ambassador Henderson on the other, had become unbridgeable, and a divided press would become the battleground for efforts by the Foreign Office to make the public aware of the dangers involved in dealing with Hitler in the way that Chamberlain had chosen. Accordingly, on December 1, Chamberlain gained Cabinet's agreement that Vansittart would be replaced by the more agreeable Sir Alexander Cadogan. Vansittart was to be given the new powerless and staffless post of Chief Diplomatic Adviser.⁴⁰ However Chamberlain had not moved swiftly enough for his purpose. On December 2 and 3 the Daily Telegraph published two reports by Victor Gordon-Lennox on German colonial claims. Ambassador Henderson complained to Lord Halifax who wrote to Eden (his successor as Foreign Secretary) about the adverse reaction in Germany, pressing him to 'come as near as possible to wringing Gordon-Lennox' neck.'⁴¹ The authority of FOND to issue information directly to the media was immediately restricted and from December 7 members of the government took a new approach with intense pressure being exerted directly on journalists and cartoonists. Notable targets were Victor Gordon-Lennox and Low of the Evening Standard.

Both Washington and Tokyo were reluctant to take up Chamberlain's proposal for joint Anglo-US mediation in the Sino-Japanese 'controversy' and nothing had come of it when the crisis deepened on December 12. Japanese artillery and bombers, acting without authority from their superiors, attacked two British and one US gunboats. It was a symbol of British and US impotence in the face of Japanese determination, and it came on the same day that Nanking fell to the Japanese at the end of a six-week block-buster campaign which has been described as one of history's most brutal orgies of sadism and brutality.⁴² China's ill-matched coalition of rulers had already been forced to move their capital to Chongqing and Peiping (Peking) had also fallen. Proposals to send part of the British fleet to Singapore and for a joint naval blockade were then raised again and discussed in Washington and London, but the British Foreign Office preferred to put the emphasis on negotiations supported by a show of strength.

At the beginning of December, (about the time that cabinet agreed to move Vansittart), Eden was approached by Germany's ambassador Ribbentrop on the question of colonies. Eden made it clear that it could not be considered by Britain in isolation and had to be discussed in the context of a general European settlement with the aim of "an increased sense of international security and enhanced prospects for the preservation of peace". It would be quite impossible for His Majesty's Government to contemplate the cession of colonial territory unless they received some counterpart, he said. But he did not dispute Ribbentrop's assertion that his Government considered that Germany had a right to colonies and that it would be a matter of regret if that question "became embedded in a number of other political questions which had been impossible to settle in the past".⁴³ The coincidence of attitude among all the European Christian powers to their "right" to have colonies was indeed quite remarkable.

During the weeks following the Eden-Ribbentrop talks there were numerous discussions in cabinet and among ministers about what colonial concessions should be made to Hitler. African territories held by both Belgium and Portugal were discussed as well as those held by Britain. Eden makes it quite clear in his memoirs that there was disagreement between him and Prime Minister Chamberlain over the issue. He reports telling fellow ministers that "in the circumstances we should be very careful indeed in what we said to Germany, and give her no possible excuse for insinuating that we were trying to effect a colonial settlement at the expense of other powers interested in tropical Africa."⁴⁴ He told cabinet that according to discussions between Lord Halifax and Hitler, it was for Britain to take the next concrete step if it wanted a general settlement with Germany. And he quotes Chamberlain as telling French ministers that he did not think that it would be possible to mobilize opinion in England in support of forcible intervention against Germany on behalf of Czechoslovakia, but that there would be support for any attempt to bring about 'a reasonable and peaceful settlement' between Germany and Czechoslovakia.⁴⁵

Eden was reflecting the attitudes across the Empire which were changing perceptibly as a result of the progressive weakening of Britain's position. The colonies which were dominated by their indigenous communities, plus the dominions of South Africa and Canada with their mixed European heritage, were looking for maximum independence in determining the structure of their economies and the course of their foreign policies, and even the ending of imperial ties. The other two white settler-dominated dominions, Australia and New Zealand, were developing strange blends of isolationism and imperialism. The only one which offered anything like unequivocal support for Britain on the basis of collective security was still New Zealand and it did so out of fear of the consequences of its geographic isolation.

Later, after World War II erupted, Britain and its allies did all they could to paint Germany as a territorial aggressor and to show its policies to be the product of some unique kind of Hitlerism. They conveniently forgot what good company he had been in only a couple of years earlier and how many national and dominion leaders, eager to give away other people and their land to protect their own positions of privilege, had pressed for him to be allowed to use exactly the same 'bully-boy' tactics adopted by the Western Alliance previously. The parody of Mein Kampf continued to unfold.

PEEL PLAN 'NOT BINDING'

The situation had actually become so critical in Britain's three major regions of security interest that the role of the British army had been under review for some time and the Government had been forced to totally re-evaluate Britain's position in the Middle East because of a growing realization in Whitehall of the weakness of Britain's position. Now, with the rejection of the Peel Plan the fact was driven home to other observers that the crisis in the Middle East constituted a direct threat not only to Britain's imperial position but to the stability of the entire Western world. Thus in mid December 1937, with an Arab fireball in Palestine being the last thing the British government could afford, it announced – a mere five months after its release – that it was not bound by the Peel partition plan but it could not announce any alternative proposal. Then on December 22 cabinet noted that any continental commitment for the army virtually had to be eliminated, being ranked at the bottom of the review's priorities. The Secretary to both cabinet and the CID had even advised that after providing for the military requirements of the empire, the additional provision made previously to equip the Expeditionary Force for service on the Continent should be cancelled.⁴⁶ The army's share of the defence budget was therefore drastically pared and, almost by default, imperial defence was now defined as its essential role.⁴⁷ (Emphasis added.) The matter of sanctions against Japan was also raised again and, on December 28, the head of the Industrial Intelligence Centre was ordered to put aside a memorandum he was preparing on the use of economic pressure against Germany and to concentrate instead on Japan.⁴⁸

Japan had established puppet governments in the occupied provinces; those innocent Christian missions had been bombed; rivers had been blockaded; and the League of Nations had declared Japan to be the aggressor. Naturally there was no mention of Western provocation, involvement or duplicity. Western sympathies shifted in favour of China and its propagandists filed the details ready for the day they might be needed. But on the same day that the economic action plan was ordered, Cadogan prepared a minute in which he noted the legitimacy of Japan's grievances and difficulties and that Britain should not be blind to them even though Japan had sought to remedy them the wrong way. He wrote: "we should be wrong in thinking that a mere return to the status quo (if that were possible) would be a solution of the Far Eastern problem.”⁴⁹

According to Cockett, as Chamberlain gained confidence in his role as Prime Minister some of his briefings were so patently contrary to all other existing evidence that many civil servants were at a loss to understand why the lobby journalists were prepared to transcribe what he had to say without any independent evaluation or critique of the veracity of his comments. He was also very careful to court three or four ‘true-blue Lobby correspondents’ from Conservative papers whom he would honour with private meetings and extra information. He became increasingly aggressive towards the journalists and openly manipulative, refusing to answer off-the-cuff questions and insisting that any question should be submitted four hours in advance if the journalist were to expect a reply. James Margach records that any dissent was greeted with ‘a cold arrogance and intolerance’, and journalists who expressed suspicions about Hitler’s or Mussolini’s intentions that differed from Chamberlain’s own views would be answered with the stock reprise that ‘he was surprised that such an experienced journalist was susceptible to Jewish-Communist propaganda.’ Chamberlain is said to have had a special relationship with W.W. Hadley, the editor, the Sunday Times, who was by far the most consistent and extravagant in his praise of the PM’s actions and policies. Contrary to normal practice, Conservative Party officials also briefed the lobby, and the party’s Director General, Sir Robert Topping, hosted selected journalists at the St. Stephen’s Club.⁵⁰

When Chamberlain used Steward and Ball to set the tone of political reporting on a daily basis, plus personal contacts between himself and Lord Kemsley (the Sunday Times, Daily Sketch and several provincial papers), and between his inner cabinet of Sir John Simon, Sir Samuel Hoare and Lord Halifax and other press proprietors (“press barons”) to influence editorial policy, the conspiracy had reached top gear. As already noted, the most influential individual contacts were between Hoare and Lord Beaverbrook and Halifax and Geoffrey Dawson. Chamberlain confided in and trusted Kemsley, but Lord Astor was also one of his keen admirers. However, Lord Astor entertained ministers, newspaper proprietors and editors at Cliveden at weekend gatherings which took on a sinister aspect as politics became more partisan. The participants became labelled as ‘the Cliveden set’ and they were widely believed to be actively plotting the appeasement process. Lord Camrose (brother of Lord Kemsley) and Lord Beaverbrook were the only press barons to maintain a personal friendship with Winston Churchill, the arch opponent of appeasement, while he was out of office.⁵¹

Along with Britain’s other ills, the Spanish Civil War dragged on and, like the Sino Japanese “controversy” it had to be represented to the public at large as a domestic squabble and a non-event as far as Britain was concerned. But, irrespective of bland reports of cabinet discussions and press statements, the British government knew that there were some international crises which it was unquestionably directly related to. With the prospect of war with Germany looming larger every day, it had to put its own house in order or face the possibility of significant domestic groups in Britain forming fifth column relationships with Hitler. Of major importance in this regard was the prospect of a hostile Ireland or even an alliance between Ireland and Germany. In addition to the perceived need to 'guide' public opinion or relations with Germany there was thus another consideration behind the new arrangements Chamberlain had put in place. The government could not afford to antagonize the Vatican by opposing its interests in Spain while it completed delicate negotiations in Ireland.

IRISH INDEPENDENCE

Then on December 29, 1937, the proclamation of the sovereign, independent, democratic state of Eire forced Britain to begin negotiations over the use of Irish ports and military bases. Complete reconciliation was hardly possible but, as the price of Irish neutrality in the event of war with Germany and the outlawing of the Irish Republican Army by the government of Eire, Britain renounced all rights to the naval use of Queenstown and Berehaven and the base at Lough Swilly. Winston Churchill, still languishing on the back benches, blasted the government for agreeing to those demands because it weakened Britain's ability to control Atlantic shipping routes.⁵² It therefore appears that the government was influenced more by the need to placate the Vatican and to minimize the risk of a deal between Ireland and Germany.

[The roots of that decision went back to the first world war. Sinn Fein's Easter uprising against conscription for British war service in 1916 had been discussed in advance by an envoy for the Provisional Irish Government, Count Plunkett, and Pope Benedict XV who "conferred His Apostolic Benediction on the men who were facing death for Ireland's liberty".⁵³ The British government was very conscious that Irish sentiment was still much the same two decades after the execution of the republican leader, Roger Casement. Casement had been executed for treason when he returned in a German U-boat to lead the uprising following his attempts to enlist Germany's aid for the Irish cause. Those two factors made a potentially explosive situation but, although the British government had made a series of concessions in response to acute pressure, it was not prepared to allow the secession of a white, Christian community, in what the world had been taught was British home territory. To do so would generate even more pressure for the dismantling of its empire of non-white, non-Christian possessions. The uprisings from 1916 to 1920 had won for the Irish Free State something akin to dominion status in 1922. The continued civil war then led to the abolition of the oath of loyalty to the crown in 1933 and the termination of annual payments to Britain. Coincidentally a customs war was necessary to achieve the British-Irish Trade Agreement and parity with the dominions under the Commonwealth Preference scheme.]

A 'GENERAL SETTLEMENT;' WITH OTHER PEOPLE'S TERRITORIES

Such was the complex situation when Eden, having accepted the principle of Chamberlain's appeasement policy, took a paper to cabinet on January 1, 1938, under the title 'The next steps towards a general settlement with Germany'. Referring to the Halifax/Hitler discussions he noted that Hitler expected Britain to take the next step by putting forward some 'concrete proposals'. His proposal included the offer to Germany of territories in Africa then held by Belgium and Portugal, plus concessions to Sudetan Germans in Czechoslovakia.

By this means Hitler would be bribed out of his plans for the annexation of Czechoslovakia (and the seizure of Vitkowitz) with gifts of other countries' colonies in Africa and concessions for Sudetan Germans in Czechoslovakia.⁵⁴ Eden's memoirs do not clarify whether this was on his or Chamberlain's initiative, but in the absence of clarification on this point it can be assumed that at least one key British minister expected that either Belgium, Portugal or France could be coerced into paying the price for the maintenance of Britain's empire and its industrial interests in Europe intact by virtue of the strength of an alliance between Britain and Germany.^{55 56} However, coercing other countries into handing Hitler pieces of their empires was hardly a strategy which would win international friends and influence people – favourably anyway – and cabinet had to take account of the thrust of the Chiefs of Staff report for December. It noted: "Without overlooking the assistance we could hope to obtain from France and possibly other allies, we cannot foresee the time when our defence forces will be strong enough to safeguard our trade, territory and vital interests against Germany, Italy and Japan at the same time...(and)... they could not exaggerate the importance from the point of view of Imperial Defence of any political or international action which could be taken to reduce the number of our potential enemies and to gain the support of potential allies." ⁵⁷ (Emphasis added.)

Even the sobering impact of that report was apparently not enough for the proposal to be rejected out of hand, or, if it was, it was revived only a few weeks later by Chamberlain in the Cabinet Foreign Affairs Committee.⁵⁸ On Thursday, January 27, he proposed as a move towards a general appeasement of European tensions "an entirely new chapter in the history of African colonial development". He proposed that Hitler's Germany would become one of the African Colonial powers by being given certain territories to administer⁵⁹ and the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office were required to prepare a paper for the committee's consideration. Next day Sir Alexander Cadogan noted in his diary having discussions with Wilson (Treasury) and Parkinson (Colonial Office) about preparing a paper for the Cabinet Foreign Policy Committee on colonial cessions to Germany. He then noted "A bit hard on us, but I must make it go!", and that C.W. Baxter was to represent the FO in discussions with the Colonial Office.⁶⁰

On the following Monday, January 31, Cadogan took the "excellent" first draft of the FO-CO paper on African colonial cessions to a "long talk" with Chamberlain, Halifax, Eden, Sir Horace Wilson, Vansittart and Sir Neville Henderson which he noted ran until 6.45 pm. It was to be his last conference with Eden present as a minister for quite some time. Eden formally resigned next day. Cadogan noted in his diary that the indication of the difficulties and complexities of a 'reshuffle' brought the PM to the idea that we had better 'do the big thing' and give back Tanganyika, subject perhaps to frontier adjustments. He also noted that he believed "this is right" and "Van must have squirmed!"

The pages of the Times during the following few months indicate the nature of the conspiracy of silence as the British government tried to represent, and to handle, each of the crises around the empire as if they were isolated incidents. It was trying desperately to defuse Hitler and to avoid the whole lot merging into an uncontrollable conflagration. In particular, cabinet members went to great lengths in their speeches in parliament to avoid discussing the development of a crisis in Europe, the crisis in the Middle East, the Sino-Japanese War, and the complex conflicts of interest which passed as the neutrality of the United States. Double talk, the use of expressions which were meaningful only to those close to the play, and innuendo camouflaged the fact that Britain was in deep trouble. Noteworthy in that respect was Eden's resignation speech on February 1, sections of which he included in the second volume of his memoirs. That speech was also noteworthy for the accuracy of a couple of his statements of philosophy which serve to further illustrate the double standards which the countries of Europe tried to camouflage in projecting their self-images, in their historical misrepresentations of the colonial era, and in the conduct of the Great War.

*Propaganda against this country ... is rife throughout the world. I am myself pledged to this House not to open conversations until this hostile propaganda ceases ... (and) recent months, recent weeks, recent days have seen the successive violation of international agreements and attempts to secure political decisions by forcible means. We are in the presence of the progressive deterioration of respect for international obligations. It is quite impossible to judge these things in a vacuum ... It is the traditional method of diplomacy to prepare for conversations before they are formally opened. It is seldom right to depart from that method, which has been tested by time and experience. It is certainly never right to do so because one party to the negotiations intimates that it is 'now or never'. Agreements that are worthwhile are never made on the basis of a threat. Nor in the past has this country been willing to negotiate in such conditions ...*⁶¹

Similarly, writing in his memoirs Eden stated that he, personally, had not wished "to align all democracies against all dictatorships, with some of which we (Britain) enjoyed friendly relations. But ... (he continued)... the cleavage already existed, not of our creating; it was between those who kept their word and upheld international law and those who used their words to cloak their next aggression, those who had growing appetites and those who had not."⁶² He would have been more accurate if he had said that the cleavage was between those who had growing appetites and those whose appetites had already been satisfied and who were then intent on keeping control of the larder. Eden's attitude to relations with Germany must be viewed in the light of British and French policies and actions during the European colonial era, the Christian reconstruction of Asia and Africa, and the Balfour Declaration and its consequences in which he was already a key actor. He seems to have totally disregarded the fact that Germany had been stripped of its remaining overseas colonies only twenty years earlier. On that basis we are left to conclude his historical perspectives were as distorted by his European-Christian heritage and self-misunderstanding as were the pope's when he issued Divini Redemptoris in March 1937.

A CLASSIC ENGLISH BACKGROUND

In fact, Eden was a classic example of a product of the European Christian imperial philosophy and, whether he was conscious of it or not, he was a part of the effort to prop it up and to maintain the existing international system of relationships. Although he regarded himself as left-of-centre in the Conservative Party it would have been extraordinary if he reflected anything other than traditional imperial attitudes and preconceptions in his dealings with the rest of the world.

Born into a wealthy, landed and titled family in 1897, Anthony Eden was eight years younger than Hitler. His forebears included a penal reformer who had established the National Bank of Ireland; an economist-sociologist whose book The State of the Poor had been praised by Karl Marx; the last governor of the colony of Maryland; a governor-general of India; diplomats; members of parliament; bishops and counts of the Holy Roman Empire. From Sandroyd school where he won prizes for history and French he went to Eton, then enlisted at the age of eighteen to serve in the Great War. Commissioned three months later, he was awarded the Military Cross and appointed an adjutant at nineteen. He saw service at Ypres, Passchendaele and then La Fere, in the same inhuman, degrading, totally pointless action with its shocking casualties in which Hitler was gassed – probably only a few paces away in the opposing trenches.

Demobilized at twenty-two, Eden entered Christ Church College, Oxford, and gained first class honors after studying Persian, Arabic language, reading Zoroastrian religious works, Persian history and the Qur'an. He decided against a career in the Foreign Office and turned to a career in parliament instead. Within a year, after failing to gain a Liberal held seat which went to a Labour candidate instead, he had gained the safe Conservative seat of Warwick and Leamington in a by-election, well supported by a string of aristocratic connections by birth and by marriage. Then within three years he was in a position to develop more influence on Britain's Foreign Office than if he had served as a civil servant for many more years. He was appointed Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Foreign Secretary. Highly regarded by his colleagues, Eden was appointed Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Office, with junior ministerial rank, in September 1931 and his sights were set squarely on the post of Foreign Secretary. He was finally appointed to it in December 1935 after short periods as Lord Privy Seal and Minister without portfolio for League of Nations Affairs.⁶³

The day after Eden's resignation, Wednesday, February 2, the heads of Treasury, the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office met again with Vansittart, Henderson, Baxter and Eastwood to review the second draft of the plan for an African trade-off with Hitler under the heading 'a new regime in the African Colonies.'

Cabinet must have indeed been very desperate to avoid any action which would affect the delicate balance in the Middle East and thus threaten its hold on that region and its relations with the Asian members of the Commonwealth, for it to have even considered arrangements with other colonial powers in Africa which would have required those powers to surrender territory. Any such arrangements would necessarily have involved either (1) political, military or commercial power to enforce those proposals which would have automatically ended any alliances and stretched Britain's resources more thinly; or (2) concessions or guarantees, or both, from Britain to encourage those powers to make such concessions; or (3) a weakening of existing relationships with those countries with a further heavy tilt in influence in favour of Hitler in Europe and possibly an expanded Axis Alliance against Britain; or (4) an open admission to the world of the indefensible position Britain was in, with the distinct possibility of wavering colonies, Middle East mandated territories – or even the dominions – refusing support or rebelling; and (5) unpredictable responses from the United States, Japan, China and the Soviet Union. Such an African colonial adventure, or “a new regime” was therefore totally untenable.

In fact cabinet was so desperate to prevent any adverse public comment on these and related issues that about this time the Lord Chamberlain imposed censorship of the performing arts to ensure that remarks either offensive or encouraging to Hitler and Germany were not presented in public. Lord Rothermere instructed his newspapers to lend their full support to ‘the only person (Chamberlain) who could save the peace’, and a whispering campaign was begun against Eden who, like the former permanent head of the FO, was becoming isolated from his cabinet colleagues.⁶⁴

But the ‘return of Tanganyika’ as ‘the big thing’, as Chamberlain had mused, was certainly not a quick-fix solution. The surrender of even one important territory to a dictator – one of Japan's partners in the Anti-Comintern Pact – would have been a massive encouragement for Japan to press much harder for the decolonization of Asia and the elimination of International Territories and Extra-territorial Rights. It would also have weakened Britain's strategic position in Africa and the Indian Ocean significantly. The antagonistic response from the other African colonies to Britain's acquiescence in Italy's annexation of Abyssinia had already shown that such a gesture was not likely to be limited to the ‘voluntary’ surrender of one colony. The depth of antagonism generated within the non-white, non-European-Christian world by the trading of non-European countries and their people by, and between, white Christian-European powers was not understood by those white Christian-European powers. In addition, the Italian Abyssinian adventure had previously led to one resignation from the British Cabinet, that of Foreign Minister Samuel Hoare in December 1935.⁶⁵ The Italian-Spanish adventure and Chamberlain's bid to appease both Mussolini and Hitler, aggravated by the disagreements over whether sanctions should be imposed against Japan, had now to lead to another.

The British Cabinet would have assumed that Hitler and his advisers were reflecting on Germany's territorial “rights” at least as much as they were, and they also would have known that debate was raging between various German agencies which had differing views about the Transfer Agreement and German Jewish immigration. They could have expected him to apply more pressure to Britain in that region, to destabilize it, and to use that as a lever to force Britain to meet his other demands. However it is unlikely that, given Hitler's attitude to Jews and his opposition to a Jewish state, they would have anticipated his reaffirmation in January of Germany's commitment to the Ha'avara Transfer Agreement and Jewish emigration from Germany to Palestine. He was confident of the failure of Britain's partition plan for Palestine, he expected Britain to abandon the idea of a Jewish state, and he was perfectly happy to apply more pressure on both parties by that move. Thus, throughout 1938 and until the eventual outbreak of war, the Gestapo and other agencies continued to cooperate with, assist and encourage Zionist agents in Germany and Austria to speed up the emigration of German Jews to Palestine and to secure their entry to that territory by both legal and illegal means.⁶⁶ After all, the Western Christian powers had left him little option. They didn't oppose his policy of forcing the Jews to leave Germany, they wouldn't provide homes elsewhere, and Britain had promised them a national home. He would stop sending them there if Britain provided an alternative home or accommodated his other demands. Britain had made its bed and it had to lie on it.

Cabinet actually devoted a lot of time and energy to the proposal for colonial concessions in Africa over the next few weeks but, as we shall see shortly, they need not have worried about it and they may have been better advised to put the same effort into developing alternative proposals to defuse world tension. When the plan was put to Hitler he paid scant attention to it, and all it did was confirm the perilously weak position that Britain was in. In any case Hitler was not interested in a long line of communication to foreign colonies which he neither understood nor cared for. His plans required the resources and industrial production of Czechoslovakia, including the massive munitions complexes of Skoda, at Pilsen, and Vitkowitz. He wasn't interested in a tradeoff of land in Africa.⁶⁷

However the importance of this episode does not lie in the fact that the British government failed in its bid to trade other people's African colonies for a breathing space to enable it to prop up its own interests in other areas. It lies in the fact that senior British ministers, as contemporaries of Hitler, could even consider such a proposal. Although it was only one incident in the buildup towards World War II, it shows clearly that Britain had not recognized the parody of Mein Kampf. Hitler was aping, in a somewhat exaggerated fashion, the imperial conduct and attitudes of Britain and other powers in the great amorphous Christian gel and he was demonstrating and exposing the consequences of such conduct for all to see. But even in such circumstances key British ministers could still concede that it was the right of a European power – Christian by virtue of either its particular heritage or its papal concordat but brutal by virtue of its heritage and its self misunderstanding – to claim colonies and to reduce subject races to units of commercial productivity and profit for its own citizens. And such colonies – land, resources and people together – could still be bartered or ceded as a means of making “a kind of peaceful contribution” to the international outlook, seen from Christian Europe's point of view, at least.

ANGLO-AMERICAN COOPERATION?

Naturally, to the dominant British mind, such imperial privileges were not to be accorded to a non-Christian, non-European country like Japan. With Britain's interests in the Far East coming under greater and greater threat, Eden was leading a push for naval action against Japan, to draw the United States into Anglo-American cooperation in that sphere, and to re-establish 'white race authority' in the Far East.⁶⁸ To achieve this and to retain Britain's position as a world power, as already noted, he advocated the dispatch of the main fleet to Singapore on several occasions in cabinet and to cabinet colleagues between November 1937 and January 1938. Eden aimed for "an Anglo-American hegemony based on a monopoly of the world's sea power, raw materials and commerce, and thought that, after England had resolved its differences with Germany, peace based on the status quo could be imposed in the Far East and in the Mediterranean, if necessary by an overwhelming show of force."⁶⁹

At that point Hitler was not able to mount, or even to threaten, a frontal assault on the formidable fortifications of Czechoslovakia so, on that particular point, Britain need not have been in a rush. Hitler had to bide his time and wait for either Britain or Austria to crack to gain an easy way in. He had already been assured that Britain would acquiesce in his moves east or southeast provided they had some sort of seal of legality.^{70 71 72} He didn't have to wait long, and his personal authority was increasing rapidly. On February 4, 1938, the cabinet of the Third Reich approved his emergency action in taking personal command of the armed forces and adopted his reorganization of the Wehrmacht. The cabinet was never convened again. Hitler had achieved absolute power in Germany. But he realized that his detractors in the army were waiting for him to make a slip so he stepped up the pressure on both Austria and the army – with a helping hand from Britain.

Italy had accords with both Austria and Germany, and it had agreements with both France and Britain for the support of Austrian independence. Its influence on the future of Austria and in determining Hitler's ability to act on his expansionist policy was therefore important. But because its resources were stretched with military forces occupying or at war in two countries – Abyssinia and Spain – and because of the conflicts of interest exposed by its presence in Spain in support of the Fascists, it was not in a strong bargaining position. However the British Cabinet was having difficulty deciding the circumstances in which it should open discussions with Mussolini. Chamberlain and Foreign Secretary Eden were expressing different views. Then, from February 9, while cabinet was discussing that issue and the related issue of possible colonial concessions in Africa, Sir Joseph Ball, at Chamberlain's initiative, manipulated a press campaign favourable to Italy in order to assist Chamberlain to run his own foreign policy without proper consultation with Eden or the Foreign Office. Tension between the PM and his Foreign Secretary increased.

That move coincided with cabinet's consideration, on February 10, of proposals to restructure Britain's military forces into a system of Imperial Strategic Reserves placed at key locations in the empire, including Palestine and Egypt. Hore-Belisha, the minister responsible, advised cabinet that "because of the special difficulties of the Mediterranean passage [to India and the Far East] it is desirable to locate part of the Imperial Strategic Reserve, as well as its sources of supply, east of the Mediterranean passage."⁷³ However, before that meeting Eden had been advised by Craigie that Britain should adopt a more neutral stance in the Sino-Japanese war in order to avoid further undermining its position in Europe through a strengthening of links between Japan and the Axis powers in retaliation for Britain's support of China. In a telegram dated February 9, which was probably intended for an interdepartmental meeting which Eden had convened for February 11, Craigie said it would be most unwise to take any step to encourage Chiang Kai-Shek to prolong resistance and "we should watch carefully for any sign that Nationalist Government might be prepared to make peace on terms which leave China temporarily weakened, it is true, but capable of ultimate resuscitation." However, Far East experts in the Foreign Office were convinced, more than ever, that a clash between British and Japanese interests was inevitable, that rapprochement was impossible, that Britain's Far East policy should therefore be support for China and resistance to Japan and, by implication, preparation for war in that theatre,⁷⁴ so it is doubtful whether it had any impact at that cabinet meeting.

It appears to have had little more influence at Eden's meeting to consider Far East options next day because, apart from a decision (in sharp contrast to that of the US) that neither side would be supplied with arms, decisions were made to continue support for China. It was decided that Britain should finance a road to link China and Burma, and that the Hong Kong Shanghai Banking Corporation should be pressed to provide extensive loans on a commercial basis which the Treasury would not agree to provide. Craigie advised strongly against it, but discussions continued.⁷⁵

AN ULTIMATUM TO AUSTRIA

All attention was certainly focussed on Europe again next day, February 12, when Hitler summoned Austria's Chancellor, Dr Schuschnigg, to the Berghof for a conference, blasted him for not cooperating in the previous agreement and for fortifying the border against Germany, and issued an ultimatum which required, among other things, the appointment of Nazis to the key cabinet posts of defence and the interior within three days.⁷⁶ The British cabinet learned immediately of the ultimatum which Hitler had 'bullied' Austria's Chancellor Schuschnigg into signing in Berlin and it added to the confusion. On February 14, recognizing what Craigie had said and doubting the wisdom of basing Britain's Far East policy on support for China, Chamberlain told his colleagues that "he would not like it thought for a moment that all chances of appeasement with Japan had slipped away."⁷⁷ And, on the assumption that Hitler's ultimatum was basically reaffirmation of the 1936 agreement, Cadogan noted that "(We) should not say to Hitler 'If we give you colonies, you must do something about Austria and Czechoslovakia.' He will say 'I have done it about Austria.'" His diary notes confirm that cabinet did not have any plan to restrain Hitler, nor the means to do so, that his Assistant Under-Secretary Sargent was 'violently opposed to dropping Austria', and that Henderson could be left to handle discussions with Hitler.

Hitler's threatened invasion was averted when Austria's President Miklas promptly agreed, under protest, to the Nazi cabinet appointments. Cadogan noted on February 15: "What is the good of brandishing Austria under Hitler's nose when we can't do anything about it? ... As I say, I shouldn't mind if Austria were gleichgeschaltet." [In the absence of other information about the course of discussions on African colonies, except a note for March 3, it appears that Henderson had been authorized to canvas 'a new colonial regime' with Hitler as an alternative to the Anschluss.] That night full details of the ultimatum and the circumstances in which it had been signed were cabled to London by the British legation in Vienna⁷⁸ and next day, February 16, Cadogan noted that the French wanted to make a joint protest in Berlin, but that would be 'folly' and 'we are riding them off.' He was well aware that cabinet then had before it a memorandum from Hore-Belisha on the role of the army related to the strategic proposals already discussed. The army's primary function at home was agreed to be anti-aircraft defence, but it was well short of the anticipated requirements for anti-aircraft guns, searchlights and troops. Hore-Belisha advised that at least two additional Territorial divisions should be converted if this role requirement was to be met, but the costs made it impossible. Lack of preparedness and equipment meant that only two regular divisions and a mobile division could be sent overseas after about three weeks preparation, and these could be reinforced by a maximum of two further divisions after about forty days. But in addition, these forces were equipped only for an Eastern theatre and their reserves would not be on the scale required for Continental warfare.⁷⁹

In the light of that, cabinet authorized Eden to tell the French that the most Britain could send to the Continent 'in certain circumstances' was two regular divisions and one mobile division, (compared with five divisions which Italy already had across the border in Spain), and that France should be left with no illusions about the likelihood or extent of British support on land. The benefits to Austria of Baron Louis' Vitkowitz transfer scheme were plainly wishful thinking. The financial market managers were plainly aware of it even if the general public was not, and next day, February 17, when the Nazi appointments became known, there was such a massive outflow of currency that the Austrian schilling collapsed on Europe's capital markets. The collapse was so dramatic that the Austrian currency was no longer quoted on Swiss and London exchanges. When it met that day to formally determine Britain's revised military strategy the Committee of Imperial Defence was probably not surprised by Admiral Chatfield's admission that it was largely "a question of balancing risks" between the three global theatres and that the Chiefs of Staff had concluded after their Mediterranean Appreciation review that the unstable situation in the Middle East demanded military measures. He said that building the land and air defences in Egypt up to self-sufficiency for a sixty-day period would involve "some denuding of home defences" but the services were now willing to take that risk.⁸⁰

The Middle East was now recognized to be the critical factor in Britain's ability to hold its empire together. So critical that home and continental defences had to be cut to the point at which Britain was quite unable to deter Hitler from any adventures he cared to undertake. While Eden wanted to take a somewhat firmer line with Hitler, short of committing troops which he knew was impossible, Chamberlain was determined to press on with appeasement. Coming together with his manipulation of the press through Ball and their disagreements over Far East policy, this resulted in the resignations of Eden, his Under Secretary (Lord Cranbourne) and his

Parliamentary Secretary, on February 20, and added to Britain's embarrassment in its already weak position.⁸¹

In his speech to the Commons next day to explain his resignation Eden referred to the fundamental issue of European stability and said he did not believe that progress could be made in European appeasement if Britain allowed the impression to gain currency abroad that it yielded to constant pressure. Progress depends above all on the temper of the nation which must find expression in a firm spirit which, he said, he was confident Britain had, and not to give voice to it is "fair neither to this country nor to the world."⁸² During the debate which followed Churchill asked the Commons: "What price shall we all have to pay for this? No one can compute it. Small countries in Europe will take their cue to move to the side of power and resolution. ... I predict that the day will come when, at some point or other, you will have to make a stand, and I pray God, when that day comes, that we may not find, through an unwise policy, that we have to make that stand alone." The Evening Standard, one of Lord Beaverbrook's papers, opposed Churchill's call for collective action and promptly cancelled his contract for fortnightly articles.

Try as it would to isolate, in the public mind, the issue of Palestine from Hitler and the crisis in Europe, the government could not isolate them in fact. Thus, in the context of the crisis in cabinet over the Foreign Secretary's resignation and discussions concerning 'a new regime for Africa' which was being proposed to Hitler, the government quietly announced the appointment of another Commission to reconsider the partition plan for Palestine. For two months the government had seemed paralyzed, but those critical cabinet discussions about a new colonial regime in Africa as an alternative to Hitler's plan for Austria forced it to take action. The four-person commission, led by Sir John Woodhead, prepared to visit Palestine immediately, but conditions were so disrupted that they had to defer it in the hope of some improvement.

In Austria, Schuschnigg faced intense criticism from both Catholics and Jews for having bowed to Hitler's ultimatum without calling for allied support or putting up a fight. Jews began to emigrate in droves. Hitler was infuriated that Austria's Jews were escaping his net and undermining his strategy and on February 20, the day of Eden's resignation, in a speech broadcast throughout Germany and Austria, he launched a vitriolic and inspiring attack on Austria in general and its Jews in particular. He said his co-racial "German minority" in Austria was "subjected to continuous suffering because of their sympathy and unity with the whole German race and its ideology".⁸³ This was intended to provide the veneer of legality which he needed to avoid British intervention when he invaded his homeland. He had learned his propaganda lessons from Britain and its Great War allies very well indeed.

Lord Halifax, who was working hand in hand with Chamberlain on appeasement and whose discussions with Hitler exactly three months earlier had been so pivotal in strengthening the dictator's hand, was appointed Foreign Secretary in succession to Eden on February 21. He immediately arranged uninhibited access to himself for Dawson, and thereafter the Times editor and the British Foreign Secretary met virtually daily.⁸⁴ However the Daily Telegraph, owned by Lord Camrose and opposed to the policy of appeasement, had agreed to provide an alternative press platform for Churchill after he was shut out by Beaverbrook,⁸⁵ and on February 24 the Manchester Guardian noted in a leader that government influence on the press, which presented a curiously distorted picture and preserved a unity of silence, could hardly be bettered in a totalitarian state. Ambassador Henderson immediately called for a propaganda truce in the British press to enable negotiations to continue towards a satisfactory conclusion following the Halifax visit, and he complained of vilification of Germany led by the Manchester Guardian and the News Chronicle which Germany (Goebbels?) complained were "Jewish newspapers with journalists connected in one way or another with Soviet Bolshevism."⁸⁶ A few days later, on February 28, Halifax summoned Leeper to discuss steps to 'moderate' the BBC and the press, then, on Leeper's advice, he saw John Reith at the BBC personally. The BBC cancelled scheduled programmes on Hitler's colonial claims and Halifax authorized Henderson to tell Hitler that the BBC had been muzzled.⁸⁷ It was better than a birthday present. Chamberlain, Halifax and Henderson had given Hitler the all clear or the signal for 'full steam ahead.'

On March 2 Chamberlain made what Shirer described as 'an astounding speech' to the Commons in which he implied that the Austro-German agreement of February 12 had been freely made between statesmen of two countries, one renouncing its independence in favour of the other in the interests of good relations between them.⁸⁸ On March 3, Henderson reported that 'Hitler paid scant attention to the proposal about a new colonial regime in Africa, or to the mild warnings about Central Europe.'⁸⁹ Then on March 8, Cadogan talked to representatives of the British press about freedom of the press, responsibility, ungarded criticism of the heads of state of other countries, and 'needless provocation'. The Commonwealth Prime Ministers were advised of these 'confidential conversations' and of Britain's desire to improve the atmosphere and to facilitate conversations with the German government. Pressure was applied to the dominions to do the same. Hitler was also desirous of the same. Was that an act of appeasement or an act of wonderful supportive cooperation?

THE ANSCHLUSS

Schuschnigg had taken the steps Hitler had demanded but now, with the Nazis boasting openly that they would be in power within a few weeks, he decided that he could play the legality game, too. On Wednesday, March 9, in a bid to forestall Hitler he announced that a plebiscite would be held on Sunday, March 13. Both he and Hitler expected that it would demonstrate to the world that most Austrians wanted to remain independent. Clearly Hitler could not allow it to go ahead. He was more confident than ever that Britain would not intervene because its cabinet was in the throes of trauma induced by the resignation of Foreign Secretary Anthony Eden on the same evening, February 20, that he had broadcast his scathing attack on Austria.^{90 91 92} But his confidence was reinforced by the fact that Seyss-Inquart, a right wing lawyer who appeared to have no political affiliations at that stage, had briefed him, prior to Schuschnigg's visit, on proposals which he, as a confidant of the Austrian Chancellor had helped devise to forestall a German annexation in the absence of British and French intervention. Hitler was therefore taking only a small gamble by demanding more than he knew Schuschnigg had already decided to yield.⁹³ Next morning, Thursday, March 10, to the amazement of his generals, he ordered that the army be ready to invade Austria on Saturday, March 12, and sent an emissary to advise Schuschnigg of his action. On Friday, 11, he demanded that the plebiscite be cancelled, that Schuschnigg resign immediately and that Dr Seyss-Inquart be appointed to succeed him. The news was cabled to Downing Street by the British legation in Vienna while Foreign Minister Ribbentrop was actually lunching with Chamberlain and Halifax. Hitler was quite right. Britain protested, but when Schuschnigg needed help from Italy, Britain and France none of them responded. Schuschnigg resigned immediately to enable the appointment of Seyss-Inquart who told Hitler that there was no longer any need to intervene, but the Fuhrer was taking no chances. German tanks rolled across the border at daybreak on Saturday March 12, 1938, with Hitler calling for the total incorporation of Austria in Germany – the Anschluss. On that day, even before Hitler and Himmler had arrived in Vienna, the Times reported that: “After a day of indescribable nervous tension, the Austria of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg – the Catholic-Fascist Austria that by force suppressed Parliament and the powerful working class movement four years ago, collapsed tonight under the threat of force.”

Schuschnigg was placed under house arrest as soon as German troops reached Vienna. Baron Louis de Rothschild's passport was confiscated next morning, March 13. But Schuschnigg, a devout Catholic, was faring even worse than the Jews against whom the main thrust of Hitler's wrath was being directed. His offence was that he had collaborated with the Rothschilds to transfer ownership of Vitkowitz to British ownership. After quite some time kept virtually sleepless under house arrest Dr Schuschnigg was imprisoned in a tiny room at the Hotel Metropole which had been commandeered as the SS headquarters. He was forced to carry out appropriate tasks dreamed up by the Gestapo, and he was required to use a single towel to clean the quarters, washbasins, slop buckets and latrines of the SS troops guarding him, as well as for personal use. But after his first couple of weeks of forced labour there was no such treatment for his friend, Austria's most famous Jew and Hitler's prize prisoner, Baron Louis de Rothschild.

Chamberlain addressed the Commons on March 14 and his description of Hitler's fait accompli was soon music in the dictator's ears. “The hard fact is that nothing could have arrested what actually has happened [in Austria] unless this country and other countries had been prepared to use force,” Chamberlain said. When read together with his rejection of Russia's proposal for a conference within the League of Nations to consider means of ensuring that there could be no more German aggression, the British Prime Minister's statement amounted to an invitation for Hitler to press on – as long as he pressed on towards the east.⁹⁴ Chamberlain knew the reality of Britain's weak position with even greater certainty as a result of Hitler's occupation of Austria. In fact by the time the Nazis had comfortably settled Baron Louis de Rothschild into a suite adjoining that of deposed Austrian Chancellor Schuschnigg in Vienna's Hotel Metropole for a very long stay, Japan was pursuing Chiang Kai-shek in a massive sweep across north and central China, boosted further by Mussolini's Italy having joined the Comintern Pact. Chamberlain could not afford to have people connecting each of Britain's troubles – Europe, the Middle East and China – or expressing critical views of Britain's manoeuvring.

Churchill responded to Chamberlain's address the same day, giving a much more frank and chilling assessment than that of the prime minister. He told the house that Vienna was the centre of communications, river and rail links for the countries of southeastern Europe, and especially for Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Yugoslavia, (the Little Entente), which provided the main military deterrent to Hitler's expansion. Rumania had the oil, Yugoslavia the minerals and raw materials, and Czechoslovakia had the manufacturing capacity to supply the munitions for the large armies of the other two. By gaining control of Vienna, Hitler had driven a wedge into the Little Entente and he could henceforward strangle trade to and from Czechoslovakia at will because he already had control of its trade route to the rest of the world, through Hamburg.⁹⁵ Unfortunately, like everyone else, Churchill talked only of the economic rights and life of Czechoslovakia and its treaty partners with no mention of Britain's interests. But the politicians, financiers and industrialists knew what he was talking about even if the public did not. If Hitler controlled the Rothschild iron and steel mills of Vitkowitz, Britain would lose access to them as well as to Rumania and its oil, and Yugoslavia and the Balkan states would be greatly weakened. If he controlled Pilsen and the Skoda munitions works as well, the advantage lurched even more strongly in his favour and the threat to the Jewish community lurched with it.

Chamberlain took immediate and urgent steps to tighten his hold on the British press and the Foreign Office News Department. But some people had privileges. Leo Kennedy, chief foreign affairs leader writer for the Times, was in Prague that day, March 15, and he was shown a despatch by Basil Newton of the British Embassy advising the government against making any promise of support for Czechoslovakia because it had become unworkable and its strategic position was hopeless. The Austrian and German armies were now integrated as one under German command, and they were facing the lightly defended flank behind its heavy defences. The country could now only make the best terms with Hitler that it could. Kennedy, a mere staff member of the Times with no diplomatic status, saw President Benes and told him that a British guarantee, which he wanted, was unlikely unless he had first made a resolute attempt to reach an agreement with Germany. Naturally Kennedy reported that the Austrian Anschluss had made the plight of Czechoslovakia hopeless.

The London Times which had, together with other British papers, condemned Hitler's march into Austria, soon modified its approach and adopted the Chamberlain line. Its leader noted that "Herr Hitler has enjoyed two days of triumphal progress from the Austrian frontier" and much "public jubilation". It did query why, if such jubilation was spontaneous, it was necessary to surround the welcome with all the "paraphernalia of tanks ... and marching infantry," but apart from that it appeared to ignore the reports and assessments of its own journalists and correspondents in Europe and continued placating Hitler, fostering the submissive 'appeasement line' which Chamberlain and Halifax had been pursuing.

On March 16, Cadogan advised the government against giving any guarantee to Czechoslovakia. He noted in his diary: 'We must not precipitate a conflict now – we shall be smashed.' ... (then) Go hard with Italy. Rearm, above all in the air. But can the government weather the next few months on a policy of apparent inactivity? There are all sorts of intrigues afoot.' Of course those involved were not keen to disclose their interests or to debate the motives, or intrigues, behind any moves they might take either in collaboration with Hitler's Germany or against it. They were faced with the long-established dilemma which became even greater with the Capitalism-Communism confrontation after the Second World War. Put simply: if the public won't support an action for its real purpose, it is necessary to find a justification which they can be persuaded to support. So the Marquis of Londonderry told the House of Lords that day (while the government was considering the issue of intervention in Czechoslovakia) that there would be no lack of support for the government in peace initiatives "but what the country would require was a moral basis." He added that Britain had to take an interest in what was happening in Central Europe and even further afield. "On the basis of an Anglo-German friendship and understanding, brought about by those conversations which were at present practically in being, we might be able to develop something on which we could base that period in the future of peace, for which we all so longed," he said.⁹⁶

Next day, March 17, Britain received a proposal from Russia for a multi-power conference to explore ways of preventing further German aggression. Then on March 18, the Times reported, very briefly, that "the palace of Baron Louis de Rothschild (who is himself under arrest) on the Prinz Eugenstrasse, (Vienna), was ransacked for papers last night (March 17) by SS men. A strong SS guard is now stationed outside".⁹⁷ But there were a number of facts which would have put the matter in an understandable context and to which the report made no reference. These included the fact that the Anschluss had been ordered on March 11; that the Chancellor, who had been forced out of office by Hitler was placed under house arrest the next day; that Baron Louis had been held temporarily and his passport had been confiscated but he was allowed to go home; that he then eluded arrest that evening only to be arrested on March 13, the day that Himmler and Von Ribbentrop arrived in Vienna; ⁹⁸ and that Hitler arrived in Vienna by road on the following day, Monday, March 14, 1938, after a triumphant and nostalgic stopover at his birthplace.

A COMMONWEALTH BREAK-UP?

On March 20, while the foreign affairs debate continued, Secretary for the Dominions Malcolm MacDonald told the Foreign Policy committee that if Britain found itself engaged in a European War to prevent Germans living in the Sudeten districts of Czechoslovakia from being re-united with Germany "on this issue the British Commonwealth might well break in pieces."⁹⁹ [A year later, in the context of debate on military conscription immediately after Hitler had occupied Ostrava and seized Vitkowitz, Sir Oswald Mosley, leader of the British Union of Fascists, tried to bring the background to that particular issue into the open. Addressing a 1939 May Day march he said that all the democratic parties were then in the service of international finance. Compulsory military training was not necessary because no country was threatening Britain and it therefore had nothing to fear. "It was being imposed because those who had capital – about 300 million pounds Sterling – invested in Eastern European countries feared for its safety", he said. The Fascists then carried a resolution declaring "We will fight for Britain but for no other country".¹⁰⁰ Then next day, March 21, cabinet considered a strategic assessment from the Chiefs of Staff who noted that Britain could not provide military assistance for Czechoslovakia even if it wanted to. The COS report detailed the forces available and said that neither Britain nor France could render any direct assistance to Czechoslovakia on land and the only method of rendering even indirect assistance would be by staging offensive operations directly against Germany. They thought the French were unlikely to mount an effective attack on Germany, and if Italy and Japan joined in a general war the British empire would face 'the gravest danger'. They were indeed very blunt. In the event of a general war with Germany, Italy and Japan all involved, the British Empire would be threatened simultaneously in Western Europe, the Mediterranean and the Far East by 'an immense aggregate of armed strength' and would be in grave danger. Referring to the disposition of an under-strength navy the chiefs advised that the fleet would be unable to defend 'home waters' and both the Far East and the Mediterranean concurrently. Britain could not maintain an adequate fleet in the Mediterranean, and the Italians would enjoy undisputed control of the Eastern Mediterranean so that 'our position in Egypt, Palestine and the Middle East would become critical,' with control of the Eastern Mediterranean region falling to Italy.¹⁰¹ The effect of the COS report on cabinet was dramatic. Then, after cabinet had agreed that Czechoslovakia 'is not worth the bones of a single British Grenadier,' Chamberlain formally rejected the Russian proposal for a multi-power conference in the Commons on March 24.¹⁰²

But who was going to expose such double standards, conflicts of interest and the misinterpretation of history? Not the press. Nor the majority of Members of Parliament. Following the Anschluss, support in cabinet for Chamberlain's policy of appeasement strengthened, and they received strong encouragement from the Catholic bishops in Austria. On March 27 a declaration by the bishops was read in all churches in Austria. It "joyfully acknowledged that the National Socialist movement had done and is still doing eminent work in ... national and economic construction as well as in ... social policy, for the Reich and the German nation ..." The bishops, it said, were also convinced that the movement "has averted the danger of an all-destroying atheistic Bolshevism." As if that was not enough to curry favour with Hitler they said: "For the future, the bishops confer their heartiest blessing on this activity, and they will instruct the faithful to this effect. On the day of the plebiscite, it goes without saying that for us it is a national duty, as Germans, to vote for the German Reich, and we also expect all believing Christians to demonstrate that they know what they owe to their nation."¹⁰³

The pace of world events was hectic and the pattern of events in the Middle East was confusing to all except the best informed authorities. Unfortunately that pattern of events was deliberately concealed from the world-at-large by those authorities just at the time when the development of the telegraph, radio and mass-produced newspapers had made it possible for the public to be well informed. The self-interest of those in positions of authority in the Christian West took precedence over world peace. The British general public, being deliberately kept ill-informed, simply 'turned off' and regarded the conflict in the Middle East as a local squabble between people they neither understood nor had any real regard for. They had no means of knowing that it was one of the most critical factors in the security of their empire.

For a couple of critical weeks while Hitler's bandwagon had been gathering such support, both in Britain and Europe, and with widespread public apathy in Britain as well, it looked as if the strength of opposition to appeasement in the British parliament might fall correspondingly, but for a quite different reason. Winston Churchill, whose life style and approach to staffing his office and household meant that he stumbled from one financial crisis to another, had been hit by a crisis of major proportions. There had been a further slump in some sections of the New York stock market coinciding with – and precipitated by – Hitler's march into Austria, and the value of Churchill's investments in that market had been wiped out. His account with his London stockbrokers was then eighteen thousand pounds in debit and they were demanding payment. Their demand was aggravated by the fact that Lord Beaverbrook, who believed the Jewish community in England was financing the 'Bring back Winston' campaign, had severed Churchill's newspaper writing contract at the same time. Virtually insolvent, Churchill advised his associates that he would have to sell Chartwell, leave politics and concentrate on writing full time to maintain a living. He immediately placed an advertisement with The Times for publication on April 2, only 21 days after Hitler's march, offering Chartwell for sale at twenty thousand pounds. But a few days before it was due to appear, Sir Henry Strakosch, a Jew born in Moravia, Czechoslovakia, a millionaire with gold mining interests and chairman of the Union Corporation Ltd, agreed to pay Churchill's debts. Chartwell was withdrawn from the market and Churchill's vigorous leadership of the anti-appeasement campaign from a seat in parliament continued.¹⁰⁴

Just at that time, Hitler was eager to take full advantage of the encouragement he received from the Catholic bishops and Chamberlain's post-Anschluss 'invitation' to press on while he was in full flight with his four year plan which included the concurrent expulsion of Jews from territories already under his control and the expansion of those territories. Accordingly, on March 28–29, he met the Sudeten leader, Henlein, in Berlin. His aim: to prepare a strategy to provoke violence in the Sudetenland which would provide a pretext for Germany to intervene in Czechoslovakia's affairs. The Jewish question was usually sufficient provocation and although Chamberlain's government was doing all it could to keep it out of the public eye, authorities in the Vatican did not see it as a matter of concern. Quite the reverse. In an editorial on April 2, hot on the heels of the Austrian bishops' declaration, Civiltà Cattolica maintained that the idea of a Jewish State in Palestine was utterly erroneous. The sole dominion of Jews in the region and even their peaceful coexistence with Arabs had been shown to be completely impossible, the Vatican paper said, and the only correct thing for the Jews to do was to drop all their claims to Palestine and, if possible, to leave the country again.¹⁰⁵

A few days later, after discussions between the Reich Minister for Church Affairs and the Austrian Minister for the Interior, and with Eichmann already in Vienna to organize the emigration of the country's 200,000 Jews, the legal status of Jewish communities was abrogated and 'the Aryanization' of Jewish properties began. [Within six months of the Anschluss about 25 percent of Jews resident in Austria, (50,000), had been forced out and more than 80 percent of Jewish owned businesses had been Aryanized or simply closed.¹⁰⁶] Thus, regardless of the steps the British government took in an effort to isolate the situation in Europe from that in the Middle East, it could not prevent 'fallout' from the crisis in Palestine affecting other areas. Admiral Wilhelm Canaris, chief of German Counter Intelligence, met the Mufti secretly in Beirut¹⁰⁷ and limited financial and military help was agreed to.

Sympathy for the Palestinian Arabs within the wider Islamic world was further undermining Britain's grip on affairs in India. Following the 1937 elections Nehru, leading the Hindus, and Jinnah, leading the Muslims, worked to maintain cooperation and cohesion for a time but just when the situation in Europe had reached crisis with Hitler's annexation of Austria, that cooperation was wrecked by a pro-Nazi Congressman, Bose, and pressure for the partition of India grew to an alarming level. With the Hindu community declaring its neutrality towards the affairs in Europe, Muslim opposition to British policy in Palestine was further diminishing its capacity to raise troops to reinforce its meagre Imperial forces.

CABINET WARNED ON MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Advice to cabinet was that British and Commonwealth interests in the Middle East and Far East were 'scarcely inferior to those in Europe' and that only in the most desperate circumstances could relief be sought by 'conscious abandonment' of the region and there would then be 'dire consequences.'¹⁰⁸ Furthermore, anti-colonial feeling was so acute in so many countries that to admit or to draw attention to Britain's parlous position prior to the outbreak of hostilities might be sufficient to cause many countries to either withhold support for Britain or to join the Axis camp in order to bring down the structures of colonialism. The immediate problem was that if it were to avoid a total loss of Arab support Britain had no option other than to restrict the Zionist aspirations which it had done so much to generate barely twenty years earlier in order to get control of the oil fields and shipping routes which were now more vital than ever. However the consequences of any Anti-Zionist action were daunting and, for the Christian Capitalists of Europe, potentially catastrophic. To begin with, it would legitimize Hitler's Anti-Jewish measures and aggravate the effects of anti-Semitism which the Vatican's Jesuit press had been promoting so eagerly. From a humanitarian viewpoint that was simply not acceptable. From an economic viewpoint it would be disastrous for Britain because of the sudden outflow of Jewish-controlled capital which had to be expected. It was Britain's turn to fear a fallout with the House of Rothschild.

Then there was the fundamental political factor. If the threat to Germany's Jews became any greater¹⁰⁹ and if Britain closed the gateway to Palestine at the same time, the Zionist Organization might possibly reverse its stand on BiraBidzhan. That would then legitimize Soviet Russia's Bolshevik regime and world Communism so that both Capitalism and Christianity would face a bigger internal threat than ever before. Britain again ran short of options. It had to compensate for the restriction of Zionist aspirations in Palestine with suitable domestic policies and this meant, essentially, a bigger role for Britain's Jewish community in financial and political affairs and provision of staging posts for Jewish refugees wanting to leave Germany. Britain also had to continue its policy of appeasement towards Hitler, which essentially meant "accommodating" his territorial demands towards the east and saying naught in criticism of his domestic policies – including his Anti-Semitism – while it tried to unravel the Middle Eastern web. If it actively opposed Hitler's policy on the Jewish question it had to be prepared to accept an unrestricted flow of migrants, not just refugees in transit, either into Britain or into Palestine. It couldn't accept mass migration for domestic reasons and the Zionist Organization didn't want it either. It wanted Palestine. The circle got tighter and tighter.

The Vatican was well aware that the Woodhead Commission had not yet left for Palestine and that the Nazi regime had set up an Office of Jewish Emigration in Austria some two weeks earlier, immediately after the occupation. Train loads of Jews desperate to leave the country had been turned back at the border. They were stripped of their possessions, forced to vacate their homes, to live in cramped, squalid conditions in communes in the former homes of wealthy Jews, and they were personally degraded in an orgy of sadism which made events in Germany up to that time seem like a trial run in anti-Semitism. The Civiltà Cattolica editorial was therefore a clear message to the British government that it should drop the Woodhead Commission. But in the circumstances, read widely in church circles in Catholic Austria and Czechoslovakia, it also served to harden the attitudes of those communities against any plan to assist Jews to leave their countries and reinforced support for the measures which the Nazi regime was enforcing.

The pace of defensive politicking was quickening everywhere. Hitler held a plebiscite in Austria on April 10, like the one he wouldn't let Schuschnigg conduct a month earlier. The vote in favour of the incorporation of Austria in Germany was 99.75 per cent in Austria and 99.08 percent in greater Germany.¹¹⁰ Presumably that satisfied the show of legality which Lord Halifax had discussed with him. It also showed very clearly that Austria's Catholic population had taken the advice of their bishops very much to heart. In a sense that was surprising, but it illustrated the nature of the parody of Mein Kampf and the extent of the contradictions which the church was forced to live out as it struggled to use its concordat with Hitler to prop up its own authority and its self-understanding, while he exploited the authority with which the concordat blessed him to undermine and to rein-in Catholic Action and Catholic education. Thus, on April 13, referring to "the grave persecution that is raging, as everyone knows, against the Catholic Church in Germany," the secretary of the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities, of which Pius XI was prefect, addressed a letter to the rectors of all Catholic universities throughout the world. He said "the Holy Father's principal source of distress is the fact that in order to carry out such a great injustice, the most impudent calumnies have been invoked, and the most pernicious doctrines have been spread all about, falsely presented as scientific, with the goal of perverting minds and drawing them away from true religion.” [Emphasis added.] He then urged “other universities and Catholic faculties to make use of biology, history, philosophy, apologetics, legal and moral studies as weapons for refuting firmly and competently” a series of “untenable assertions.” ¹¹¹

The “untenable assertions” included four of a generally racist thrust. These were: that “the humblest humans” were closer to animal species than to “the most elevated” humans; that it was necessary, proper and permissible “to preserve and cultivate the vigour of the blood and the purity of the race” by all means; that blood was the principle source and seat of the character and intellectual and moral character of a race; and that the essential goal of education was to develop the characteristics and love of race. These were among the propositions which had been widely promoted and accepted for two or three generations on both sides of the Atlantic, and wherever else European-Christian colonies had been planted. These were followed by four, numbered 5–8, which appear to have been aimed quite specifically at three of the great modern-age challenges to the church’s doctrine, self-understanding and conduct – two at National Socialism, then one each at evolutionary theory and Marxism, in that order. These were: “5. Religion is subject to the law of race and must be adapted to it. 6. The primary source and supreme rule of all legal order is racial instinct. 7. There exists only the Cosmos, or the Universe, which is a living being; all things, including man, are only diverse forms of the universal living being, growing through the course of the ages. 8. Each man exists only through the State and for the State (and) everything he possesses by right proceeds solely from a concession by the State.”¹¹² Thus, although that letter was reported as a “Syllabus against racism”, ¹¹³ the circumstances of the time show it to be merely another defensive action by the Vatican in the face of the steady stream of challenges to (and attacks against) “true (Catholic) religion.” It was certainly not a specific or intentional statement against anti-Semitism and no government would have found any reason to hesitate in placing further restraints on the Jewish community.

THE ANGLO-ITALIAN AGREEMENT

The Anglo-Italian agreement on Abyssinia and Spain was reached on April 16, and on April 21, being eager to take full advantage of such favourable circumstances, Hitler instructed General Keitel, the head of the German Higher Command, to draw up a plan for a blitzkrieg attack on Czechoslovakia with a view to carrying it out promptly. It was to be such as to enable a decisive victory within four days of a surprise attack on Czechoslovakia being ordered. He received the final draft on May 20.¹¹⁴ While Stalin was not aware of that instruction he was another who had taken good note of Chamberlain’s address and he did not like it. He knew that if Czechoslovakia also fell there would be virtually no buffer between Russia and German forces.

Writing years later in The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, after describing looting, forced labour and the jailing of tens of thousands of Jews, historian William L. Shirer, wrote simply that “Baron Louis de Rothschild himself was later able to buy his way out of Vienna by turning over his steel mills to the Hermann Göring Works. Then, as if to suggest that there was nothing special about the baron's case, he added that perhaps half of the city's 180,000 Jews managed to purchase their freedom to emigrate by handing over what they owned to the Nazis by the time the war started.¹¹⁵ However the sequence of events shows that the situation was not that simple. The transfer of Vitkowitz to British ownership had further enmeshed the affairs of the House of Rothschild, Britain, its troubles in Palestine, Czechoslovakia and Germany before Hitler's parody ultimately engulfed the whole world.

Vitkowitz was, as strategists in each camp knew very well, a key piece in Hitler's four year plan. If he could gain control of it without military action he would be in a remarkably strong position. But there were no government statements on the matter from either camp and no informed newspaper comments which would produce an informed public until after the fall of Czechoslovakia. The nearest thing to public acknowledgment of its importance was Churchill's statement to the Commons on March 14, the day Hitler arrived in Vienna.

With exaggerated apology, Baron Louis declined a kind offer from Göring of his freedom in return for the transfer of Vitkowitz to the Third Reich plus, it seems, a personal gift of 40,000 pounds Sterling.¹¹⁶ Vitkowitz was no longer his to give away, he said. Baron Louis' counter offer was that he would assign all of his Austrian assets to the Third Reich in return for his freedom, but both he and the Nazis knew that was a bit of a joke. They already had control of his Austrian assets and no one was likely to come running to his aid. Mussolini, irritated by the ineffective Anglo-French inspired sanctions imposed against Italy because of his Abyssinian adventure, had barely hesitated to acknowledge Hitler's right to Austria, a treaty ally of Italy, and the London Times had given a clear indication of Britain's position, as already noted. However the Nazis also knew that in the light of the baron's actions they could only get control of Vitkowitz by either occupying Czechoslovakia (or at least threatening to) or by negotiating with Britain and the House of Rothschild.

Hitler tried the carrot-and-stick approach to Czechoslovakia – mainly the big stick – with President Benes coming under intense diplomatic and propaganda pressure even while Hitler was still in Vienna. They both knew that Britain would have to declare its hand very quickly. Even if it did acquiesce in Hitler's territorial expansion into southeastern Europe it had many important financial and commercial interests in central Europe and these could not be treated separately from the Jewish question or, therefore, the Palestine question.

However, only two days after calling for a blitzkrieg plan, Hitler was given reason to think very carefully when, on April 23, Russia again declared its attitude towards Hitler's expansion with a guarded undertaking of support for Czechoslovakia. That warning was followed by the announcement of an agreement for Britain to vacate its Irish bases, just four months after the proclamation of the republic and then, very promptly, by the banning of the IRA. At that point the British and French governments both came under increased pressure to reconsider their positions on Czechoslovakia. Göring was taking action to force Jews within Germany and Austria to surrender all of their assets, whether within those countries or elsewhere – especially in Czechoslovakia. His mechanism was a Decree for the Registration of Jewish Property which was issued on April 26, 1938.

On April 29–30 Anglo-French talks were held in London and the French ministers were left with no illusions about the lack of British armed power to back up either French or British interests. According to Lord Avon (Anthony Eden) the prime minister refused to commit Britain to the despatch of an army to the continent and admitted that the tiny force which might be sent would not be fully mechanized. Lord Halifax told the French that in Britain's military situation "it would be impossible to preserve the Czech state if Germany decided "to take hostile steps" Mr. Chamberlain then said, according to the official record of the meeting, that he doubted very much whether Herr Hitler really desired to destroy the Czech state, or, rather, a Czech state. He said he also doubted whether at the present moment he wished to bring about the 'Anschluss' of the Sudeten districts with Germany. He thought that the reason Herr Henlein had not demanded the Anschluss, "which was desired by his own followers", was that he had received advice from Berlin not to do so.¹¹⁷

France's Premier M. Daladier replied that if Germany was allowed to achieve a new (territorial) success every few months, increasing both its material and political strength with each advance, countries which were then hesitating would feel compelled to submit to the hegemony of Germany and it would then turn west "as we had been warned in Mein Kampf". He didn't need to say that in such an event it would not be an alliance of Britain, France and Germany forcing Belgium or Portugal to hand over their colonies in Africa: it would be an alliance of Germany and other countries forcing the dismantling of the British and French empires. However, following those talks both governments were at pains to reassure Hitler, separately, that they were putting pressure on the Czechs to reach agreement with Henlein.¹¹⁸

WOODHEAD IN PALESTINE

Coinciding with those talks, Sir John Woodhead and his fellow commissioners had finally arrived in Palestine. They had the benefit, no doubt, of the Chiefs of Staff briefing which had been prepared for cabinet on March 21, which showed that in the event of a general war with Germany, Italy and Japan all involved, the British Empire would be threatened simultaneously in Western Europe, the Mediterranean and the Far East by 'an immense aggregate of armed strength' and it would be in grave danger. They would have also known of the measures which Göring was taking to encourage Austrian and Czechoslovak Jews to either quit their homeland or their assets, or both. They were therefore painfully aware of how critical their task was in Britain's bid to retain control of the Middle East and to avoid any development which might precipitate Italian or German intervention. The Woodhead Commission actually faced an Arab boycott even more effective than that against the Peel Commission and during three and a half months in Palestine it was able to take evidence from few people except Britons and Jews. It therefore had little chance of meeting the government's instructions to provide recommendations for acceptable boundaries for a Jewish state and an Arab state, and it began its work in a context which was quite different to that at the time that it was appointed. Consideration of the offer of African colonies to distract Hitler from Austria was off the agenda. Austria was long gone! Czechoslovakia was about to go, too.

Hitler could be confident that neither Britain nor France would intervene, or even object, if he marched into Czechoslovakia, but he wanted to be sure of the support of his only professed ally, Italy, and he was a trifle concerned because of the recent Anglo-Italian accord which had eased tension between them. On May 2 he set out with a massive entourage of hundreds of officials, diplomats and service officers in a cavalcade of trains for an eight-day state visit to Italy.¹¹⁹ He took advantage of the quiet travel time to prepare his will! He had no need to spend it drafting an address in reply to a speech of welcome from his concordat partner, the pope. Vatican-Third Reich relations were so strained that Pius XI chose to spend a few days at his summer residence, Castelgandolfo, on the outskirts of Rome. But, either to keep up a facade of diplomacy or to emphasize the point, Osservatore Romano reported that this was not a matter of “petty diplomacy” but for the good of the Holy Father’s health “because the air at Castelgandolfo does him good, whereas the air here harms him.”¹²⁰

Next day, May 3, the new German ambassador in London, Herbert von Dirksen, was able to report to Berlin that Halifax had told him of the démarche which the British government was about to make in Prague “which would aim at inducing Benes to show the utmost measure of accommodation to the Sudetan Germans.”¹²¹ That démarche had not even been issued two days later when, on May 5, Tony (A.G.) Rothschild, a partner in N.M. Rothschild & Sons, called on Cadogan to discuss German offers to buy the Witkowice Works (Vitkowitz) in Czechoslovakia. Cadogan noted in his diary: “This significant. If they are prepared to pay $ or pounds for it, it don’t (sic) look as if they are going to march in and take it. Talked to Strang about it: must see Hankey (Secretary to both Cabinet and the Committee of Imperial Defence), as Admiralty have placed large orders.” His diary note for the following day, May 6, indicates that he discussed the matter with Hankey who, “was not very disturbed.”

Every government was being about as honest as every other government. In Moscow that day Stalin assured Benes in private that the Soviet Union was ready to assist him militarily “even if France does not do so and even if Poland and Romania refuse to permit Soviet troops to pass in transit to Czechoslovakia.” But in Prague the Soviet Charge d’affaires told the American ambassador a rather different story: the Soviet Union definitely would not supply Czechoslovakia with any military aid until France also did so because Poland and Romania would not allow passage for the Red Army.¹²² Next day, May 7, Britain and France jointly issued their démarche. Hitler, Ribbentrop and Göring should have been delighted! Until that day Mussolini had rebuffed Hitler’s attempts to discuss Czechoslovakia and it was only after that announcement that the atmosphere began to thaw. Hitler had demonstrated that he was well and truly on top of Britain and France in the initiative stakes. He was therefore able to deliver an extremely effective speech at a state banquet that evening and to confirm that Italy was welcome to retain control of the South Tyrol. The British-French timing could not have been better – from the Führer’s point of view. Subsequently Mussolini indicated that the

Czechoslovakian question was of no importance to him and he “would look the other way,” and Count Ciano accepted a draft treaty from Ribbentrop, having already noted that the Duce intended to make a pact with Hitler “because he has a thousand and one reasons for not trusting the Western Democracies.”¹²³

Two days after that banquet speech, on May 9, (the final day of Hitler’s state visit to Rome), when Tony Rothschild called again, Cadogan noted: “Gave him to see we didn’t like idea of German control of Witkowice (Vitkowitz). New Court (headquarters of Rothschild and Sons) not inclined to it either, but he will let me hear further what his cousins think.”¹²⁴

China was also interested in money matters at that time, but it wanted to borrow more from Britain, not pay to purchase an arms and munitions business. Under pressure from Eden’s committee the HSBC had agreed to a loan of two million pounds but it would go no further, and the government was asked to provide another fifteen million pounds which could be secured against exports of wolfram and antimony (crucial in munitions manufacture) in an agreement which would keep them out of Germany’s hands, plus other aid. Halifax supported the request, telling the Chancellor, Sir John Simon, on May 9, that as the government was embarking on expenditure of two milliards of pounds in preparation for war and “here, for an infinitesimal fraction of that sum, we may be able, at no risk to ourselves, to preserve our vital interests in the Far East.”¹²⁵ But treasury officials had been “deeply impressed” by Craigie’s warnings and had moved away from their early enthusiasm for loans, agreeing that “to induce Japanese anger could have very dangerous consequences, particularly in the light of tensions in Europe over the Sudeten issue.”¹²⁶ (Emphasis added.) When Craigie was advised of the discussions he responded vehemently, telling Halifax, next day, May 10, that the proposal was blatantly political, that it would compromise Britain’s neutrality in the Sino-Japanese war, and that there could be an “overwhelming outburst of fury against Great Britain” if the loan was granted. He advised that “whereas in a World War the attitude of China would not be a determining factor, the reverse is true of Japan. Any breach in our relationship with Japan which is of such a character as to bring her irrevocably under German domination is bound, sooner or later, to act upon our defensive position in Europe.”¹²⁷ Discussions still continued.

A WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

And while the leaders of the great powers politicked over the future of Czechoslovakia, Germany’s Lebensraum and China’s provinces, and while the British government desperately sought to isolate and camouflage the three conflicts which were about to congeal into one and tear its empire apart, the leaders of the Ecumenical Movement who had been appointed to establish a World Council of Churches met as an Advisory Committee at Utrecht, Holland, from May 9–12. Their main purpose was to get a constitution and structure in place so that staff could be appointed and the council could begin work, and they were eager to do so. However, although a basis for membership of the council had been agreed at the series of conferences in July and August of the previous year (see above, this chapter, pp. 3–4) that issue would not go away and a great deal of the committee's time was occupied in debating it all over again. Should the Trinitarian basis adopted from the Faith and Order Conference be retained, or should another basis be formulated?

The chairman, Anglican Archbishop William Temple of York, said that although support for the proposed basis had come from many sides, "some churches had issued warnings against its adoption, since they could not conscientiously accept it." He said that whatever basis the council adopted, "it could not act as an ecclesiastical court with power to decide whether a church could be regarded as coming within the terms of its invitation." Each church had to decide whether it was able to collaborate on the basis which it adopted, he said. The secretary of the Faith and Order Movement, Canon Hodgson, said it had no wish to impose its standard on the whole council, and it "would be satisfied if its own work could be conducted on the basis which it had adopted from the beginning." But such a compromise clearly implied that even if they shared one umbrella, two bodies would continue to operate side by side. Temple therefore proposed that the Trinitarian basis be adopted "but that it was necessary to keep the door open for cooperation in some form with bodies which could not accept it." Thus the Utrecht committee adopted as the basis of membership, subject to confirmation at the first Assembly of the WCC, that: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of Churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour."¹²⁸

A provisional committee for the World Council of Churches was formally established and it began work immediately, on May 13, 1938, but the basis still to be accepted by two of the three bodies: the continuation committee of Faith and Order which was due to meet in Switzerland from August 29 to September 1, and the International Missionary Council which was due to meet at Tambaram, India, in December. The provisional committee had to anticipate that in due course each of the merging bodies would agree to proceed on the draft basis but this meant that the door was effectively closed to any groups or churches which were not happy with it and any systematic review of Trinitarian theology under the Council's sponsorship became highly unlikely, or virtually impossible except under enormous external pressure. The Reformed churches were about to move forward again, but not with another big leap, just careful step by careful step, and the opportunity for a thorough review of Messianic theology which had been fumbled at the time of the Reformation was about to be fumbled again. However, while Hitler was preparing for his Sudeten sabre dance the Provisional Committee of the WCC appointed key staff and prepared for the organizational mergers and the programs which lay ahead. It followed "the increasingly serious development of the Church conflict in Germany with intense concern" and sought to express its belief in "the spiritual unity of all those who are in Christ, irrespective of race, nation, or sex." Its confrontation with the leaders of Hitler's Protestant wing, the Reich Church, assumed much the nature of the division within the German Catholic Church over the Vatican's Reich Concordat. Reich Church leaders soon issued a declaration which condemned "every supranational or international Church structure, whether in the form of Roman Catholicism or of World Protestantism, as a political distortion of Christianity" and added anti-Semitic pronouncements for good measure.¹²⁹

Within days of the British-French démarche urging Benes to show “the utmost measure of accommodation to the Sudetan Germans”, and without an agreement having been reached for the sale of Witkowice to Germany, the Sudeten sabre dance started in earnest. Reports reached London of German troop movements on the Czech border from May 20 while, ominously, Hitler was in Rome consolidating his relationship with Mussolini. President Benes appealed to London and Paris for guarantees but, bowing to the government’s wishes, no papers published them.¹³⁰ London’s answer was still ‘no’,¹³¹ and, at least for the moment, Britain had called Hitler’s bluff. But time was on his side.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA BECOMES A ‘MORAL ISSUE’

The main purpose of Hitler’s visit to Rome (where he exchanged snubs with the pope) was to finalize the Pact of Steel under which Germany and Italy were committed to wage war in common. This would strengthen Italy’s bargaining power with France over control of colonies in North Africa, and, Hitler hoped, persuade Mussolini to support anti-Semitic policies in Italy along the lines of those already in effect in Germany, and, in particular, to open an Office for Jewish Affairs. Czechoslovakia claimed, quite correctly, that Hitler was planning a surprise attack and called up reservists to man the border. Next day, May 21, Hitler obligingly confirmed it by announcing that because of the oppression of Sudetan Germans and government non-cooperation in preventing it, he intended to smash Czechoslovakia by military means.

Hitler had handed the British government the moral justification which it needed either to intervene directly to protect British interests or to do so indirectly through appeasement by forcing Czechoslovakia to make territorial concessions. From that point onwards all the public posturing and propaganda by both Britain and Germany was on the “moral issue” of self-determination for people in an area of limited value to Hitler¹³², like Africa, when the real issue was control of strategic resources of steel and munitions. Chamberlain had already said that Britain was sympathetic to the plight of the Sudeten Germans who were not getting fair treatment from the Czechoslovaks and had compared it, somewhat extravagantly, with racial oppression in South Africa.¹³³ The Australian Foreign Minister, William Hughes, told parliament he hoped British negotiations in Prague would lead to a peaceful solution, then two months later, in July, after making a visit to Germany, the Attorney General, Robert Menzies, advised the British Government to urge Czechoslovakia “to make the most liberal concessions it could offer.”¹³⁴

Britain’s politicians were not prepared to explain the motives or the real interests which determined their policies, their decisions and their responses to the actions of other countries. They appeared to be competing with each other to conceal their motives and they justified every move with cliché-ridden double-talk and hypocritical double standards. Morality was apparently a matter of perception. A few illustrations.

If another country wanted to grab a piece of territory or trade and resources its leaders were power hungry expansionists, as in the cases of Mussolini and the Japanese generals. But in Germany's case it was different. Hitler was reuniting people on humanitarian and racial grounds and, just incidentally, he was providing a buffer between Russia's unruly Communists and Britain's faithful, hardworking Christian monarchists.

If another country mounted a naval blockade against British shipping it was interfering with free trade and it was a threat to peace, as in the case of Japan blockading China's ports. But when Britain discussed sanctions and a naval blockade of Japan with the United States it was protecting vital interests and preserving peace.¹³⁵

If indigenous or minority communities rebelled against another power they were an oppressed race struggling for self-determination, such as in the case of the Sudeten Germans. But if they were Burmese or Indians rebelling against British colonial rule, they were subversive elements, ungrateful to Britain for taking up the white man's burden of civilizing and Christianizing their pathetic heathen hordes. And if they were either Jews or Arabs rebelling against British rule in Palestine, they were, according to the British Minister in Cairo, Charles Bateman, "each as loathsome as the other." They were, he said, involved in a quarrel in Palestine that brought nothing but abuse from 'both sides and which was like an incurable disease for which the only possible treatment was opium to reduce the pain.¹³⁶

After his visit to Rome and his declaration of a military solution to the Czechoslovakian crisis, Hitler continued sabre rattling on Czechoslovakia's borders to put pressure on President Benes and while the British Government floundered around looking for the pain killer, he progressively stepped up the tempo. On May 28, he took the next major step and issued orders to his army commanders and Foreign Office advisers to be ready to invade Czechoslovakia by October 1, 1938,¹³⁷ and stepped up his propaganda campaign against Czechoslovakia, stirring up the Sudetens as much as he could. Dr. Schuschnigg was transferred – that day¹³⁸ – from house arrest to SS headquarters in Vienna's Hotel Metropole and at or about the same time Baron Louis de Rothschild was taken there from his prison cell to become a guest in the room next to his friend. But while the deposed chancellor was subjected to his particular form of special treatment the baron was given a comfortable suite of furniture, a radio and plenty of time to talk with his family and their advisers about the generous terms for his freedom – presumably all within ear shot of the happenings in the room next door so that he would be in no doubt about the fate which might be in store for either one or both of them. But he was no longer just a prize prisoner under threat. He was a prize prisoner, an international negotiator and a political hostage all packaged as one, and after changes in the German higher command it was Himmler with whom he was negotiating personally.¹³⁹

The House of Rothschild and the British government were caught. If they paid the ransom demand and gave Hitler Vitkowitz in return for Baron Louis' release it would change the balance of power in Europe. The capacity of the Little Entente to resist Hitler's demands would be undermined. The Jewish community in central and south eastern Europe would then be in greater danger and domestic tensions in each country in the region would undermine national stability as Hitler's Nazis whipped up dissent, just as they had in Austria. But if they held out, Hitler's wrath against Jews in general would be enormous, the likelihood of his invading Czechoslovakia would increase and unless Britain and France were prepared to intervene to stop him, which they were not,¹⁴⁰ the Little Entente was at even greater risk.

On or about the same day, May 28, and just three weeks after Hitler's triumphant state dinner in Rome, a commission of the Nazis' Racial Policy Office was discreetly set up in Milan to help the Italian Fascists write the racial laws which would be progressively imposed "for the defence of the Italian race."¹⁴¹ Hitler had everything running for him and continued appeasement was the only course open to Britain while it sought some way out of the maze. Hitler was now supporting the Arab cause against a Jewish state while he was facilitating Jewish settlement in Palestine by emigration – and increasing the pressure on Jews to emigrate from every country in which he had any influence. Britain could not agree to Zionist demands for immediate large-scale settlement in Balfour's "national home". Any hope for relief through large scale resettlement therefore lay with a change of heart by the countries with which the Jews of the German-speaking countries were ethnically related: namely the adjacent countries of Europe and the European-settler dominated countries of the White Western Christian world. There appeared to be some hope of this when, under pressure from the Jewish community of the US, Roosevelt agreed to US sponsorship of an international conference and, with agreement from France, it was planned to be held at Evian in France from July 6 to 14.

When the British Cabinet Foreign Policy Committee met on June 1 the two money matters, the Sudeten/Vitkowitz issue and the loans to China, were still running in parallel and Craigie's telegram of May 10 became the centrepiece of an argument between the Foreign Secretary and the Chancellor. Halifax rejected the contention that China would lose the Sino-Japanese war if it ran its course and that Japan might be provoked to military action by the loan. He said Japan also wanted credits from the London market and it would therefore not block a loan to China. In contrast, Simon and his advisers "were in full agreement with Craigie." No decisions were reached.¹⁴²

But Chamberlain was still keeping his own counsel and on the same day he gave a restricted press briefing which resulted directly in a series of related Times editorials. In the first of them, on June 3, the Times declared that the "rigid application of the principle of self-determination everywhere is obviously impractical" but the Sudeten Germans had an undoubted case, and if the Czech government granted plebiscites to them and to the Polish and Hungarian minorities as well, Czechoslovakia might, in the long run, have an homogenous and contented people. The FO issued an immediate denial that the Times represented government policy, but on June 9 Dr Hesse reported to Berlin that the editorial was based on Chamberlain's briefing of June 1 and that he had not disavowed any part of it. Then on June 14 the Times declared that it would be the bankruptcy of European statesmanship if the question of the future of something over three million German Czech subjects was allowed to plunge a continent into devastating war. It called for a plebiscite of the Sudetan Germans. More music to Hitler's ears. Only a few days later, on June 18, concerned at the turn of events in Czechoslovakia and the impact of the China loans affair, the Treasury Secretary, Sir Warren Fisher, wrote to both Simon and Chamberlain. He told them very bluntly that if Britain was prepared to support China financially in her resistance to Japanese aggression it must face the consequences. Britain must recognize, he said, "that we shall earn the undying hostility of Japan who sooner or later – perhaps at a time when we are at death-grips with Germany – will take her revenge. Thus to risk our country's security, indeed survival, would be nothing short of a crime, equaled only by the folly of it, as nothing that has been suggested in the way of financial assistance can be effective. ... I sincerely trust that the government will have nothing to do with this dangerous – and in the long run possibly suicidal – nonsense."¹⁴³

At this point the deteriorating situation in Europe and the inflammatory material which his own press was publishing on one hand, and the establishment of the provisional committee of the WCC on the other hand appear to have combined to prompt Pope Pius XI to think more deeply and more sympathetically on the Jewish question. His pronouncements over the next few months suggest that he experienced a sickening feeling of guilt at the Vatican's influence in the long-running and deepening crisis. Surely this would be hardly surprising in view of the Vatican's relationship with the Rothschild family over an extended period. There are also indications that although the Secretary of State, Cardinal Pacelli, remained his adviser and a confidant, the pope was drifting away from the policy and philosophy of heavy reliance on concordats to consolidate the church's influence and that he recognized the close relationship between that reliance on concordats and the prevailing political and social anti-Semitism. Hitler's orders to prepare for an invasion of Czechoslovakia were unknown to the world at large, of course. But in view of the chaplaincy commitments which flowed from the Reich Concordat there was a point at which the Vatican, or its go-between officials in Germany, would have, of necessity, been taken into confidence by German Army Command. The point at which such confidence was shared is unclear, but it must be assumed that the 'confidence' reached Pacelli reasonably early. We may never know whether that 'confidence' was then shared with Pope Pius XI, and whether that shared knowledge contributed to their drifting apart on the operation of the Reich Concordat and the related matter of the Jewish question.

But also just at the time, John LaFarge, an American Jesuit priest and active campaigner against racism in the United States, happened to be in Europe on a working holiday. He was exploring the church, studying social issues and meeting editors of religious journals, during May-June 1938, after attending the International Eucharistic Congress in Budapest. A remarkably progressive theologian, LaFarge had founded the Catholic Interracial Council in New York four years earlier and had written Interracial Justice in which he argued that the Catholic Church should see the achievement of racial equality as a crucial goal in the twentieth century. When he arrived in Rome on June 5 he was struck by two things. One was the amount of anti-Semitic material, translated from German, which was available in bookstores. The other was the admirable social, economic and architectural achievements of Fascism in the face of greater squalor than he had ever seen in the poorest Negro sections of the south.¹⁴⁴

THE JEWISH QUESTION: PIUS XI SAYS 'IT'S TIME TO CHANGE'

One of LaFarge's appointments in Rome, was a meeting with the Superior General of the Jesuit order, Fr. Wladimir Ledochowski, the obsessively anti-Communist administrator who had been given responsibility for the preparation of Divini Redemptoris, including the selection of a team of theologians to write it. That encyclical had been published three months earlier, together with Mit Brennender Sorge (see above, chapter 18). Another appointment was to attend a general audience with Pope Pius XI at Castelgandolfo. However an additional appointment was arranged unexpectedly a few days later. LaFarge received a summons to return to Castelgandolfo on June 22 for a private audience with the pope whose mind was on the Jewish question. Although not much of the substance of their discussion is known, the pope's growing sympathy for the Jewish position and his concern at the direction of Vatican press influence are quite clear.¹⁴⁵ Pius XI told the American that he had read Interracial Justice and considered it the best thing written on the topic. LaFarge quotes the pope as saying that he was looking for a man to write on the topic and God had sent LaFarge to him.¹⁴⁶ He was to draft an encyclical to be called Humani Generis Unitas, (The Unity of the Human Race), focussed on Nazi racism and anti-Semitism. He was to have considerable freedom in the drafting of the encyclical, being instructed to "say simply what you would say if you were pope," to say it very thoroughly, from the standpoint of science and study, and not to be discouraged by obstacles.¹⁴⁷ Pius XI then made it clear that this was a new initiative and that he had not yet discussed it with Fr. Ledochowski. He would write, he said, asking the superior general to give LaFarge every facility. "Properly I should have first taken this up with Fr. Ledochowski before speaking to you, but I imagine it will be all right," he said,¹⁴⁸ then: "People say that the Roman pontiff's secret is a fool's secret. Perhaps. But it need not be like that. And this is a true secret that We are telling you."¹⁴⁹

But while the pope was shifting ground in one direction, many of the people beneath him in the Vatican, and Mussolini, were shifting ground in the other direction. The influence of Mussolini's closer relationship with Hitler, Italy's growing dependence on Germany, and the presence of the Nazis' Racial Policy Office was beginning to show with a distinct hardening of heart by Mussolini and he was very happy to find himself in step with the Jesuit-controlled press. On June 24, only two days after the meeting between Pius XI and LaFarge, La Civiltà Cattolica published a review of a book by a "non-Catholic German" refugee in Switzerland in which the reviewer reminded readers of "the Jews' continual persecution of Christians, particularly the Catholic Church, and their alliance with Freemasons, socialists, and other anti-Christian groups."¹⁵⁰

Subsequently, after Pius XI had advised Ledochowski of his meeting with LaFarge, the young American Jesuit and his Superior General met for an hour and a half on June 27. It is reasonable to assume that they discussed that book review and other recent reporting by La Civiltà Cattolica in the context of LaFarge's personal papal brief, but, whether they did or not, the superior general named two principle collaborators with whom LaFarge was to work.

LaFarge says that this was at his own request, but it can be assumed also that his “request” was prompted by the thrust of his awe-inspiring conversation with his superior general. The effect was to dampen the papal injunction for frankness and spontaneity, with Ledochowski urging caution “since the matter is such that if it were known, every government in Europe would have people in 24 hours at the Vatican, urging the expression of their ideas.” At that stage Pacelli had not been advised of the proposed encyclical. LaFarge named five other persons who were “in on this” and Pacelli was not one of them. The persons LaFarge was to collaborate with were Fr. Gustav Gundlach, from Germany, and Fr. Gustave Desburquois from France.

Gundlach was more traditional than LaFarge in his attitudes. Although he had condemned ethnic and racist anti-Semitism as ‘unchristian’ in an article published eight years earlier, he condoned state “anti-Jewishness” as a moral and legal means of combating “dangerous influences of Jewish ethnicity in the ambit of economics, politics, press, theatre, cinema, science, and the arts.”¹⁵¹ Such views were essentially supportive of all the Nuremberg Laws and therefore his appointment to the group to draft the encyclical – not a decision of the pope – does not appear to be consistent with the pope’s intention in commissioning the encyclical. Similarly, Desburquois, the editor of the journal Action populaire which he had helped to establish 35 years earlier, was the person who had been summoned to Rome as a matter of urgency in February to review the draft of Divini Redemptoris and to ensure that it was not limited to a simple condemnation of Communism. In 1938 he was regarded as a somewhat progressive social activist and organizer of seminars who had considerable influence on Catholic employers, labour unions and youth movements. He wanted a rationalization of the free-market capitalism which had been “supplanted by a dictatorship of a few powerful leaders and managers of enterprises and capital, having control over the life of nations” so that it was “inspired by the Christian spirit of concord and charity” and avoided transformation into “violent Communism.”¹⁵² However he had previously worked on the drafting of Quadragesimo Anno, the mid-Depression encyclical on Reconstruction of the Social Order, which offered little relief for the disadvantaged and certainly no encouragement for non-Christians.

LaFarge deferred his return to the United States, moved to Paris, and under very difficult circumstances, with numerous obstacles placed in his way, worked, mainly with Gundlach, on a conglomeration of versions of the text in French, English and German. They were not strictly three translations because as the work progressed they differed significantly in form and content. The task of research and getting anything like an agreed text was going to take several months. So: even without Pacelli’s ‘moderating influence’ it is clear that Ledochowski was well able to nobble LaFarge by assuming editorial authority for the planned encyclical and by sandwiching the pope’s chosen writer between two powerful figures of more ‘traditional’ views, thereby circumventing the pope’s intention. However, Pius XI had taken a vital first step towards a serious re-examination of the Jewish question within the Vatican hierarchy and as the three drafters worked together they developed a close understanding and greater commonality of view than might have been expected. LaFarge’s collaborators became very supportive of the whole project, jealous of the independence which the pope had intended, and very concerned at efforts to delay the project and to divert the thrust of their writing. Perhaps the parody of Mein Kampf was about to trigger a reassessment of the trouble in the triangle. Perhaps. Certainly the politicians of the Vatican and Europe's governments were not standing still and waiting for them to make a pronouncement.

However as he set off from Rome LaFarge cannot have known of cabinet discussions in London which were about to complicate his task considerably. On June 28, ten days after Fisher's blunt warning about the impact of Britain's China-Japan policies, and with Chamberlain, Halifax and Simon unable to agree on the matter, (Chamberlain noted that "if we were to become embroiled in the Far East, Germany might seize the opportunity to do something in Czechoslovakia or Italy or in Libya"), it was referred to a full cabinet meeting on July 1, at which a decision was again deferred pending further consultations with the US ambassador, Craigie, and the consortium of bankers which the Foreign Office still hoped would provide the funds, even if under government guarantee.¹⁵³

THE EVIAN CONFERENCE

By this time, while Craigie's talks got under way, while LaFarge set about his writing, and while the Woodhead Commission was still in Palestine the Arab rebellion had erupted again with the onset of the northern summer. Britain had had eighteen battalions of its very thin army tied down in peace keeping missions ever since mid 1936 but now, in early July 1938, it dispatched two additional battalions from Egypt to Palestine at the urgent request of the Colonial Office to suppress the renewed rebellion. Such was the situation when thirty countries from Europe and the Americas, plus Australia making 31 nations, met on President Roosevelt's initiative, at Evian in France for eight days from July 6 to arrange an emigration program which would relieve Europe's Jews of the threat of impending German invasion and oppression. Britain insisted that Weizmann, previously its golden-haired wonder boy, should not be allowed to speak and it demanded that Palestine should not be discussed. The United States accepted that demand with only token argument. The administration was certainly not yet ready to strut the Zionist stage. That demand illustrates as clearly as anything that although the British government had come to realize the centrality of Palestine to its Imperial security, it still failed to grasp the centrality of Palestine to the trouble in the triangle, or even to understand the concept of the triangle. That being the case, Evian was not the place to start understanding it or unraveling it. The parody of Mein Kampf just had to be worked through and then, perhaps, people could stand back and see the whole picture in perspective. Perhaps.

On the other hand the Zionists were no less dogmatic. They displayed a reluctance to accept mass emigration from Europe unless unrestricted migration to a Jewish state of Palestine was a part of the deal. One of their main justifications for a Jewish National Home in Palestine would have lost its validity if Europe's oppressed Jews had all been freely offered homes in other countries. But they need not have worried. The countries of the Christian Western World did not fling open their gates to unrestricted Jewish migration. Most of them agreed to quotas only marginally higher than their ordinary migration programs would have allowed.^{154 155} In fact the Swiss Federal Police Chief, Dr. Heinrich Rothmund, complained that as a consequence of a wave of between three and four thousand Jewish refugees fleeing from Austria to Switzerland in the wake of the Anschluss it had been necessary for the government to require entry visas for all persons carrying Austrian passports.

While the delegates debated, the Nazi agencies continued to 'assist' as many German Jews into Palestine as they could squeeze through Britain's migration defences and, as if to help the conference along a bit, they also kept a steady flow of new regulations going to press. These included the exclusion of Jews from selected commercial positions and the use of prescribed given names for purposes of quick identification – and humiliation.¹⁵⁶ However, because of manipulation for political purposes by people on both sides of the Jewish refugee fence, Evian was really little more than another step towards the establishment of the State of Israel, even though it did produce some tangible results. Australia agreed to receive 15,000 immigrants¹⁵⁷ and several Latin American countries increased their quotas. In addition a permanent Inter-governmental Committee was set up to work in cooperation with the League of Nations and it succeeded in getting an agreement, which would have required Hitler's concurrence for it to work effectively, for refugees to take a small proportion of their capital with them out of Nazi-controlled countries.¹⁵⁸ Other proposals were rejected on the grounds that they were "interference in an internal German problem." In fact, the Intergovernmental Committee – if it was a serious attempt to solve the Jewish refugee crisis – was virtually doomed to failure from the start. It was presided over by a representative of the Palestine Mandatory power, Earl Winterton, and as Britain refused to discuss additional legal migration to Palestine this was an insurmountable obstacle. Winterton, it is said, "was known for his negative attitude towards the Jews and his pro-Arab stand on the Palestine issue."¹⁵⁹

However the result of by far the greatest significance was the decision by the United States to resume admission of refugees from Czechoslovakia, Austria and Germany. None had been admitted since 1933 under the eugenics-based race restrictions which Hitler had so eagerly taken as a pattern.¹⁶⁰ More indications that his parody, Mein Kampf, was already beginning to take effect. Zionist Organizations in the United States had gained the support of a number of high-ranking public figures, including Justices, senators and congressmen. The government was gradually responding to intense pressure from them and had taken the first step which would very quickly lead to it assuming the mantle of principal sponsor of the Jewish national home concept which Britain was shedding as hurriedly as it could.

President Roosevelt had ridden into the White House and then stayed there with the strong political support of minority ethnic groups for his new deal. Throughout his presidency from 1933 to 1945 between 85 and 90 percent of the Jewish vote was cast for him and candidates supporting him.¹⁶¹ In spite of the prevailing atmosphere of anti-Semitism he responded in the usual way – with senior political appointments – and Jews gained unprecedented prominence with a series of appointments to the Supreme Court and cabinet, and with support for election as governors and mayors in numerous states and towns. No doubt the Jewish community was grateful but, as the refugee crisis deepened, it looked for a new deal in that respect too. Its political appointees were then critically placed, both to respond to Zionist pressure and to pass it on up the ladder to where the buck is supposed to stop.

THE BANK SUGGESTS COOPERATE WITH THE JAPANESE

Back in London, while politicians and migration officials had their talkfest in Evian, the consortium of bankers noted its disapproval for the China loan proposal, for different reasons, and its view was echoed by the Bank of England in a letter to the Treasury on July 8. The Bank said the funds proposed were not enough to shore up the Chinese position and a Japanese victory in East Asia might not be so catastrophic from Britain's point of view anyway. (Emphasis added.) This was because although Chinese trade would then be exploited mainly for Japan's benefit, it did not necessarily mean the exclusion of British business "unless – as may be necessary – it was found impossible ... to recognize the new state of affairs," [a thinly veiled allusion to a Japanese-German war coalition], and it seems that "Japan cannot hope adequately to finance the trade and development of China unaided."¹⁶² Thus it was clear: the Bank of England anticipated some form of ongoing Anglo-Japanese financial collaboration, provided that it did not further antagonize Japan at that point.

THE JESUIT PRESS SUGGESTS SEGREGATE THE JEWS

And on the same day, July 8, La Civiltà Cattolica aggravated interfaith relations in Europe by following its June 24 book review with a long study of "the question of the Jews in Hungary," in which the writer said the "supremacy" of Jews had become particularly "disastrous for the religious, moral, and social life of the Hungarian people" and it was therefore not a question of proposing a theory of "segregation." It was now a matter of "approving its concrete application in a country represented as being 'the most solid and indestructible fortress of Christianity'." [Emphasis added.] Even if they did have all the goodwill in the world, what chance did the negotiators at Evian have of producing other concrete proposals? Then, conditioned by La Civiltà Cattolica the Italian public would have thought it quite natural a week later when, on July 14, a group of university professors made public a Manifesto of the Italian Race, a ten point summary of Italian Fascism's new position on the question of race under the title Dichiarazione della Razza.

The manifesto is presumed to have been vetted by Mussolini personally and it was published under the auspices of the minister of popular culture. Its authors purported to show that there were great races and small races, with some "minor systemic groups" as well, and that "contemporary Italy" was of the same great Aryan stream as Germany – with some accountable variations. They discounted the historic tidal ebb and flow of invaders, refugees and migrants across Europe, and through Italy in particular: it was a "myth," they said, that there had been a "significant influx" of people in historical times, and any influence of Africans, Orientals, Semites, Arabs, Hamites, or anyone else was of no consequence since the Lombard invasion. Race was, they said, a purely biological concept; it was time for Italians to proclaim that they were racists; that they were of the Aryano-Nordic orientation; that differences between them and French, Germans, Greeks or Turks was “not solely because they have a different language and a different history, but also because the racial constitution of these people is different.” Then came the crunch. “Jews do not belong to the Italian race,” they said, adding with equal disregard for history that “Jews represent the only population that has never been assimilated in Italy, because it is constituted by non-European racial elements which differ absolutely from the elements from which Italians descend.” Union was admissible only within the circle of European races, they said, and “the purely European character of Italians is altered by crossing with any extra-European race that bears a civilization different from the ancient civilization of the Aryans.”¹⁶³

The new Manifesto of the Italian Race was published on the first page on every daily newspaper in Italy on July 15, 1938, the same day that editors would have had available for publication the recommendations of the Evian Conference which had closed the previous day, plus reports of some of the concrete actions which the countries represented had agreed to take. The Manifesto was indeed a remarkable document. It is another illustration that the parody of Mein Kampf was in full swing. Its misrepresentation of history paralleled that of the Vatican over a very long period, and its timing and content offered the world a clear indication of what lay ahead. However very few people were making the connections between each situation and the next. Certainly Britain's cabinet was still trying to isolate each situation and they had finally resolved the matter of Britain's China-Japan finance crisis only two days earlier, on July 13. Knowing that the United States would not take any parallel action and that Craigie still believed caution was the best option, (even though he had come to accept the proposal for an economic blockade of Japan provided that he had six weeks for prior discussions with Japan), cabinet decided not to proceed with the loans.¹⁶⁴ The decision might weaken Britain's hold on future trade with China and undermine its long term Extra-Territorial Rights, but cabinet thought it might also make Palestine and Suez less critical to the outcome of the crisis in the Far East and relieve the pressure in both Europe and the Middle East.

Thus: Britain continued its protestations of neutrality in the Sino-Japanese war; the United States continued to do likewise (and to profit from the adventures of both counties); Japan continued to discriminate against the Western Christian enclaves which were intimately linked into the Chinese industrial and commercial structures in a manner which was basic to the whole conflict; Craigie set about an intensive round of economic policy discussions in Japan; Italy stepped up its anti-Jewish rhetoric; and the continuing conspiracy of silence was so effective that the British public knew nothing of what was going on, except that those nasty Japanese were trying to push its Christian missions out of China. And to think that this was to be, in John Mott's words, “the Christian Century.” Surely that was still sufficient justification for a war There was little optimism in London that Craigie could achieve anything, a slate of five conditions which Japan should meet was prepared and he was to advise Japan that the Anglo-

Japanese Commercial Treaty of 1911 could be revoked if these were not met. Even Craigie was not greatly optimistic. It shows the atmosphere in which the talks took place that he could complain that the British Foreign Office was “unimaginative and conservative” and note only that “the prospect of a re-established friendship ... would afford the best hope visible today of weaning Japan from her foolish policy of armed imperialism.” How did he and the British Government think they had floundered, or blundered, into the situation they were in if it was not for the consequences of Britain’s armed imperialism over a very, very long period? Another illustration of “one rule for us and a different rule for them.”

THE IMPACT OF EVIAN

However, although it quickly receded into the background, the Evian Conference appears to have had wider effects than simply a nibbling away at the edges of the reserve of refugees building up in Europe. It influenced both Pius XI and Hitler.

Firstly, Pius XI. Evian can be given part of the credit, along with Mussolini’s agreement to establish an office for Jewish affairs and the publication of the Manifesto of the Italian Race, for some unusually dramatic action by Pius XI. The manifesto proclaiming the Aryan origins of the Italian race had called for the removal of the Jewish population from its midst.¹⁶⁵ That was no more than the Jesuit-controlled press had been doing – in fact it was less – but enough was enough! On July 15, immediately both the Manifesto and the decisions of the Evian Conference were generally available, and in line with his secret instructions for the writing of Humani Generis Unitas, the pope vigorously condemned anti-Semitism during an audience for the general chapter of the Sisters of Our Lady of the Cenacle. He referred to an “unpublished document” (the encyclical was then at a very early stage of preparation) concerning “the great question which is currently being debated throughout the world under the name of nationalism ... exaggerated in every way ... which presents an obstacle to the saving of souls, which puts up barriers between peoples, which is contrary not only to the law of God but also to faith itself, to the Credo itself ...” He then referred to the universality of the Catholic creed and contrasted it with the manifesto which had been published “this same day” and “is henceforth a ... form of apostasy.” It was, he said, “no longer merely one or another false idea, it is the whole spirit of the doctrine that is contrary to the faith of Christ.”¹⁶⁶ Pius XI also issued a directive for the Jesuit-controlled press to change direction. Its anti-Semitic campaign stopped abruptly – temporarily – two days later.

Secondly: Hitler. On July 18, he sent his personal adjutant, Capt. Wiedemann, to London with an instruction to tell Lord Halifax that “if there is no satisfactory solution in the near future, I will simply have to solve (the Sudeten question) by force”.¹⁶⁷ ¹⁶⁸ Work began immediately on the expansion of the existing concentration camps in Dachau, Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen in anticipation of a big influx of inmates and some of the Jewish prisoners already in custody were told that the new inmates would also be Jews.¹⁶⁹ Whether Halifax was told of the camp expansion program is not clear. But it was a remarkable tactical move, putting the House of Rothschild and Britain under greater pressure to forfeit control of Vitkowitz while giving Britain an alternative over which to negotiate if, together with Czechoslovakia, they would not give way on the major issue. Hitler couldn't lose. He would get territory first, by negotiation, (including all of Czechoslovakia's heavy forward defence positions which were still important even though he could outflank them through Austria), then the Czechs would have no means of stopping him from taking the munitions as well. The high probability was that he would win quite quickly on both counts. When Lord Halifax agreed that much could be settled before Hitler's deadline it strengthened the Fuhrer's position greatly, so he applied even more pressure.

But Pius XI was growing more disturbed and he followed his spontaneous address in audience on July 15 with a more considered address to 150 ecclesiastical assistants to the Italian youth movement and Catholic Action on July 21. But while he was very forthright in confronting the question of racism, he still made no direct reference to either Jews or anti-Semitism. He said the spirit which dictated racism and nationalism was "something particularly detestable" with a spirit of separatism and exaggerated nationalism which, "precisely because it is not Christian, ... is ultimately not even human ..." ¹⁷⁰

A MISSION TO PRAGUE

Coinciding with that address, the Daily Herald reported, very simply, that Captain Weidemann, a close friend of Hitler, had made a secret visit to London and had discussions with Halifax at the Foreign Office. However the Manchester Guardian withheld publication of reports from Voigt of German conscription of recruits and of Czech independence being of "vital interest" to Britain because "it looked extremely threatening" and because it was contrary to the government's line on plebiscites.¹⁷¹ Then Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain announced in the House of Commons on July 26 that Lord Runciman, President of the Board of Trade, would go to Prague on August 3 to act as an intermediary between the Czechoslovak government and its Sudeten German minority.¹⁷² The conspiracy of silence left most people wondering why he had been chosen for the task. Although behind-the-scenes negotiations had been in progress from the moment Baron Louis de Rothschild declined to give his blessing for Hitler to take control of Vitkowitz this was the first publicly disclosed move in the game of chess in which Europe was the board, the people of Czechoslovakia were the pawns and the Munich partition plan was a pause for regrouping. Perhaps it was a stalemate before Hitler was left to call Britain's bluff and walk in to claim the prize six months later.

Two days before his announcement to the Commons, on July 24, Chamberlain had instructed the FO not to issue any information on Lord Runciman's negotiations and "mediation" between the Czechoslovakian Government and Germany, and he centralized news flow through Steward at Number 10 Downing Street. At that point, even before Chamberlain advised parliament and although the British press was muzzled, Steward advised the German Embassy that "the British Government was prepared to demand far-reaching sacrifices from Czechoslovakia if only Germany would adhere to peaceful methods in settling the Czech question.” He also said that “he knew for a certainty that Chamberlain had an intense desire to start conversations on the Czech question ... and the British Government had no interest whatever in Czechoslovakia, other than that the affair should not end in Germany’s using force.”¹⁷³ That ill-considered action – that bungle – that outright lie – was even more devastating than the Halifax-Hitler conversations on November 19, 1937, in the politicking before the Anschluss. Hitler was assured of his next major annexation and relieved of the need to consider any serious negotiations.

The pope’s hands were tied by his concordat with Hitler, and they both knew it, but as the pope’s concern increased so did his determination to inhibit Hitler’s expansionism. He took up the theme of universalism in Catholicism and tried to contrast it with nationalism and racism again on July 28 in an address to two hundred seminarians from the Urban Pontifical College of Propaganda. “Within the human species, there exists a single great human race, universal, catholic, a single great and universal human family, with diverse internal variations,” he said. “Thus the human species is a single race, universal, ‘catholic’, (and) one may therefore wonder how it happens that, unfortunately, Italy needed to imitate Germany. ... Anyone who strikes a blow against Catholic Action strikes a blow against catholic life (and) anyone who strikes Catholic Action strikes the pope.” Then, casting his words beyond his immediate audience, he said: “Be very careful; I advise you not to strike Catholic Action; I urge you not to do it, I beg you not to do it for your own good, because anyone who strikes Catholic Action strikes the pope, and anyone who strikes the pope dies. ... That is true, and history has demonstrated its truth. ...”¹⁷⁴ That declaration may have raised Mussolini’s pulse rate just a trifle although it is doubtful if it bothered Hitler one iota. However what it certainly did was give the world a clear indication of the self-understanding of the Catholic Church and, in particular, that of the pope as the sole representative on earth of the Messiah, the second person of the Triune God.

But Pius XI did not stop at that. He told the seminarians from thirty seven nations that they were all sons of the same mother and of the same family, and that “Propaganda is the true, just, and healthy practice of a racism that corresponds to human dignity and human reality; for human reality is to be men and not wild beasts (and) human dignity is to be a single great family, the human species, the human race ...” Then: “... all men are called to the same light of truth, of good, of Christian charity; all are called to be in their own country, in the nationality peculiar to each of them, in their particular race, the propagators of this great idea which is magnificently maternal and human even before it is Christian ...”¹⁷⁵ In that scenario he did not leave much of a role for Jews – or anyone else other than Catholic Christians for that matter!

Even though he could not bring himself to publicly tackle the Jewish question head-on at that stage, his series of addresses should have left the church in no doubt that the pope had changed direction. However his health was failing, and in anticipation of a change in the papacy the politicking within the Vatican was intensifying, together with efforts to circumvent the revised approach to the Jewish question which he was struggling with. This is quite apparent from the way in which La Civiltà Cattolica sought to modify or qualify the pope’s remarks to the Propaganda seminarians when they were reported, together with the full text of Italy's race manifesto, on July 29. Its unsigned report noted "the remarkable divergence" between Germany's racism and the "theses which are proposed by the Italian 'group of fascist scholars'," and said that this confirmed that Italian Fascism "does not wish to be confused with Nazism or German racism, which is intrinsically and explicitly materialistic and anti-Christian." Then "we cannot and must not minimize or conceal" the important point made by "the scholars" that "the question of racism in Italy must be discussed ... without philosophical or religious intentions" and without "introducing into Italy German theories of racism." "Legitimate fears" have been aroused on the part of "right-thinking people" and "(although) the document we have published in its entirety ... affirms the desire to discuss racism 'from a purely biological point of view' it nevertheless speaks of a 'physical and especially psychological model of the human race,' and disapproves of the 'crossing with any extra-European race that bears a civilization different from the ancient civilization of the Aryans'." Sprinkled liberally with gobbledegook about "conceptual precision and rigorous terminology" which could give the impression that "the authors" wanted to introduce German racism into Italy, the La Civiltà cattolica article ended with the condescending note that "we therefore understand all the seriousness of the words of warning uttered by the Holy Father which we have cited above."¹⁷⁶ Osservatore Romano published the pope's remarks in the normal way and for the Jesuit press to then seek to reduce their impact and to represent the manifesto in a favourable light was quite extraordinary indeed. It illustrates the extent of the manoeuvring which was underway in the Vatican and the fact that the ailing pope had moved way ahead of the hierarchy which was supposed to do the bidding of the sole representative on earth of the Messiah, the second person of the Triune God.

Up to this time the Sudetens in Czechoslovakia had generally not been demanding either partition or incorporation into Germany. They had been agitating for a better deal and they were about to simply be used by Hitler as a Nazi power base from which to undermine the capacity of President Eduard Benes and his government to resist his demands. It was a re-run of Austria with Konrad Henlein taking the role of Dr Seyss-Inquart as Hitler's mouthpiece. It was Britain, not Hitler or Henlein, who actually introduced the plan to partition Czechoslovakia. Chamberlain had let it be known to British correspondents, prominent political figures and diplomats as early as June 1 that Czechoslovakia was not a viable state, that Britain would not oppose self-determination for its minorities and that plebiscites might be a suitable way of arranging it. The Times took up his theme with almost indecent haste.¹⁷⁷ Hitler and Henlein simply stage-managed the prompting in much the same way that Britain had carried out its Balfour Declaration leaflet drop during the Great War and waited for the response. The British government hoped that partition would publicly satisfy Hitler's long-standing demands for the reunification of all German speaking communities and thereby undermine his capacity to justify and gain public sympathy for a grab of British interests in Czechoslovakia.

Britain did not have the military capacity to stop Hitler if he pressed his demands to the point of invasion, so it simply continued the old imperial trick: if you have to make concessions, give away a colony or force someone else to concede territory. It was still aiming for a bought peace with someone else paying the price, but with a piece of Europe instead of a piece of Africa.

Chamberlain's policy of appeasement had always been the subject of dispute and it would ultimately bring down his government, and become the butt of increasing criticism, as the world became embroiled in another major war. However in retrospect it was he who had been painted into a corner by the accumulated consequences of the self misunderstanding and actions of the amorphous Christian gel in general and of imperial Britain in particular. World War II was not a consequence of his policy of appeasement. The policy of appeasement had become a necessity because of the deepening trouble in the triangle and there was no way of avoiding it unless the trouble in the triangle was first fully understood. There was neither the time nor the will for the world to work through that as Chamberlain used Czechoslovakia to buy as much time as he could to enable Britain to retain its hold on its Empire. He didn't understand the parody. Neither did anyone else. It just had to be acted out.

RENEWED ARAB REBELLION

The additional two battalions of troops despatched to Palestine from Egypt in July proved insufficient to suppress the renewed Arab rebellion. In line with the understanding between Canaris and the Grand Mufti, weapons began reaching the Arabs in Palestine via Saudi Arabia and Iraq in August and Britain's troubles were steadily being compounded. The Jews in Palestine were receiving aid from Jewish organizations in the United States and the Arabs were receiving aid from Germany. Both were intent on undermining Britain's Middle East policy which had been spawned by self interest at the expense of both groups. The British military command requested a full division from Britain but the War Office refused. Such a commitment would have jeopardized the possibility of the dispatch of the first contingent of a field force to France. The War Office undertook instead to gather units equivalent to a division from India. Lt. Gen. Sir Henry Pownall, then Deputy Secretary to the Committee for Imperial Defence, reflected the general lack of understanding of how the crisis had come about when he agonized over the need to "despatch the half of our meagre land forces to carry out a role of internal security – and internal security in the sense of preventing Arabs and Jews slitting each others throats. If as seems likely Germany (and perhaps Italy) are at the back of this trouble to a large extent then surely it is playing into Germany's hands to despatch forces there ..." ¹⁷⁸ It was actually at about that time that the funds and arms which Canaris had promised the Mufti at their meeting in April began to arrive in Palestine via the neighbouring countries. It was becoming clearer and clearer that, as a consequences of the Balfour Declaration, Palestine had become "a crippling liability for an imperial power already badly extended and under duress" and Britain's global predicament was entering a new phase. ¹⁷⁹

And in spite of La Civilita cattolica's bid to show otherwise, Italian policy was drawing closer and closer to that of Germany, and with each announced shift in policy, the Axis capacity to intervene more directly in North Africa and the Middle East increased. On August 4, Italians learned from their newspapers that foreign students “of Jewish race” would no longer be admitted into any educational institutions.¹⁸⁰ On the same day China, being pushed back further and further, suggested that joint Anglo-American mediation in the Sino-Japanese war could bring a solution to the Far East crisis. However it appeared that China was looking for an assurance of Anglo-American ‘assistance’ in the event that mediation was rejected by Japan, and Craigie told London, on August 12, that Japan was unlikely to agree to any sort of peace talks until it had captured Hankow, after which the Yangtse River could be reopened for trade.¹⁸¹

So: while the press and the governments of Europe continued their conspiracy of silence with selective reporting of Lord Runciman’s visit to Prague, those who had growing appetites waited for those who controlled the larder to drop the keys to the Vitkowitz cupboards into their laps, and Craigie’s talks in Tokyo dragged on with little progress. At the same time, July-August, 1938, the politicians and military planners in each of Germany, Italy, Britain, France and the United States watched with keen interest for the outcome of a brief clash between Japan and Russia for control of an obscure but strategic hill on the Soviet-Korean border. The small unit of the Imperial Japanese Army quickly showed its superiority over the larger unit of the Soviet Far Eastern Army, but the Japanese government then agreed to an armistice favourable to Russia in order to avoid the incident spiraling into a wider conflict. Whitehall took this to mean that if Britain had maintained a tougher attitude to Japan in the Sino-Japanese War it might not necessarily have led to the backlash which Craigie and others had feared.¹⁸²

And not everything was flowing smoothly for Hitler. His military commanders were unsure how much of his sabre rattling was bluff and how close he was prepared to go towards war. Some of them feared that if he did go to war over Czechoslovakia its allies would intervene and Germany would be crushed. They determined to stop him, organized towards a coup in the event of him ordering an invasion, and sent secret emissaries to brief and to seek help from the British government. Ewald von Kleist-Schmenzin actually met the chief diplomatic adviser to Lord Halifax, Sir Robert Vansittart, on August 18 but when Chamberlain received a report of the plot and Hitler’s plans he rejected it as unrealistic and pressed on with appeasement at other people’s expense.¹⁸³ Next day Kleist-Schmenzin also approached Winston Churchill who was not, then, a member of the government, and was given a letter which, although it had no official standing, was intended to encourage the plotters. The letter shows the extent of the gulf between Churchill and Chamberlain in their attitudes to Hitler and that Churchill either misjudged or deliberately misrepresented the government’s position in his effort to support the plotters’ peace initiative. It reads, in part, “I am sure that the crossing of the frontier of Czechoslovakia by German armies or aviation in force will bring about renewal of the World War”.^{184 185}

Naturally the Czechoslovak government was not at all impressed by Britain’s efforts to force it to cede its defensive fringe territory, with a population of three and a half million people, to Germany, nor with its Pro-Nazi propaganda that the Benes government was maltreating the Sudeten Germans. Britain’s action encouraged other ethnic groups in Czechoslovakia’s composite community to press for self-determination; it undermined the economic stability of the nation; it threatened the defensive capacity of the Little Entente; and it forced each of those countries to consider closer ties with the Soviet Union. But Britain's options were disappearing before its eyes with every move which either Hitler or the British government took, and as Chamberlain floundered around to buy time he really had little option but to paint Czechoslovakia into the badman's corner if he was to hold Britain's empire intact.

If Britain tried any preemptive action against Hitler it had to succeed absolutely at the first attempt and Chamberlain had already admitted to the French government that Britain did not have the capacity to mount an effective military action. [The fact that it could not send a division of troops to quell the rebellion in Palestine in August had made that painfully clear.] But such an action would automatically break Britain's tenuous grip on the Middle East with its oil supplies as the Arabs sided with Hitler, their ally in their efforts to prevent a Zionist takeover of Palestine. If the Middle East were lost then the Indian subcontinent would be lost too. It would be lost either because of Britain's inability to hold it militarily or by deliberate political decision of its leaders to reject British rule and an upsurge of the rebellious activities of the past decade. Furthermore, because Italy would be with Germany, North and East Africa would also be forfeited. Then there was the problem of the Far East. Japan would take full advantage of British and French preoccupation with Hitler to relieve them of Hong Kong and all of their Southeast Asian possessions, using its Anti-Comintern Pact with Hitler as the justification.

America's position was uncertain and an alliance with Communist Russia was both politically unacceptable and strategically unwise in view of Japan's position in China and, again, the Anti Comintern Pact. But finally there was the problem of the hostages in Vienna, the likelihood of Hitler liquidating them if Britain swooped on him and the incalculable consequences of Hitler's "final solution" being thrust so violently onto world centre stage if he were to do so. That was a factor which Britain could not afford to have injected into the volatile Jewish question in Palestine, irrespective of whether or not they were prepared to let Hitler have his resources prize of Vitkowitz, and he knew it. He must be given credit for a much better grasp of the situation in 1938 than his subordinates. It doesn't really matter whether we credit that grasp to intuition, inspiration or an intimate understanding of the personal and political relationships involved. Those relationships were flowing firmly in his favour. All he had to do was keep the pressure on Britain and the keys to the larder at Vitkowitz, and therefore to much of Europe as well, would fall into his lap.

BRITISH PRESSURE ON CZECHOSLOVAKIA

After the diplomatic farce of Lord Runciman's first "invitation" to Prague, maps of Czechoslovakia were published every few days showing the latest Nazi territorial claims and counter proposals by either Britain or the Commission of Ambassadors appointed to determine both Czechoslovakia's new boundaries and the sequence in which Hitler was to occupy the ceded territories. But while his supposed friend, Chamberlain, flew shuttle between England and Germany and carved up his country over his head, President Benes steadfastly refused to cede any territory. What was happening was not what Baron Louis de Rothschild had led him to expect would result from greater direct British capital interest in Czechoslovakia. If he wasn't going to get military protection the least he expected was concessions from Britain and the House of Rothschild to enable him to protect the integrity of his country. But after each additional Nazi claim was published the pressure from Britain for President Benes to accept the proposals current at that time increased, with Chamberlain saying that Britain could not accept any responsibility for the fate of Czechoslovakia if Benes would not compromise on the question of self-determination for Sudeten Germans.¹⁸⁶ In any case it could not, it did not intend to try, and Hitler knew that even if Benes did not.

The only way to avoid a conflict of frightening proportions and to move towards an era of community well being and stability was for the key players involved to work systematically through a range of interlinked issues which were being exposed more clearly than ever by the harsh flood light of the parody of Mein Kampf: ethnic, interfaith and socio-economic exploitation and conflict. The world was in desperate need of a revised approach to each of these issues but the initiative for a revised approach could only come from within one of the communities involved at the seat of the trouble: Europe. The power brokers of the political and economic systems of the dominant Western countries had no interest at all in revising the system from which they benefited greatly and they were in deep seated conflict with those who wanted to revise it – the National Socialists of Germany, the Fascists of Italy and Spain, the Communists of the Soviet Union, and the non-Western Japanese. Therefore the initiative could only come from somewhere within the totality of the church which was supposed to understand basic issues of human relations and to be able to reflect the will of God as conveyed in the Gospels. And, in turn, the principal part of that church – the Roman Catholic Church with its monolithic structures, its dominant role in the affairs of Europe, and its claim to be the sole representative on earth of the Triune God – was the logical source of the initiative.

However the Roman Catholic Church could not possibly fulfill that role. It was so dogmatically, politically and structurally tied to the powers, the policies and the structures which had to be reviewed, and it was so bitterly antagonistic to each of those who were pushing for the review – except for Hitler and Mussolini to whom it was just as tightly tied by its concordats – that it was totally incapable of either recognizing the task or taking the initiative. This meant the task had to fall to the alternative international body of the church, the World Council of churches which was just then being established from the Reformed, Protestant and Orthodox branches of the church. Could it be established in time? And would it have the will and the capacity to take the necessary initiatives? The world was about to find out. The Life and Work Movement had already committed itself to accept, somewhat reluctantly, the theological basis which Faith and Order required and in doing so enabled the establishment of the Provisional Committee of the WCC. So: while Britain's WASPs (White Anglo-Saxon Protestants) determined the fate of Czechoslovakia on the basis of total imperial self interest, the members of the Continuation Committee of the Faith and Order Movement met in an atmosphere of crisis at Clarens, Switzerland, for three days from August 29 to September 1.

They had the awesome responsibility of deciding whether to adopt the draft constitution of the WCC and therefore, in effect, whether the council could become a unified force capable of taking such an initiative. They probably didn't think of their role in such terms but, in an historical context, that was it. They resolved that with some minor modifications the draft constitution met their requirements and it could therefore be sent to all churches which had been recognized by either the Faith and Order or Life and Work Movements with an invitation to join the new council.

Similarly, it is most unlikely that members of the British Cabinet gave either the meeting in Clarens or a stinging article in Il Regime fascista any more than a cursory nod when they were recalled for a special crisis session on August 30 to consider the failure of the Runciman mission to persuade Hitler to accept a plebiscite for the Sudetan Germans. Italy's fascist newspaper noted that morning that: We confess that in both planning and execution. Fascism is far inferior to the rigor of La Civiltà Cattolica (and) modern states and societies, including the healthiest and most courageous nations in Europe, Italy and Germany, still have much to learn from the Fathers of the Society of Jesus."¹⁸⁷ The ministers knew that Hitler's demands for the immediate secession of the Sudeten lands to Germany would soon be backed up by military force. He had already said so. Halifax told cabinet that Churchill had proposed a joint note from several powers to Germany but he advised against it because the other powers "would probably ask embarrassing questions" of Britain's intentions concerning Czechoslovakia. Chamberlain added that the policy of "an immediate declaration or threat might well result in disunity, in this country, and in the Empire" and war was not a prospect which the Defence Ministers would view with great confidence. The press was not told of that meeting – except that Chamberlain and Halifax personally briefed their unofficial mouthpiece, Dawson – and next day, August 31, the Times reported that "there appears to be no reason to doubt Herr Hitler's own declaration of peaceful aims." Beaverbrook's Daily Express followed suit with a banner headline: 'There will be no European War'. Who was trying to mislead who, and why?

That day Ledochowski wrote the first of two letters on consecutive days to LaFarge, who was desperately trying to finish Humani Generis Unitas so that he could deliver it to Rome in time to board a ship for the United States on September 24. In the first, he encouraged LaFarge to go home earlier and discouraged him from visiting Rome. In the second, dated September 1, he said: "Good news! I am authorized to inform you that you may, after finishing your work, leave immediately for America. Please be so good as to deliver your work to Fr. Desbuquois and ask him to send it to me by a secure route. Later, on the basis of the comments we receive, we will make the necessary revisions."¹⁸⁸ By whom was he authorized? Ledochowski, as head of the Jesuit order, could surely give LaFarge any instructions which related to his work for the order, but Pope Pius XI had personally given LaFarge his instructions relating to the encyclical. Was Ledochowski implying that he had discussed the matter with the pope? If he were not, then he could surely have issued instructions on his own authority without implying delegated authority from anyone. LaFarge therefore had good reason to ponder the fate of the anti-racist encyclical. Could Ledochowski be about to water down the thrust of his work to take the pressure off both Mussolini and Hitler? The Italian ministerial council issued a decree, that very day, that non-Aryan foreigners resident in Italy, the empire and its colonial possessions since January 1, 1919, must leave within six months and those who had acquired Italian citizenship during that time would be stripped of it. They followed it next day with a further decree that teachers and academics of "non-Aryan race" would be struck from the rolls six weeks later. LaFarge expressed his concerns in a letter to his immediate superior in New York, Fr. Talbot, on September 18 and subsequently ignored the letter from Ledochowski.¹⁸⁹

RUSSIA'S THREE-POWER PLAN

The Soviet Union certainly did not share the Times confidence about Hitler's peaceful intentions or his alliance with Italy. It was anxious to examine with Britain and France various means of defending Czechoslovakia against German attack. On September 2, while the Italian government was organizing the expulsion of its Jews, the Soviet ambassador, Ivan Maisky, drove to Chartwell to tell Churchill that the Soviet Government wished to invoke Article II of the League of Nations Covenant, under which the League Powers were obliged to consult together if war was imminent. Churchill sent Halifax an account of the Russian Ambassador's approach, encouraging the government to take up the proposal. But as it was actively encouraging Hitler to go east, it certainly did not want to interfere with the Anti-Comintern Pact between Germany, Japan and Italy, and cabinet did not want to get involved with the big Communist power, it declined to respond and Halifax advised Churchill of that on September 5.

That evening, having issued instructions that if Harold Nicolson strayed too close to the facts in his live-to-air BBC broadcast on Czechoslovakia he was to be faded, Halifax dined with Dawson to 'consider' a Times editorial which would gauge public reaction to the Runciman report. The result was a notorious editorial on September 6 stating that "It might be worthwhile for the Czechoslovak government to consider whether they should exclude altogether the project, which has found favour in some quarters, of making Czechoslovakia a more homogenous state by the secession of that fringe of alien populations who are contiguous to the nation with which they are unified by race." It then returned to its theme of plebiscites for all of Czechoslovakia's minorities and, in effect, called for the dismemberment of the nation. And to help make the cut-up appear respectable on the well-trodden ground of race it added "...there was satisfaction that in London and other capitals there was a growing volume of opinion that after all that has happened Sudeten Germans and Czechs cannot be expected to continue living together in the same country."¹⁹⁰ [Emphasis added.] The Times had thus surrendered its independence and placed itself at the disposal of Chamberlain and Halifax to circumvent not only the Foreign Office but also large sections of his own cabinet and the Conservative Party. In doing so it had helped to highlight the absolute hypocrisy of Britain's policies in India and in many other countries. But it also provided a precedent, or a justification, for territorial realignment and changes of governance wherever communities of mixed ethnic background found themselves living together for whatever reason, whether historic population movements or contemporary pressures – especially Palestine. The Foreign Office immediately issued a denial that the Times editorial reflected government policy and told the government that it was a calamity. Then when Maisky called to express his concern Halifax simply referred him to the FO's denial.

Later that day, in Rome, Pius XI met “pilgrims” in a touring party organized by Belgian Catholic Radio. In his address he dealt with the international crisis. The nature of his address raises the possibility that he was aware of the Times report when he improvised a portion of it. Whether he was or not we might never know. However he focused on the prayer used “at the most solemn moment in the (Catholic) Mass, after the Consecration, when the divine Victim is actually offered.” He referred to “... Abel's sacrifice, the Adamic age; Abraham's sacrifice, the age of Israel's religion and its prodigious history; Melchizedek's sacrifice, the anticipation of the Christian religion and its age.” The “awe-inspiring text” moved him irresistibly, he said. “Note that Abraham is called our patriarch, our ancestor. Anti-Semitism is not compatible with the thought and the sublime realization expressed in this text. It is a deplorable movement, a movement in which we, as Christians, must have no part.” Then, unable to control his emotions, he wept as he read from Paul's letter to the Galatians. “The promises were made to Abraham and his offspring,” he said, and “the text does not say, as St. Paul remarks, ‘to his offsprings, referring to many, but to his offspring, referring to one, which is Christ.’ The promises are realized in Christ and by Christ, in us who are parts of his mystical body. By Christ and in Christ, we are the spiritual offspring of Abraham. No, it is not possible for Christians to take part in anti-Semitism. We recognize that anyone has the right to defend himself, to take steps to protect himself against anything that threatens his legitimate interests. But anti-Semitism is inadmissible. We are spiritually Semites.”¹⁹¹ The pope did not specifically refer to the expanding range of so-called ‘defensive’ legislation discriminating against Jews in Italy and elsewhere under Nazi pressure; this was the last time he spoke publicly and so directly on the issue, and, significantly, although the complete text was published in the Vatican documentary service and in Belgium, the Catholic press in Italy did not quote his remarks at all. They had “no official character.” In other countries press quotations were usually limited to the words: “We are spiritually Semites.”¹⁹² Clearly the pope was out of step with the prevailing tone within the Vatican. Just how far out of step would become apparent from an article published in La Civiltà cattolica two weeks later.

BRITAIN'S PERILOUS POSITION

In Washington that same day, the acting head of the British mission made an extraordinary admission to officials of the State Department about Britain's weakened position, in a bid to justify its pressure on Czechoslovakia. It was becoming clearer, he said, that the dominions were becoming isolationist, and there would be no sense in “fighting a war which would break the British Empire” while trying to ensure the safety of the United Kingdom.¹⁹³

Then in mid-September Britain admitted being unable to supply aircraft and replacement parts for the Australian air force and thus pushed Australia further towards dependence on the US and away from the Imperial Preference Scheme.¹⁹⁴ That admission had widespread repercussions because Australia and New Zealand were already fearful that Britain would not be able to defend Singapore, thus exposing them to the possibility of an invasion by Japan. The new situation, coupled with the British Government's unwillingness to commit battleships to the defence of the region because depletion of the Mediterranean fleet, would, they feared, encourage Mussolini to further adventures. That fear led the future Prime Minister, Robert Menzies, to plead with Chamberlain to persuade France to surrender Tunis and Djibouti to Italy "to keep Mussolini quiet."¹⁹⁵ Coming after his call for Czechoslovakia to be forced to make territorial concessions so that Australia might not be required to surrender New Guinea back to Germany, that plea demonstrated that Australia was adopting the worst of European colonial attitudes towards buying peace by trading other people and their territory as pawns. 'Independence' and 'self determination' were simply terms to be mouthed for one's own convenience, not principles to be acted upon.

But at this point a bit of a delay in Benes' acceptance of the proposals for disemboweling Czechoslovakia didn't really bother Hitler. He had a lot of unlikely 'friends' pushing his case for him. At each stage of the play the border of the areas to be ceded crept closer and closer to Ostrava and his strategic objective, Vitkowitz. He was being portrayed by Chamberlain and his press lackeys, who would later turn on him with the strongest of invectives, as a tolerant leader whose legitimate claims were being rejected and who was naturally getting irritable as the Czechs tested his patience. Up to that time Chamberlain had been successful in keeping the issues of Hitler's annexations and the future of Palestine quite separate in the public mind through his conspiracy of silence, but the events of mid-September brought them together so violently that it is quite amazing that he could continue with that policy.

TWIN DECISIONS: PALESTINE AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

According to Lord Bethell, the Colonial Secretary, Malcolm MacDonald, "was in regular contact with Weizmann, Ben Gurion, Elliott, Baffy Dugdale and other Zionists",¹⁹⁶ and they were well briefed on government policy and decisions. In view of the circumstances it would be remarkable if a member of the House of Rothschild was not either regularly a part of the group or briefed by them. MacDonald told the group on September 15 that he still favoured the partition of Palestine. But on that day Chamberlain decided to fly to Berlin to see Hitler. It was a sudden decision taken because it seemed that war might be avoided if Britain and France abandoned their pledges to Czechoslovakia. Next day, September 16, the day that Chamberlain met Hitler for their first personal meeting on the Czech crisis, Beaverbrook wrote to Halifax to assure him that "the newspapers" were all anxious to help him and the Prime Minister but they needed "guidance". He therefore suggested the delegation of a minister "authorized to have direct contact with the newspaper proprietors individually and personally ... as great benefits would flow from the decision.” Beaverbrook also contacted the PM and suggested that Hoare be the minister assigned. Hoare began daily briefings immediately.

Two days later Chamberlain’s inner cabinet and the French met to consider Czechoslovakia and decided to tell Benes to cede the Sudetenland to Germany. The level of secrecy which the proprietors had agreed to meant that the public was not aware of the pressure placed on Benes, neither were the majority of politicians, and it was generally assumed that the Czech government was a willing participant in the dismembering of its own country.¹⁹⁷ Then on September 19, four days after his previous meeting with them, MacDonald spent the evening with Weizmann, Ben Gurion and Baffy Dugdale, briefing them on the situation. Lord Bethell quotes Dugdale as saying at the end of the evening: “They are going to sell the Jews also, give up partition, for fear of the Arabs and the Germans and the Italians ... We are all stunned. Ben Gurion’s first reaction and mine was that the Jews will fight, physically, rather than go back to the mandate as it will be. Chaim (Weizmann) said nothing much.”^{198 199} Weizmann was probably reflecting on his discussions with Coupland and the need to maintain disharmony between Jews and Arabs in order to achieve their objective.

This is very clear confirmation that the decision to renege on the promise of the partition of Palestine to provide for a Jewish State – that is, to renege on the Balfour Declaration – was taken in desperation in the heat of negotiations with Hitler in the ‘Munich Round’. It was intended to placate Hitler, to reduce the likelihood of further rebellion in Palestine, and to reduce the prospects of even closer relations between Hitler and the Arab countries. The motive was to enable Britain to maintain control over the channels of communication with its empire to the east and to maintain control over the resources of the region. It was effectively the same motive as that which led Britain to issue the Balfour Declaration a mere twenty one years earlier. There was only a slight difference. The first decision was to gain control of the focal point of the trouble in the triangle. The second was to maintain control. But in order to maintain the conspiracy of silence which was necessary to isolate the crisis in Europe from the crisis in the Middle East the decision could not be announced immediately.

In fact both Hitler and Mussolini – and Chamberlain and his appeasers also – were getting very strong encouragement from the Jesuit press in Italy. On September 22, La Civiltà Cattolica carried an article by one of its editors, Fr. Enrico Rosa, which purported to refute Il Regime fascista’s attack on it by defending the “truth” of an article published in 1890 which had been turned against the church. The real effect, and one must presume the real intention also, of his ‘defence’ was to defend a segregationist solution to “the Jewish problem.” He claimed that the contemporary church, like its predecessors, absolutely insisted on “showing justice and charity towards Jews ... while at the same time being convinced that they will not do the same toward us.” He noted the persecutions which the Jews “have unleashed or promoted in the past, in concert with the freemasons, to whom they have lent powerful support, as well as with other subversive and anti-Christian groups, particularly from the ‘great’ French Revolution up to our own time.” In yet another pathetic misrepresentation of reality he said the church has never and will never act towards them in the same way, and its actions were “only to prevent them from doing harm, and to protect others from their omnipotence, and that for the common good, particularly the moral and religious good, as well as for the salvation of the Jews themselves.” He then quoted large slabs of the earlier article,²⁰⁰ “conceding” that it said: “If the Jews are on our soil, they have not come to it innocently, but rather in order to take it away from us Christians, or to plot against our faith,” since ultimately “they are an enemy whose goal is to appropriate our land and deprive us of heaven.” But a remedy such as “expulsion of Jews as foreigners” ... would not be possible in a generalized way, especially if it had to be applied in all civilized countries; “indeed it would contravene God’s plan,” which requires the preservation of Israel, even though it is dispersed, as a “concrete argument for the truth of Christianity.”

Rosa also quoted from his predecessor’s articles that: “... the popes have always kindly authorized residence in their city, and this wandering people, even though it could have abstained from going there ... (has described Rome as) ... the paradise of the Jews.” Then later: “And yet neither the Church nor any Catholic leader of the people or Catholic government – that is, those who have had to suffer most because of the Jews – have, currently or over the past fifty years, taken any violent measure of reprisal or combat against the Jews, in spite of their omnipotence. These violent measures have been carried out, just recently, by Protestant and Nazi Germany, and earlier, by Czarist Russia, and then by communist and internationalist Russia, whose revolution nevertheless owed a great deal to the Jews, as is well known and as our periodical has shown.” And the punch line: “But whatever might be its defects of style and form, they do not affect the power of the reasoning, nor, consequently, the value of the conclusions.” [Emphasis added.] As if to further justify those conclusions, in the second part of his article Rosa attributed the “anti-Catholic trend” of the Risorgimento (chapter 15) and the “degeneration of its initial inspiration, which was fundamentally Christian in origin” to the role played by the Jews.²⁰¹

Rosa was attempting to ‘white wash’ the brutal and degrading conduct of the Roman Catholic Church over many centuries, as already traced, and to deflect responsibility onto the Protestant and Orthodox churches and powers of Europe and Russia. Certainly he was right that the focus of anti-Jewish brutality had shifted from Catholic Europe to Orthodox Russia during the fifty years which he covered in that claim, from 1188 forward. However that period included the publication of the article which he was defending (1890); the entire Dreyfus Affair (1894–1906); the election and conduct of Karl Lueger, the head of the anti-Semitic Christian Social Party, as mayor of Vienna (1897); the Vatican’s vigorous efforts to prevent a British Zionist mandate in Palestine (from 1918); the deliberate inciting of anti-Semitic policies by the spreading of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and the publication of blatantly anti-Semitic material in the Catholic press from that date; the Vatican’s collaboration in Nazi anti-Jewish programs during and after negotiations for the Reich Concordat (from 1933); Poland’s pogroms and anti-Jewish legislation (1936–37); and Romanian and Italian anti-Jewish legislation (1938). But in addition, the effect of his writing was to implicate the entire Christian church in the basic anti-Semitic policies which the other wings had inherited from the Catholic Church, and he showed pride rather than remorse in the efforts of the Jesuit press to 'expose' the misconduct of the Jewish community which, in his view, deserved and precipitated such retaliatory treatment. This was hardly the response which Pius XI was entitled to expect following his instruction in July that the Jesuit press was to cease its anti-Semitic raving. But, even worse, it was in total contradiction of both the thrust of the pope's address to the Belgian pilgrims on September 6 and his instructions to LaFarge on the preparation of an anti-racism encyclical. Rosa and those with whom he was collaborating in the Vatican were treating the pope's new direction on the Jewish question with contempt. The weight of opinion and self-understanding within the Vatican was demonstrating a momentum, or inertia, of its own.

However, at this point Chamberlain's conspiracy of silence began to crack as some of the British newspaper proprietors personally realized – assisted (it is reasonable to assume) by either Hoare or some of the people at MacDonald's briefing – that Hitler's demands were unrealistic and on September 23 Halifax cabled to Chamberlain who was in Germany for further talks with Hitler that public opinion was hardening, that Hitler was expected to make concessions, and that there could be no more demands without war. In spite of that a further demand – the 'Godesberg Ultimatum' – was received two days later, on September 25, just six days before Hitler's invasion deadline of October 1. Chamberlain promptly transmitted it to Benes with, it seems, an assumption that the Czech president would accept it. It greatly increased the area to be ceded by October 1 and introduced the idea of a plebiscite, to be held before November 25, to determine the fate of additional areas, including Vitkowitz. This brought the Foreign Office into open conflict with Chamberlain. Leeper released a communiqué, with Halifax' approval, saying that Russia may join the Anglo-French Alliance in defence of Czechoslovakia if Germany invaded. In view of Chamberlain's previous rejection of Russian overtures for a joint approach the release was seen as treasonable by the PM's office. Pressure was increased for the removal of Leeper and the closure of the news department ... and the Times did not publish the release.

MUNICH: THE LAST ACT

Next evening, September 26, Hitler addressed a crowd packed into the Berlin Sportspalast. In a sustained, vitriolic attack on President Benes – the "betrayers of civilization" and traitors, the tyrants, the aggressors, the enemies of the German people and "the tools of foreign perfidy" – he told the world that the fate of Czechoslovakia was already sealed but that Britain and France might understand him or even sympathize with him. LaFarge, having ignored Ledochowski's instructions and travelled to Rome to deliver the draft of Humani Generis Unitas, listened to the broadcast speech together with Ledochowski and all of the clergy at the general curia of the Jesuits. LaFarge was horrified. His bones "quaked" at the terrific rumbling roar of "Sieg Heil!" from the audience as the passion in Hitler's voice died down and rose again, "but Father General's attentive face and eager form remained impassive.” The speech over, Ledochowski rose abruptly to leave, but turned and said to the clergy: “Don’t worry, there will be no war.”²⁰²

The Czechoslovak Government continued to resist. The British cabinet held a series of crisis meetings, and the fleet was mobilized on September 27. Next day Hitler invited the leaders of Britain, France and Italy to discuss with him a solution to the problem. They met on September 29 in a torrid conference, hastily arranged in Munich, lacking organization, in which there were constant interruptions, and at which no minutes were recorded. Agreement was reached in the early hours of the morning of September 30. Hitler and Mussolini then departed and left the British and French leaders to hand Czechoslovakia the Munich Agreement, fait accompli, later that morning.²⁰³ Hitler had made one or two concessions but he got basically what he wanted: German troops occupied the Sudetenland on October 1, the day that LaFarge left Rome for the US after delivering the draft anti-racism encyclical which Pius XI regarded as a top priority. Hitler was supremely confident that the plebiscite areas would be in his hands by the end of November and he was content to allow an international force to occupy them until the plebiscites. Shocked, President Benes could only accede to the arrangement and resign a few days later. The British government agreed to some cash advances to soften the blow and to help the Czech Government through a few of its problems. The Zionist leaders determined to push for Palestine with even greater vigour. If their people were to be forced to leave Czechoslovakia then the least they could expect was a home in Palestine if the rest of the world didn’t want them, and Evian had made that quite clear several months earlier.

In fact, as Churchill pointed out in his memoirs, Hitler had reason to be well satisfied with Munich. It had saved him from the need to decide whether to order an invasion of Czechoslovakia for which his own generals maintained the German army was not prepared and, in doing so, it cut the ground from under the feet of the group of military and churchmen who would have attempted a coup if he had ordered an invasion. Hitler’s judgement had been vindicated and the German general staff were abashed. The best they could do was recognize that his leadership was being very beneficial for Germany and, as patriots longing to see the Fatherland regain a place in the sun, fall in behind him. The coup conspiracy was abandoned – for the time being at least. Hitler – a product of the amorphous Christian gel and a self-proclaimed servant of the Lord at the centre of the trouble in the triangle – was undisputed political and military master of Germany.²⁰⁴

The British Government was caught on the back foot. Its conspiracy of silence, just a little weakened, camouflaged the fact that Palestine had become basic to every strand of Britain’s foreign policy. The government could not shout it from the rooftop. The consequences for an imperial power which did so, with half a dozen competitors baying at its heels and with its major subject peoples pressing for relief, would be swift and catastrophic. To admit such an Achilles’ heel would be to invite every other power to raise an arrow in readiness. And to admit such a thing would also invite the question “how did we get into this mess?”. The answer would automatically lead back to the Balfour Declaration and people would start to pry into motives and causes. Eventually they wouldn’t be satisfied with the set piece answer that Britain had shown its gratitude to Dr Weizmann for his development of synthetic acetone, even if most people had accepted that story without question for twenty years.²⁰⁵ Where would it all stop? Everyone who had been involved in the decision would come under scrutiny: politicians, business interests and even the church.

From Britain's point of view, the less that people knew, the easier it was to maintain national security, and the high level of ignorance was therefore running in Britain's favour. Only the best informed people close to the centre of government action or the manipulation in the Middle East realized how delicately balanced Britain's situation was. Even among those there were many who did not grasp the full implications. Britain's Ambassador to Egypt, Miles Lampson, illustrated this when he wrote to the Foreign Office that unless Jewish immigration ceased Britain might soon have to take on the Arabs as well as the Italians and Germans. "What would our position then be in the Middle East? ... Can't the Jews themselves realize that it is suicidal for Jewry to weaken Great Britain so perilously in the face of the obvious dangers that threaten? One would have thought that a man of Weizmann's intelligence would have seen that quick enough. It's such an obvious truth".²⁰⁶

Perhaps Weizmann could see the perils for both Britain and European Jewry with equal clarity. Perhaps that's why he was making almost superhuman efforts, in conjunction with American Jewry, to entice the US government into a firm anti-Nazi policy. He certainly was not ignorant. He was among the best informed people and, in the same way that he had actually helped draft the Balfour Declaration during the Great War, he was as close to the centre of the action as it was possible to get. Lloyd George had given a clear indication of his influence when he told the Palestine Royal Commission in 1937 that "The Zionist leaders gave us a definite promise that if the Allies committed themselves in giving facilities for the establishment of a national home for the Jews in Palestine, they would do their best to rally Jewish sentiment and support throughout the world to the Allied cause. They kept their word."²⁰⁷ Weizmann's position had not changed.

The fact that people did not grasp was that by using Zionist aspirations to serve its own ends, Britain had put the Jewish community into the position in which its people had a definite, identifiable, conflict of national interests. They owed allegiance to their country of birth or residence. But from the moment of the Balfour Declaration they also owed allegiance to Britain as the sponsor of a National Homeland. If they lived in a country which did not support the concept of a Jewish National Homeland, or in a country which was in conflict with Britain, then their conflict of interest became more real and of personal consequence. With their allegiances being tugged in two directions they could be accused of being a fifth column – like the Catholics in Indochina at the time of Napoleon III or like other people who retain dual nationality.

SO: WHAT OF THE CHURCHES?

The church – in toto – which had provided the theological and doctrinal basis for the White Christian Western self-understanding, and which had underpinned the British Imperial self-understanding as well, was so fragmented, in such disarray, so uncertain and so dependent upon the states to which its fragments were now attached that it was in no position to influence constructively either the course of events over-all, or the conduct of the states to which they clung. On one hand the reigning pope, Pius XI, had reconsidered his position and had moved quite decisively to dampen the deeply entrenched anti-Semitism emanating from the Vatican, but he was in failing health, he was losing his grip on affairs very quickly, and he could not carry the Vatican hierarchy with him. On the other hand the Ecumenical Movement had reached a critical stage in its evolution but it had not reached the stage at which its institutional ‘face’, the embryonic World Council of Churches, could exercise any real influence because it had neither the cohesion, the confidence or the resources.

As Hitler gained confidence in his new alliance with Mussolini – and in the fact that they both enjoyed concordats with the Vatican – and as he began to rattle his colonial sabres more loudly the noise was enough to awaken the great Christian leaders in Britain and France who dashed off to Munich to find out what it was all about. Those great Christian leaders then went home waving pieces of paper to show that they were still masters of the technique of giving away other people and their country to protect their own interests. In order to ensure and to maintain a powerful buffer between themselves and Bolshevik Russia, and also on the understanding that Hitler would keep his colonial eyes turned east, (as he had suggested would be necessary in Mein Kampf), they agreed to the Sudetan land of Czechoslovakia being ceded to Germany without a plebiscite or even a quick reference to the League of Nations. They couldn't afford to refer the crisis to the League of Nations. The questions raised would have been too embarrassing and the responses very unpalatable.

Thus, at the time of Munich, the amorphous Christian gel was looking decidedly sloppy and the prime ingredients of racial misunderstanding, religious misunderstanding, and political and economic influence made the Jewish question ever more confused as Baron Louis de Rothschild played cat and mouse with his Nazi jailers and the parody of Mein Kampf came into play in earnest.

The conspiracy of silence on Britain's dire predicament because of her conflict of interests in the Middle East and the manipulation of the question of ethnic language and identity in Czechoslovakia were such that the British public generally could not see the Munich Agreement as either a surrender to force or a desperate bid to avoid a crisis of major proportions for the empire. It was presented as “a triumph of morality.”²⁰⁸ It has been described as “a triumph for all that was best and most enlightened in British life and for those who preached equal justice,” and it has been justified as redressing the offence caused by the World War I settlement at Versailles under which three million Germans were subjected to Czech rule, and not “merely a triumph for selfish or cynical British statesmen.”²⁰⁹ Several members of the Commons as well as the Lords, and even the head of the Foreign Office, Sir Alexander Cadogan, said the public would support the government's decisions if it had a moral position to justify it.²¹⁰ What he could have said was that they would support the government if they were prevented from knowing any better, and if they could be persuaded that it was in their interests to do so.

Over the years many and varied assessments have been argued about the significance of Munich for the course of WWII. Some have said it enabled a desperately under-prepared Britain to buy time to build up its capacity to wage war against Hitler – primarily by building up its air force between September 1938 and the outbreak of war in 1939. Others have claimed, however, that just as Britain had time to prepare, so did Hitler. Moreover, allowing Hitler to get Czechoslovakia without a fight, the Munich negotiators enabled him to avoid using his own forces, still developing, against what was, at the time, Europe's second largest and best equipped standing army.²¹¹ In spite of being able to out flank the forward Czech defences by moving through Austria, Germany would definitely not have found a full scale invasion of Czechoslovakia an easy job, and Hitler's Generals knew that very well. Its Skoda munitions factories at Pilsen were the best in all of Europe, and in league with the Little Entente it could have held out for quite some time. At the very least it would have meant significant losses for the German armed forces and a serious setback to Hitler's long term plans. In addition, Britain and France could have opened a front in the West, thus dividing Germany's forces. Poland would very likely have joined in as well. At that stage, moreover, Russia had not been taken out of the picture by its pact with Germany, and it would also have been likely to support the allies.

As it was, handing Czechoslovakia to Hitler meant he was free to pick off Poland a year later. If he had been confronted at Munich, the pact with Russia would not have eventuated. Poland would not have been divided between Germany and Russia, and Hitler could not have launched his successful offensive against the West untroubled by the possibility of a second front in the East. Moreover million's of Poland's Jews would not have come under Hitler's control. In this respect, Munich played a significant part in paving the way for the Holocaust.

However, this ignores the existence of the other threats to Britain's interests: Japan and Italy. War in Europe in 1938 could well have encouraged attacks from both quarters. The threat from these quarters in 1938 was essentially no different than it was a year later when war in Europe did break out. Some commentators have said it may have been worse. The situation in Europe certainly was. What had changed was the situation in the Middle East. This is a factor that is usually ignored by commentators on Munich. In September 1938, during the height of the Munich negotiations, the Arab Revolt in Palestine was also at its height. Desperate pleas were being forwarded to London for reinforcement of the Palestine Garrison to quell the rebellion and to stabilise the situation. Britain's continued hold on the region, crucial to its plans for Imperial Defence, was under real threat if war broke out. It is no coincidence that the Peel Plan for partition was quietly abandoned, without an immediate announcement being made, during Munich. With the partition plan officially still on the table, the likelihood was that a declaration of war against Germany over Czechoslovakia would have aggravated hostility within the Arab states towards Britain. As it was, two of those states, Syria and Iraq, rose against Britain in 1940/41 and attempted to ally themselves with Germany. Britain stopped them only by the skin of her teeth.

Certainly others factors changed in the intervening period. Public opinion, so carefully manipulated by Chamberlain prior to Munich, soon turned against the policy of appeasement when Hitler's subsequent actions in dismembering Czechoslovakia revealed his true intentions. When Poland's turn came, it was, for many, a case of 'thus far and no further.' Britain could not be seen to abandon yet another ally in its hour of need without perhaps irreparable damage to her international reputation and standing. Nevertheless, even Chamberlain's declaration of support for Poland and the eventually declaration of war against Germany was not made without considerable political pressure, and he struggled until the very last to find a way short of war to save the situation for Britain.

In the final analysis, therefore, the question of Palestine was one among many factors affecting the decisions of the time. Yet it was a crucial one. Its significance cannot be ignored. The fact must be faced that it was possibly the vital factor which determined Chamberlain's decision to force Czechoslovakia's fate at Munich. If Palestine had not been an issue, if the British Government had felt just a little bit less uncomfortable about the security of its Empire, the decision at Munich could have been different. As it was, the decision was on a knife edge. Historians have revealed that the British Cabinet almost forced a confrontation with Hitler on the issue, in spite of Chamberlain's manipulative policies. If Britain had felt confident enough in her empire's security to confront Hitler at Munich instead of buckling under pressure, events that led to the Holocaust would surely have taken a very different course.

There is no certainty, however, that the Holocaust could have been avoided. The path to it would simply have been different. To avoid it required Britain, as one of the key players in the parody of Mein Kampf, to recognize the consequences of the long-standing policies and actions it had pursued on the basis of its Christian self-understanding, then to change direction substantially. That was not likely to happen in the circumstances because it could only happen if the church understood the nature of the trouble in the triangle and recognized the validity of prophecy transmitted through its two partners in the triangle subsequent to the dawning of the Christian Era and as a consequence of the self-understanding and actions of the church and its amorphous Christian gel which we have traced. And that brings us back to the point we have noted previously. The church's self-understanding was so deeply entrenched that it could not grasp the reality of the triangle and yet the acceptance of that reality was a prerequisite to a change in the attitudes and policies of the powers in the amorphous Christian gel. It has become clear from subsequent events that only substantial external pressure would lead to the reassessment and the understanding of the reality which was required.

Therefore, whether there is a primary causal connection between events in Palestine and the Munich decision is, in another sense, irrelevant. The matter calls for serious reflection in the light of the Qur'anic Night Journey and the church's ongoing reluctance to recognize the divinely inspired ministry of the Prophet Muhammad. Prophecy is itself evidence of a power that affirms God's influence on events in ways beyond the normal course of temporal cause and effect. Who is to place a limit on God's power? The validity of revealed prophecy does not rely on evidence or the demonstration of cause and effect in its fulfilment. The church has never sought to demonstrate a cause and effect relationship between Hebrew prophecy of the coming of a Messiah and the birth of Jesus of Nazareth. It simply accepts that such prophecy was divinely inspired. Neither does the fact that a prophecy remains unfulfilled over a long period make it invalid. The validity of prophecy revealed during the peak of the Hebrew Prophetic Era was usually recognized within a short period or a few generations and observers were able to relate recorded prophecy to particular historical events. But the relatively prompt fulfillment and recognition of prophecy during that phase of human history serves only to demonstrate the reality of divine revelation and divinely inspired prophecy. No more. No less. It certainly does not define or delineate prophecy nor determine through whom God may or will transmit or reveal any truth. To suggest that it does, merely shows that we do not grasp that Divine Authority is absolute and limitless, and is a presumptuous attempt to prescribe God within the limits of our own comprehension.

Christians anticipate Christ's return on the basis of prophecy and they anticipate an era of great consequence from their reading of the Revelation of John. In expressing that belief and that anticipation they are stating their belief that prophecy may remain unfulfilled over a long period and yet eventually be fulfilled and confirmed. They therefore have no basis on which to claim that a prophecy transmitted through another channel with which they are uncomfortable (because it challenges their belief) is not valid and divinely inspired. If a prophecy is dependent upon a particular condition, as in the case of the Night Journey, and that condition never occurs, then the prophecy will remain unfulfilled for eternity.

Regardless of that, Christians will look for evidence of the validity of prophecy, and where it involves a matter of judgement of their own conduct they will be reluctant to accept its validity until they have irrefutable evidence. Therefore those Christians who have been taught and have accepted as fact that Muhammad could not have been a divinely inspired Prophet because he was within a rogue stream outside the approved faith are bound to look for some validation of his role as a true Messenger of God and of the key Qur'anic prophetic pronouncements. In the seventh century, while the Jews were a stateless and dispersed people, the Prophet noted that twice they had transgressed as a people, and twice they had been scourged, and then made the incredible pronouncement that if they again transgressed, as a people, they would be scourged a third time. In Palestine, in the first half of the 20th century, 1300 years after Mohammed's prophetic pronouncement, the Jewish people, as represented by Zionism, had transgressed against the majority population of Palestine – their neighbours – as a result of the pressure which they had been placed under by the church, but at the time of Munich they had not yet suffered the full impact of the scourging. Therefore those Christians and their church saw no reason to give the matter a second thought. It is of no significance in an understanding of the validity of the prophecy that the majority of the neighbours were followers of the third stream of faith, Islam, which had grown around the mission of the Prophet. In a practical sense it may have acted as a distraction from seeking to understand it, because many Christians would have reacted like the British Minister in Cairo, Charles Bateman, who wrote that the Arab Muslims and the Jews were "each as loathsome as the other," quarreling in Palestine in a manner that brought nothing but abuse from 'both sides and which was like an incurable disease for which the only possible treatment was opium to reduce the pain.²¹² It was hardly an atmosphere in which to think seriously about prophecy. It may have been easier for Christians to relate to the situation if the people living in the area had been either totally irreligious or if Christians for whom they felt sympathy were in the majority. However, the religious background of the people would have made no real difference. They would have been simply 'the neighbours.' The prophecy still stood.

And then there was that other matter of unfulfilled prophecy. Maimonides' expectation that the state of Israel would be reestablished in association with a war of Gog and Magog. But few Christians wanted to talk about that either. It was another embarrassment. Another challenge. The Jews had been cast out and only existed to confirm the role of the church. The church said so. In any case, Britons might ask: "What did that have to do with Munich?" The two issues were not connected. Were they? Surely not. Neither the British government nor the church talked about them in the same breath. Surely they would have, if there was any connection."

The policy of appeasement was naturally strengthening Hitler's hand. It was also contributing to Britain's inability to reach an accord with Russia over the containment of Germany, and it therefore encouraged an accord between Russia and Germany. That in turn would release Hitler's attention and energy for other enterprises, but in so doing it would force the Jewish community (as opposed to the Zionist Organization) into greater dependence on Britain. That dependence would relieve the pressure on Britain from the Zionist Organization, at least for the time being, and it would tend to further submerge the basic challenge behind the Balfour Declaration in a morass of complex relationships and vested interests. No one had anticipated the complex interaction which had been triggered by the conflicts of interest to which the world was subjected because of Britain's manipulation of the Balfour Declaration. But the plot was still unfolding and it would become more involved. The Zionist Organization had said "It's time for Jerusalem now!" But Britain had said "No! We mustn't risk an empire!" And the Jewish community was not the only one which was transgressing against its neighbours. Britain and the other European colonial powers had been transgressing against their neighbours – against both the Jewish community and the people of the colonies – for a very long time. Now Britain, which had sponsored the Balfour Declaration out of self-interest, was sponsoring another major transgression against more of its neighbours out of continuing self-interest: the people of Czechoslovakia. The parody of Mein Kampf was in full flight. The question was: how long could the trouble in the triangle be held in check, and how long could the Zionist demands generated by the misconduct of the amorphous gel of the Christian West be suppressed? After Munich there was not long to wait to find the answers. The Scourge was on the prowl.

THERE MUST BE A FINAL SOLUTION

GOG AND MAGOG GO TO WAR

After Munich, Europe puddled its way towards Christmas 1938 through a quagmire of shattered human and community relationships. Baron Louis de Rothschild whiled away the tedious hours of his political imprisonment in Vienna lecturing his twenty-four “Grenadier Guards” on geology and botany,¹ and the British government spearheaded efforts to find new ways to appease or to contain Hitler and to hold together its strife-torn empire. However correspondence and personal exchanges between ministers, described by numerous historians and people such as Eden and Churchill who were directly involved, make it perfectly clear that not all members of the British cabinet fully understood the gravity of Britain’s situation. This ‘softness’ within cabinet, coupled with the public’s sense of indifference because of the continuing program of selective information release, meant that preparation for a war which was becoming more probable by the day was not pursued as vigorously as it could have been.

Central to the government’s adjusted approach to the crisis was a belief that as long as most people remained ill-informed on the crises in both the Middle East and the Far East, and on the dire threat to Britain’s ability to hold the British Empire together, it was much easier to persuade fence-sitting governments in Europe, the Americas and even the Commonwealth that Hitler was a threat to Christendom world wide. They could then be enticed to support Britain, the bastion of all that was honourable in the civilized, Christian world, in its efforts to stop him. To most people of European heritage, whether Catholic, Protestant or Orthodox Christians, those two terms still meant basically the same thing. And there was an almost unspoken assumption that in the circumstances the mainstream Protestant population would not notice, and would not mind, if it was necessary for Britain to become a little more accommodating towards the Vatican. So, as the conspiracy of silence, deception and manipulation which had become vital to the survival of Britain as an imperial power continued, the concept of fighting to maintain civilized Christian values became even more critical in its propaganda armoury than it had been during the Great War. This was especially so in view of uncertainty about the level of support which the white settler-dominated dominions might be prepared to provide. The support, or at least the cooperation of a number of Catholic-dominated countries instead of antagonistic neutrality could well become critical to Britain’s survival if all-out war could not be avoided.

One very important question was: could that strategy work again in the circumstances in which the church’s credibility was already in question and in which there was very strong anti-Christian sentiment in non-European countries, including important members of the Commonwealth? The cooperation of Jews, Hindus, Muslims and Buddhists was going to be crucial in the coming war effort and support for the maintenance of Christian domination and privilege was not a line which they would respond favourably to. Then there were the Vatican's concordats with both Hitler and Mussolini to be considered. A very big shadow hung over them. What the Pope might do to maintain the Vatican's privileges and influence if and when hostilities broke out was unpredictable. In view of the degree of cooperation and consultation between senior Nazis, the German bishops and the Vatican, and in particular their advance knowledge of Hitler's plans to attack both Czechoslovakia and Poland, Britain's reserve towards the Vatican was well justified. In addition there was the fact that the people of both Germany and Italy were staunchly Christian and that their ultimate leader was a man who, in spite of his attacks on it and the measures taken by the church hierarchy – for a time – to ban membership of the Nazi Party, was still recognized as having the status of a communicant member of the Catholic Church. He saw himself as a prophet, and insisted that he was about to complete the key task in which the church had failed. But Britain could not expose the absolute hypocrisy and power-hungry self interest of the Vatican. To attempt to do so would have simply driven the Vatican and the world wide Catholic community into deeper collaboration with Hitler. Therefore Britain could only remain quiet and acknowledge the claims of the Vatican that it was being strictly neutral!

As always, the British government was having great difficulty presenting its handling of the crises in Europe, the Far East and the Middle East as if they were in separate compartments. However the frenetic activity in Munich and the Sudetenland from September 23 to October 1 had totally overshadowed the collapse of the Anglo-Japanese negotiations in Tokyo on September 22, just as the final Munich round was getting under way. Craigie and his counterpart, General Ugaki, had made little progress over the previous few weeks as the Sudeten problem escalated to the brink of war and "Japan stood transfixed, not wishing to make any commitment for the future until the course of events in Europe had become clearer." There was "a palpable lack of enthusiasm for negotiation" on both sides and Britain's "last determined effort to curb the activities and policies of the Japanese military in China" had ground to a halt.²

So the British government floundered on in league with its compliant press barons. Beaverbrook's Daily Express ran a streamer which he later admitted was 'inspired' by the government, saying 'Britain will not be involved in a European War this year or next year either'. Reynolds News, the paper of the Cooperative Movement, was the only British newspaper to denounce the Munich Agreement, and on October 4, in a move which carries all the hallmarks of reprisal for further leaked information which could have assisted that denunciation, Leeper was shifted from his post as head of FOND to the Propaganda Department.³ Several of the major proprietors then progressed from simply manipulating news in collaboration with Chamberlain and Hoare to openly promoting the prime minister through schemes such as offering readers photographs of the great PM and Mrs. Chamberlain.⁴

Beaverbrook favoured pressure being put on Belgium, France and Portugal for them to 'rationalize' their African colonies in Germany's favour by merging them into commercial groups with controlling shares being held by Germany, as did Australia's Robert Menzies, but when Halifax learned that a series of articles on such a scheme was planned for the Daily Express he asked Hoare to intervene to stop it, fearful of an anti-British backlash in those countries. Perhaps it had dawned on him at last that people don't like being traded like chattels. As the Chiefs of Staff had told the government twelve months earlier, Britain had to make friends around the world, not enemies, if it was to safeguard its trade, territory and vital interests against Germany, Italy and Japan all at the same time. In fact Beaverbrook had become so enthusiastic in his support of German appeasement that when King Carol of Rumania was about to visit London, Halifax wrote to Beaverbrook to ask that his papers not publish derogatory stories during the royal visit about the king having sacked a pro-Fascist government because of its anti-Semitic policies and that he was ruling under a near-dictatorial constitution.⁵

Actually it could be that Britain's cash advances to Benes did help to buy a bit of time for those chattel-trading discussions, because there was still one last dice to be rolled before Czechoslovakia would have to declare everything lost. Clause six of the Munich agreement provided for the new boundaries to be finally determined in negotiation by an international commission of representatives of the four signing powers, Germany, Britain, France and Italy, plus Czechoslovakia, the country which was being dismembered. The commission very promptly did a bit of juggling, substituted a few other pockets of territory for the key Vitkowitz region, and, with the German representatives unexpectedly concurring, announced that the Munich plebiscites would no longer be necessary.

THE POLITICS OF RACE AND TERRITORY

Hitler was not at all amused. But because all the posturing had been about the race question and the incorporation of areas with significant populations of ethnic Germans into their homeland he had to accept the rezoning – temporarily. Three days later, October 4, in a speech at Saarbruchen he launched into a vitriolic attack on both the Jews in Vienna, without making a direct reference to his special guest in the Hotel Metropole, and the British in Palestine who were lecturing Germany like governesses about how she treated people within her borders.⁶ He took full advantage of powerful speeches by the 'warmongering, malevolent trio' of Churchill, Eden and Cooper, which were critical of Chamberlain and Munich, and gave notice that there were still matters to be settled in Czechoslovakia. His immigration controllers began working on one such matter immediately – making sure that there were fewer people within Germany's borders. Three thousand Jews in the Sudetenland which had been ceded to Germany were rounded up and trucked to the new border with Czechoslovakia and unceremoniously dumped, destitute, in the hands of Czech officials.⁷ It was a mere prelude to the real action which would follow quite quickly.

At the time of Munich, in spite of five years of oppression and all the 'encouragement' Hitler had offered for them to migrate, only about one third of the Jews in Germany (between 150,000 and 170,000, of whom about 20,000 were Jews of Polish nationality who had returned to Poland, out of a total of 500,000) had taken the hint and moved. They were desperately waiting for Britain to open the gates of Jerusalem, and Evian had established fairly well that there were not many other places for them to go.⁸ If there had been, it is reasonable to assume that either Hitler would have agreed to allow some time for the processes of their resettlement instead of trucking the Czechoslovakian Jews to the border, or the permanent committee set up by the Evian Conference would have been ready and prepared to greet them at the border on behalf of the host countries with transport and travel arranged to their new homes, or at least temporary accommodation. This is well demonstrated by the flying visit by Hitler's personal adjutant, Capt. Wiedemann, to London within days of the failure of the Evian conference with an instruction to tell Lord Halifax that "if there is no satisfactory solution in the near future, I will simply have to solve (the Sudeten question) by force."^{9 10} At that point work began immediately on the expansion of the existing concentration camps in Dachau, Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen in anticipation of a big influx of inmates and some of the Jewish prisoners already in custody were told that the new inmates would also be Jews.¹¹ In fact some gates were actually being closed in their faces, such as the gates to Switzerland.

In August the Swiss authorities, pursuing the complaints by their police chief, Rothmund, at Evian about the influx of Jewish refugees from Austria following the Anschluss, had threatened to rescind the right of free entry to Switzerland for all persons carrying German passports if the flow of refugees did not cease. Switzerland's visa requirements were tightened in line with discussions which had been initiated by Switzerland in April, only a few weeks after the Anschlusss, on March 12, and the Reich Central Office for Jewish Emigration was set up at the direction of Adolf Eichmann. Its function was to coordinate the coercive activities of the organizational and technical bodies already set up to accelerate and enforce Jewish migration, and the Property Traffic Office which had the job of Aryanization and liquidation of Jewish owned businesses. But Rothmund hinted to the German Consul that Switzerland might drop its visa requirements "if there were a distinct mark on the passports borne by Jews." Germany's need to keep the Swiss gates open to Aryan Germans was such that an agreement to that effect was signed while Rothmund was in Berlin at the end of September, at about the same time that Chamberlain was signing the other agreement, in Munich, and, on October 5, immediately following Hitler's carefully timed attack on the Jews of Vienna, all Reich passports held by Jews were declared invalid and recalled. New ones were issued, carrying the letter 'J' prominently in red to satisfy the Swiss requirements.¹²

The Times then let its guard drop and showed its glee at the Czechoslovakian border changes with a rare reference to resources which gave an indication that humanitarian concern for racially diverse communities was not the sole motivation behind all the manoeuvring. Quoting its Berlin correspondent's report of October 6, it said that it had been pointed out on the German side that the agreement reached proves that Germany does not intend to pursue a policy of "economic imperialism" towards Czechoslovakia. "The valuable coal fields around Mährisch-Ostrau are excluded from the German zone, as is Pilsen and the important industrial centre of Taus, on the western frontier," it said.

In Rome, it appears that Ledochowski now took direct action to ‘finalize’ the fate of the pope’s planned encyclical against racism and anti-Semitism. On October 8 he sent what has been described as an abridged version in French of the working drafts to an adviser for an “expert opinion.”¹³ But that “abridged version” carried the annotation by LaFarge himself that it was the “Authentic and complete (French) text.”¹⁴ He had prepared it after his hurried arrival in Rome to make the complete composite work “presentable.” The adviser to whom it was referred was Fr. Enrico Rosa, an editor at La Civiltà cattolica, whose article directly contradicting the pope’s views had been published only two weeks before, on September 22, just as the Anglo-Japanese talks collapsed and the final Munich round began. (See chapter 21 for details) Rosa, also of the Jesuit Order, was regarded as an anti-modernist opinion leader who supported the traditional attitudes and values of the Vatican and, in particular, a segregationist solution to the Jewish Question. That solution has been characterized as “permissible anti-Semitism.” In that article he had “conceded” – or in reality he had promoted the idea – that “if the Jews are on our soil, they have not come to it innocently, but rather in order to take it away from us Christians, or to plot against our faith,” since ultimately “they are an enemy whose goal is to appropriate our land and deprive us of heaven.” And as if to deliberately goad Hitler into proving that it was possible, he had noted that a remedy such as “expulsion of Jews as foreigners” ... would not be possible in a generalized way, especially if it had to be applied in all civilized countries. “Indeed,” he noted, “it would contravene God’s plan,” which requires the preservation of Israel, even though it is dispersed, as a “concrete argument for the truth of Christianity.” [Emphasis added.]¹⁵ Few statements could have been contrived to inflame Hitler’s messianic passion and determination any more than that.

Rosa had already been ill for some time and he soon became “gravely ill” so that it is actually very unlikely that he would have been able to consider the draft at all, let alone do any serious editing.¹⁶ Suspicion therefore deepened among those involved in the drafting that Ledochowski was yielding to temptation “to sabotage, through dilatory action, for tactical and diplomatic reasons,” the pope’s intentions and that the encyclical, if it were ever published, would bear little resemblance to the appointed authors’ draft.¹⁷ Rosa had established very clearly that his sympathies lay in exactly the opposite direction.

Certainly not everyone regarded the Munich Agreement with the enthusiasm of The Times, or, one can assume, Ledochowski. Churchill, Eden and the anti-appeasement lobby were being proved correct very quickly. Britain’s vulnerability was exposed for everyone to see and it was as if the wolves were baying at the scent of blood. The oppressed were eager to break their shackles, and competitors were eager to take advantage of demonstrated weakness. The Economist was soon able to note a sudden increase in contempt for British authority, reporting that a new boldness and aggressiveness on the part of the Arabs of Palestine was due to their belief that they can negotiate with the British Empire as equals, and that Japan’s swoop on Southern China reflected its confidence that the Western Powers need not be seriously considered.¹⁸ The black nations of Africa generally saw the situation in much the same light, except that its colonies felt bound to express support for Britain, and except also that Italy’s successful move into Abyssinia was more relevant to them than Czechoslovakia. Nationalists in Sierra Leone reflected this when they declared that Britain had stepped down from the pedestal of justice and equity when it recognized Italian sovereignty over Abyssinia¹⁹. Those in Nigeria and other countries saw Britain as dithering, impotent and with waning power, and they contrasted its willingness to send troops to Palestine to protect the Jews with its “callous abandonment of the Abyssinians to bombs and mustard gas.” But they were angered by public debate over the possible bartering of Britain’s African colonies as part of a ‘bargain’ with Germany²⁰ and this was possibly an even more critical factor in the long term.

Within a few weeks of Munich, Anglo-Japanese relations suffered substantial deterioration. Japan, encouraged by Germany’s success, showed none of the reserve which observers had noted at the time of the Soviet-Japanese clash on the Korean border, captured Hankow, 800 kilometres inland from Shanghai on the Yangtse River and extended the Sino-Japanese war to South China. It quickly captured Canton, adjacent to Hong Kong and was able to directly threaten Britain’s sea-borne trade and commercial and strategic bases both in China and South East Asia. At the same time, at the political and diplomatic level it became more strident in its bid for a New Order in East Asia. The Foreign Office concluded that Britain was losing its influence over China because of its lack of direct assistance and that it was alienated from Japan because of its continuing adherence to the Nine Power Treaty. It recommended that the government take a firm decision on whether it was to support China or not. Halifax responded on October 14 with a minute that more must be done to aid China.

On the same day, at a meeting dealing with the Aryanization of Jewish businesses in territories of the Reich, Goering remarked that “if the need arises we will have to establish ghettos in the big cities.”²¹ He was, one can assume, referring to a completely new scheme and not the expansion of the concentration camps which was already in hand. Some mention was also made of a plan to set up Jewish work brigades. Also about that date the Italian government stepped up its anti-Semitic activities, showing a hardening of heart by Mussolini, and a commission of the Nazis’ Racial Policy Office was established in Milan.

In such an atmosphere Gundlach wrote to LaFrage on October 16 expressing concern that Ledochowski was attempting to sabotage publication of the anti-racism encyclical and urged him to write directly to the pope, through the Apostolic Delegate in Washington. The pope should be told, he said, of the action which had been taken and that the original draft of the encyclical and the method proposed for its publication ‘in fact reflect real and urgent needs.’²²

Another decision prompted by the Munich manoeuvres was for the Arab and other Muslim countries to hold an inter-parliamentary congress in Cairo, in October, “for the defence of Palestine.” This was a weightier meeting than the previous similar congress at Bloudan following the publication of the Peel Report in July, 1937, and the British government took note that it held a more serious threat of Arab-Axis collaboration than it had previously recognized. Being increasingly concerned about the imbalance of forces potentially aligned against it in the event of war, the Chamberlain government decided to reduce the pressure in both Europe and the Middle East by whatever means it could.

And Sir Neville Henderson confirmed in a conversation with Sir Alexander Cadogan on October 20 that he had “put Goering up to objecting to our guarantee of Czechoslovakia.”²³ Greatly buoyed by that virtual guarantee of non-intervention by the British government, with or without the help of its lackey press barons, Hitler decided that there was no need to hesitate. On October 21 he ordered planning for the liquidation of the rump of Czechoslovakia.²⁴ Only three days later, on October 24, Ribbentrop told the Polish Ambassador, in effect, that it was his turn. Germany wanted Danzig returned, a corridor to East Prussia for a double-track railway and a super highway. It also wanted Poland to join the Anti-Comintern Pact against Russia in return for a guarantee of Poland’s frontiers under treaty for ten to twenty years.²⁵

That day, October 24, was to prove quite dramatic because, concerning the Middle East, Chamberlain’s Cabinet Sub-committee on Palestine took the decision to renege on the proposal for the partition of Palestine to establish a Jewish state. But, because the government knew very well the drama which would follow the announcement of that decision, it was to remain ‘under wraps’ for some days until a White Paper was ready for release. It also decided that a round table conference would be held in the New Year involving a wide range of Arab and Jewish delegations, both Zionist and non-Zionist.²⁶ And, concerning the Far East: the government knew that its forces may soon be needed elsewhere and they could no longer be confident of the safety of the non-military residents. Just as the government was planning to evacuate its land forces and civilians from China to avoid them being trapped as Japan rolled the Kuomintang backwards, the Foreign Office received an urgent plea from the ambassador in China. It asked that British banks contribute three million pounds to a stabilization fund to prop up the Chinese currency.

What ever it did, the British government was compounding its troubles. Without formal knowledge that Hitler had issued the order to deal with the rump of Czechoslovakia, (although he naturally would have guessed it because Goering was very unlikely to ignore his personal advice), Henderson gave the Cliveden Set, including Dawson, some ‘inside advice’ on October 26. He told them that Britain must not stand in the way of Germany absorbing Austria, that Germany would have to be given some West African colonies, that Britain should not stand in the way of Germany’s economic and political dominance in Eastern Europe, and that the only hope for Czechoslovakia rested on some form of devolution. Dawson dutifully echoed that in an editorial on October 28, giving Hitler confirmation of Britain’s blessing for the orders he had just given – a blessing which he probably had not expected quite so quickly.

From that time the Cliveden Set became a real political force for further appeasement.²⁷ However that tilt by the proprietors caused further disillusionment among a number of diplomatic and other senior journalists who resigned to set up, or to write for, private newsletters. These provided information for the public which was otherwise being suppressed and an alternative interpretation of the official news which was being released. They included

Gordon-Lennox, Whitehall News Letter; Voigt and Grieve, The Arrow; and Commander King-Hall, News Letter; added to Claud Cockburn's The Week, which was already in circulation.²⁸ In spite of such a backlash Beaverbrook wrote to Halifax to confirm that "my newspapers will do anything to help you in your difficult negotiations with the central European countries, or indeed in any direction. Besides, I am in agreement with your policy and I can give you the strongest support."²⁹

A COMPLICATION IN THE EAST

The unexpected announcement on November 3 by the Japanese prime minister of the grouping of Japan, the occupied regions of China, and Manchukuo into one political, economic and cultural block under the New Order in East Asia then sent tremors through Whitehall and marked a milestone in Britain's relations with both Japan and China. It was clear that if Japan achieved either victory over China or a negotiated settlement of their disputes without occupation, all Extra-Territorial Rights which the colonial powers had imposed on China would be expunged. The need for Britain to support China in the war as the means of protecting its own interests therefore became more critical, but it also had to be prepared to concede such rights to enable China to negotiate from a position of greater strength – unless Britain was prepared for total war with Japan. If Britain did not provide that support, China would have to turn to Russia for an alliance against Japan and the consequences were potentially just as serious. If China retained its independence or achieved victory over Japan in an alliance with Russia it was likely to require the Nationalist government to adopt an anti-Western position. In that case Britain's commercial privileges and Extra-Territorial Rights would still be lost and the Soviet Union would be in an excellent position to extend its influence into South East Asia.

The implications were perfectly clear to Chaing Kai-Shek and on November 6 he warned the new British ambassador, Clark Kerr, that because Britain had not more fully supported China after the fall of Canton its standing in China was falling dangerously low. He also warned that unless China received greater Western assistance he had only two options: to seek a negotiated peace with Japan or to rely completely on the Soviet Union, which had already provided substantial military assistance, advisers and munitions, for support.³⁰ Britain was in a near no-win take-it-or-leave-it situation – unless it had the benefit of some sort of divine intervention very promptly. It had no army available to move in, and if it sent a substantial naval force to China, or even to Singapore, it would leave itself totally vulnerable in the Mediterranean – and that meant each of the Middle East and Europe and, indeed, the home front. Craigie reassessed the circumstances, realized that his moderating line was now obsolete, and sought talks on the New Order in East Asia with the new Japanese Foreign Minister, Arita Hachiro.

Then both Hitler and the British government took deliberate decisions which, although they were driven by different motives, fuelled Zionist efforts and helped to draw the United States into the approaching conflict. Hitler's decision came first, before Craigie had even had his first talks with Arita. Provoked by the failure of the Evian Conference and the palpable lack of interest in the White Christian Western countries in the future of the Jews, Hitler put more pressure on firstly, the Jews, to leave Germany and the areas on which his interest was focussed, and, secondly, other governments, to accept the Jews. His mechanism was the fantastic destruction of Goebbels' Kristallnacht, (Crystal Night), November 9.

Following the dumping of the three thousand Sudeten Jews at the feet of Czechoslovak officials in the first week of October, the Reich authorities took steps to accelerate the return of remaining Polish Jews to Poland. However, the Polish government, unable or unwilling to resettle many thousands more returnees in so short a time, had decreed that the passports of all of its citizens resident abroad should be renewed. It then deliberately delayed processing the passports of Jews as the deadline fixed for the renewal of passports, October 31, approached. This manoeuvre would have had the effect of depriving them of their citizenship while they were abroad and would have made them stateless persons. That would have then been Poland's justification for refusing their return, especially from annexed Austria. Hitler was rather displeased by this additional manoeuvre to avoid relieving him of his Jews. Therefore, when negotiations between the German Foreign Ministry and the Polish government broke down, the Gestapo, acting as Alien Police, were directed to round up Polish Jewish families and 'escort' them to the Polish border. Some 17,000 people were rounded up, transported in sealed railway cars to the border and expelled into a Polish no-man's-land.

Being either unable, or unwilling, to cope with the situation, the Polish authorities tried to force the deportees back across the border into Germany. Some 8,000 were forced to find shelter in such places as warehouses, stables and the border railway station. Very soon, under pressure from Jewish community and welfare organizations which were providing food, blankets and other essentials for the horde of people, the Polish government relented and admitted most of the deportees. However, among the deported families who were dumped in no-man's-land was one named Grynszpan, whose seventeen-year-old son, Hershel, was living in Paris. Distressed at the expulsion and treatment of his family and their community, Hershel visited the German Embassy on November 7 and shot the third secretary, Ernst vom Rath. He died two days later. In a reprisal reminiscent of the numerous episodes in which the colonial powers of Europe had exploited individual attacks on their worthy Christian officials in Asia over a long period in order to justify oppression and slaughter, to enforce trade treaties and for territorial conquest, the Nazis seized the opportunity to swoop on Jewish communities across Germany. A country-wide pogrom to end all pogroms, preceded by a burst of propaganda about the 1936 murder of the head of the Swiss Nazi party by a Jewish medical student from Yugoslavia, was authorized by Goebbels, apparently with Hitler's consent, on the evening of November 9, the day vom Rath died.³¹

By the time the night had passed all of the major Nazi organizations of terror in Germany – the party branches, the SA, the State Police and the SD, alerted by teleprinter and phone – were involved and the terror continued throughout November 10. Almost all of Germany's 600 synagogues, some of which were ancient national monuments, were systematically attacked. The main synagogues in Munich and Nuremberg had already been destroyed a few weeks earlier, but on the Crystal Night alone, 76 were completely destroyed and another 191 were set ablaze. The Nazis had prepared well for the event. They had simply been waiting for a trigger. Pre-arranged lists were used to target influential Jewish figures and about 7,500 Jewish-owned businesses were destroyed or looted with losses estimated at RM 10 million. Murders were reported to number 91, and the mass exodus of refugees was soon in full swing. Within about six months half of Germany's remaining Jewish community had fled their homeland and about 30,000 were herded into the concentration camps in Dachau, Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen which had already been enlarged to receive them following the failure of the Evian Conference. (Chapter 21, p. 27.) In addition, in "retribution" for the Paris murder Hitler imposed a community fine of one billion marks on Germany's Jews. Property to about that value was wantonly destroyed and a lot more was sequestered to be assigned to Aryans. Orders for the pogrom to be carried out in Austria reached Vienna a little late, so the major atrocities, including the destruction of 42 synagogues, occurred there on November 10. Over a short period some 7,800 Jews were arrested in Vienna alone, more than 4,000 shops in that city were closed and almost 2,000 apartments were forcibly vacated. Suicides and murders ran into many hundreds.³²

And the German exercise was well coordinated with the Italian government through the commission of the Nazis' Racial Policy Office which had been set up six months earlier, in Milan, as an outcome of Hitler's state visit. (See chapter 21) On November 10 the Council of Ministers recapitulated, or confirmed, the measures which had been announced during that period and next day, November 11, it promulgated new laws which took effect immediately. Marriages between Italians and "non-Aryan" foreigners were forbidden or, if they had already taken place they were officially annulled, along with their civil effects, and erased from official records; the official records of Italian citizens who "belong to the Jewish race" had to carry a notation to that effect; Jews were excluded from military service; they were prohibited from owning large tracts of land or large industrial enterprises; they could not employ servants belonging to the "Aryan race"; remaining Jewish teachers were dismissed from their posts at all three levels, from institutes and academies of science, letters, and arts; the registration of Jewish students was forbidden in establishments attended by 'Aryan' Italian students – except that exemption was provided for students "of Jewish race but Catholic confession," who were allowed to attend elementary and secondary schools run by ecclesiastical authorities; and, in accordance with the policy which was now confirmed, foreign Jews who had taken up residence in the kingdom or its colonial dependencies since January 1, 1919, were expelled, irrespective of whether they had been naturalized after that date. All these and later decrees were reported without comment in the "Cronaca contemporanea" in La Civiltà cattolica over a period of months.³³ Of course Jews were barred from cinemas and public places as well – to avoid cultural contamination. Fr. Rosa should have been very happy indeed. The policy of generalized isolation, separation and expulsion which he said in his article of September 22 was not possible was being planned and implemented with great enthusiasm. Italy's Fascist authorities must have been equally pleased to have his article as a guideline.

The reaction from the Catholic hierarchy in Italy, Germany and France was generally muted but it would not be correct to say that they hardly batted an eyelid. Immediately, on November 11, the Archbishop of Milan, Cardinal Ildefonse Schuster, preached against the banning of “the descendants of Abraham” from Imperial territory. He did not refer to them as Jews but by the selective use of a reading from Paul’s letter to the Corinthians as those who “have cut Christ to pieces.” His main concern was that the laws might impinge on the church which, he said, “does not engage in politics or in the social economy,” by causing racial divisions within it. “Christ cannot be divided,” he said.³⁴ Then on November 14, although he refrained from any public comment, Pius XI wrote to both the king and “the head of government”³⁵ and that fact was given wide publicity in the Catholic press. But the thrust of the pope’s complaints – consistent with the opposition which he faced in pursuing his campaign against anti-Semitism and reflecting that opposition – was that the prohibition of marriage between “Aryans” and “non-Aryans” was contrary to canon law and therefore to the Lateran accords. The contradiction was that although the Catholic Church had long imposed a ban on marriage between Catholics and both “the unbaptized,” whether Protestants, Jews, Muslims or pagans, and also between Catholics and those baptized into other Christian churches, it provided for dispensation to remove that “impediment” if the spouse agreed in advance that children could be baptized and educated as Catholics. The new Italian laws did not allow for that dispensation. This was a dreadful failure to acknowledge the church’s authority!³⁶ In a similar vein, Cardinal Van Roey of Mechlin objected to the racist doctrine of the purity of blood because it contradicted the “well-founded” Catholic doctrine that the economy of our salvation rests on the “essential element” of the redeeming and unifying blood of the covenant shed superabundantly by Christ for the fundamental unity of the human race.³⁷

What chance did the Jews have? The overall silence of the church hierarchy, certainly partly due to demoralization and fear of similar treatment, was taken by jubilant Nazis as either support for or, at least, acquiescence in their policies. The key public dissenter, the Catholic provost of Berlin, was imprisoned for a time before going to his death.^{38 39} When Pastor Marc Boegner asked the German Bishop Heckel, (an unexpected arrival in Basle for a meeting of the Inter-Church Aid Committee which was being held prior to the International Missionary Conference at Tambaram), about the situation of the church in Germany he gave the impression that Berlin was the most Christian city in Europe. Only 0.2 percent of children, either Protestant or Catholic, had given up religious instruction during the past four years!⁴⁰

In Tokyo, Craigie noted the events in Europe nervously as he waited for his first discussion with Japanese Foreign Minister Arita about the New Order for East Asia. When they met on November 16 Arita told him that Japan’s action was simply a response to the formation of other closed economic blocs of which the British Empire was one. Craigie went off to ponder his task of trying to help the British government isolate the Far East from its series of crises in each of which its imperial trading policy was enmeshed. It was virtually an impossible task and the pace of events showed how tightly the web was woven.

Britain made its next decision on the Jewish question, helping to draw the United States ever closer to direct involvement in the approaching conflict, on November 22. It was to discourage Europe's Jews from leaving home and thus to force them to find other help in confronting Hitler. Immediately after Crystal Night Chamberlain had agreed to meet a delegation of distinguished Jews to discuss a request for a loan for refugee assistance and entry visas for "a limited number of children and teenagers who would undergo agricultural training and eventually settle elsewhere." 'Elsewhere' was, hopefully, Palestine. The Prime Minister was told that five million pounds had already been raised for the purpose – close to one third of the amount in England. He said he saw no possibility of influencing German policy (on unconditional emigration) and feared that any intervention would only worsen the plight of Germany's Jews, but he agreed to give the matter of the children and teenagers "sympathetic consideration."⁴¹ He referred it to Colonial Secretary Malcolm McDonald who, adopting the same rationale, then refused the formal request in the name of the Jewish Agency for special immigration certificates for ten thousand children. When McDonald took the matter to cabinet for final decision, ministers knew that refusal would become a matter of continuing oppression for many of the children. But on the other hand they knew that approval might undermine the slim remaining hopes for a settlement of the Palestine question. They also knew that it might even cost Britain control of Palestine which had become crucial to its ability to hold on to its empire and to keep open the sea lanes to the Far East.⁴² Their decision was made. The Empire came first. And in any case, they had already decided about five weeks earlier, during 'the Munich round', that there would be no Jewish state for them to go to. That decision had been confirmed on October 24 by a cabinet sub-committee but it would remain 'under wraps' for just a few more days until a White Paper was ready for release.

Pressure on the United States government was stepped up rapidly by the World Zionist Organization and its affiliates. The US was about to assume the role of chief sponsor of Zionism which Britain was rejecting. Britain still hoped to hold its Empire together. But how? It was running out of the means to maintain its colonial rule because of the reaction against its divide-by-faith and rule policies. Its self-understanding as the principal imperial power of the White Christian West was catching up with it.

Like Hitler, Beaverbrook was also finding the political climate to his liking. He made the first of three secret annual payments, each of two thousand pounds sterling, 'to help Sir Samuel Hoare [Chamberlain's special intermediary with the press] to stay in politics.' By coincidence it was the same day that cabinet made its fateful decision against the admission of ten thousand Jewish children who otherwise would have left Germany with Hitler's blessing. Next day, November 23, Chamberlain lied to parliament when responding to a question about the extent to which advice had recently been tendered either officially or unofficially to newspaper proprietors on the attitudes which they should take on the subject of foreign policy. He said that no such advice had been tendered either officially or unofficially. But, responding 'out of gratitude for such support', Hoare pressed Chamberlain to find a place in cabinet for Beaverbrook who was soon in intimate contact with the inner circles of government.⁴³

Hitler was making sure that his subordinates kept his secrets, too. On November 24, dissatisfied with Poland's response to Ribbentrop's 'advice' a month earlier, he issued a secret directive for the Wehrmacht to make preparations for the surprise military occupation of Danzig.⁴⁴ It was to be an action which was short of a full war with Poland, to take advantage of the favourable political climate.

That day, at his second meeting with Arita and on very weak ground, Craigie sought to refute Japan's claim that the British Empire was a closed economic bloc by presenting a case prepared by the embassy's Commercial Counsellor, Sir George Sansom. This claimed that it was Britain's policy of liberal access to the autonomous separate parts of its empire which had enabled Japan to enjoy increased exports to the empire during the 1930s and that it also enjoyed "the same free access to raw materials in the British Empire as is enjoyed by members of the Empire."⁴⁵ Very weak ground indeed, but they agreed to talk again.

Two days later, on November 26, the British government tabled its post-Peel/post-Woodhead White Paper in Parliament, announcing that the partition of Palestine was a dead issue and that a Round Table Conference with the Jews and Arabs would be held in London in February. Rosa and his friends in the Jesuit press should have been delighted. A home for the Jews in Palestine was the last thing they wanted. But perhaps Rosa did not learn of that decision. He died that day after a long illness. The decision not to proceed with partition had actually been formalized by the Cabinet Sub-committee on Palestine on October 24 – a month after MacDonald had briefed the Jewish leadership group on it at the time of 'the Munich round'⁴⁶ and whether Henderson was aware of that when he spoke to the Cliveden Set is not clear. It is reasonable to assume that because of his central position in the Anglo-German negotiations that he was, but the conspiracy of silence prevented him from referring to it.

Those negotiations included the proposed Schacht Plan which was based on the same idea as the Ha'avara (Transfer Agreement) that Jews would be permitted to leave Germany in return for the granting of preferences to German exports. The plan carried the name of the president of the Reichsbank, one of the few senior German officials who had consistently shown support for the Jewish business community and sympathy for Jewish aspirations. Immediately after Crystal Night, and knowing that the Evian Inter-governmental Committee's proposals had been rejected, Schacht began to work on a new plan. He contacted the heads of the committee and then presented his own new proposal on a visit to London. It can be assumed that he was already working on it at the time that Chamberlain, MacDonald and cabinet rejected the approach from the Jewish Agency for the admission of 10,000 children and teenagers on November 22. (Chapter 21, p. 29.)

Schacht hoped to ease tension between Germany and the countries which were being pressed to host Jewish refugees, notably Britain and the United States, by enabling both them and Germany to improve their foreign currency balances, by courtesy of the worldwide Jewish community. He proposed the establishment of a fund of RM 1.5billion (the equivalent of US $600 million at that time) to finance the resettlement of 150,000 able-bodied Jews from the Reich and Austria within three years. They were to be joined in their new homelands by 250,000 dependents and each family would receive a settling loan of RM 10,000 from the fund. Their property and assets in Germany would be invested in a trust fund, one quarter of which would be considered collateral for the loan and would help finance German exports. Three quarters of the fund would supposedly provide for those Jews who could not emigrate and who were being squeezed out of employment by the steady flow of restrictive regulations – until the rest of the world would take them, too. In reality that would have been a contribution to the German treasury.⁴⁷

The politicking and negotiations all around the globe were getting more and more intense and the intrigue in the British cabinet was getting more and more murky. Sir John Ball was tapping the telephones of Anthony Eden and the anti-appeasement group⁴⁸ from about that time and relaying information to Chamberlain, but MI5 had some well placed contacts too. On November 28 Sir Alexander Cadogan was told that Steward had briefed Hesse at the German Embassy on critical Whitehall and cabinet discussions. These included the action taken against Leeper and the Foreign Office News Department; the resistance to the Munich Agreement in the FO; efforts taken to sabotage the Munich peace plan and to commit Britain to warlike actions against Germany because of bitter feelings towards it in that office; Chamberlain's circumventing of the FO; and that the final satisfactory outcome of Munich had been "exclusively due to Chamberlain" who had ignored the provisions of the British Constitution and customary cabinet usage to get his way (by leaking information to the press barons).

Cadogan was deeply shocked, but he hesitated to brief Lord Halifax on the situation, fearing that he might resign from cabinet. However he did so and Halifax took the matter up with Chamberlain on the evening of November 29. His rationale was that the Prime Minister should understand the damage which had been done and that, if he had not directly or indirectly authorized the exchange, he would at least know that it had taken place.^{49 50} It is ironical, to say the least, that only that day The Times had published another leader based on a direct Halifax/Dawson briefing. It set out the main German grievances and expressed hope for a settlement of the territorial questions, bringing delight in Berlin and concern in Prague.⁵¹

When cabinet met next day, November 30, probably in a very tense atmosphere, the Far East was again high on its agenda, along side Germany. Cabinet had advice from the Foreign Office to the effect that China's currency stabilization fund proposal was less likely to lead to a clash with Japan than the loan proposals previously considered, and equally strong advice from Treasury rejecting that view. Cabinet decided that nothing could be done until Craigie had again reported and the United States had been consulted.⁵² Four days later, on December 4, Craigie advised the Foreign Office that he had proposed to the US ambassador in Tokyo that the three Western Powers, Britain, France and the United States, should jointly provide currency loans to China and announce the abrogation of their commercial treaties with Japan. Whether that proposal was made with the knowledge that the US was considering a unilateral loan is not clear from material available, but on December 11, the Foreign Office learned that Roosevelt was considering a $20 million credit to China. This put more pressure on Britain to do likewise, regardless of what it thought of Craigie's proposal, and to consider again the impositions of sanctions against Japan. Such increased commitments to China would clearly make confrontation with Japan much more likely and make it even more difficult to isolate the Far East from the European and Middle East theatres. The spotlight was back on the prospect of dividing the Royal Navy, and in doing so, undermining Britain's position in the Mediterranean.

Not being aware of those talks, and being unimpressed by the case which Craigie had put in mid November, Arita responded, on December 12, by noting very bluntly that quotas and preferences did exist within the British Empire, that it was ridiculous and hypocritical to pretend that it did not constitute an economic bloc, and that in times of crisis Britain tightened its ranks and excluded foreign trade. It was as if he was writing a script for President Roosevelt.⁵³ That round of talks ended. On December 14 the British cabinet received advice that "it might be necessary to make some further concessions [to the Jewish Agency] in order to avoid a violent conflict with the Jews in Palestine."⁵⁴ The Schacht Plan was under consideration and the Jewish Agency wished the government to take up the financial commitments which would be involved. Then on December 21 the US formally announced its credits to China. The demands on the British treasury were becoming greater and greater.

A SCIENTIFIC DISTRACTION

Britain was stumbling from one crisis to another but the scientific world had other matters on its mind. It had been electrified in the dying weeks of 1938 by the news that Otto Hahn and Fritz Strassman had split the nucleus of a uranium atom. The developments made possible by the controlled release of massive amounts of energy were exciting both in terms of human services and commerce. Remarkable progress had already been made in understanding and adapting the principles of nuclear physics for the benefit of mankind since Antoine Becquerel discovered the phenomenon of radio activity and reported his work in 1896, only a year after Wilhelm Rontgen discovered X-rays. Scientists talked about the prospects of eventually producing massive amounts of power for industrial purposes by nuclear fission, of propelling passenger liners across the Atlantic with only a fist full of fuel and of sending rockets on travel through space, but such ideas were generally written off as stuff for science fiction or, at best, as many years away. They talked about the possibility of harnessing the explosive power for use in mining if questions of radio activity could be resolved and they were well aware of its destructive power, but they didn't normally talk about it.

However the papal Oath Against the Errors of Modernism in 1910 and policies akin to a ban on scientific investigations a few years later were intended to prevent such developments. Generally the scientific community ignored the pope, and after the Great War they were only interested in the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. But after the achievements of Hahn and Strassman the production of bombs of mind-boggling destructiveness lurched abruptly from the realms of science fiction to the politicians' forward orders books. It was only a question of time, of money to develop them, and who could fill the orders first. And because the Vatican had sought to prevent the study of physical sciences, the professionals working in the scientific community were predominantly either agnostic or atheist, driven into those positions by the dogmatic self-misunderstanding of the church, or Jewish.

There were a number of prominent philosophers and scientists who had risen to prominence during the inter-war period who were keen to keep the world's sights on peace and whose influence had been clouded by antagonism towards them by the long-established alliance of the church and the conservative establishment. They included Lord Bertrand Russell, the brilliant British lecturer in mathematics and philosophy who lost his university post and spent six months in prison for his anti-war stand in 1918. His trenchant criticism of the church ought to have been seen as reason enough for it to act on Karl Barth's call for a rethink. In 1927 he said that fear was the basis of contemporary religion. "...fear of the mysterious, fear of defeat, fear of death. Fear is the parent of cruelty, and therefore it is no wonder if cruelty and religion have gone hand-in-hand... In this world we can now begin a little to understand things, and a little to master them by help of science, which has forced its way step by step against the Christian religion, against the churches, and against the opposition of all the old precepts. Science can help us to get over this craven fear in which mankind has lived for so many generations." Russell believed that science and "our own hearts" made it unnecessary to look for "imaginary supports" or "to invent allies in the sky" and that people could look to their own efforts "to make this world a fit place to live in, instead of the sort of place that the churches in all these centuries have made it."

Lord Russell said that a good world needs knowledge, kindness and courage. "It does not need a regretful hankering after the past, or a fettering of the free intelligence by the words uttered long ago by ignorant men." Turning his sights onto the Vatican's rules for marriage and sexual conduct he had illustrated the tensions people were forced to live under by using the example of an inexperienced girl married to a syphilitic man. According to the Catholic Church, he said, "'This is an indissoluble sacrament. You must stay together for life.' And no steps of any sort must be taken by that woman to prevent herself from giving birth to syphilitic children." That was, he said, "fiendish cruelty, and nobody whose natural sympathies have not been warped by dogma, or whose moral nature was not absolutely dead to all sense of suffering, could maintain that it is right and proper that that state of things should continue."⁵⁵ What he could have added was that, according to the dogma of the day, the personal conditions of each of the husband, the wife and the children were the consequences of God's judgement for their personal sins which could only be relieved or offset by continuing doses of the church's sacraments.

The church did not like that sort of exposure but its reaction only reached its peak when Lord Russell was appointed to a teaching post in New York in 1940 and his considerable influence could have become a factor in keeping the United States out of the war. The Episcopalian Bishop Manning led the attack against the appointment of "a recognized propagandist against both religion and morality ... who specifically defends adultery." Then the Jesuit weekly, 'America', followed, describing Lord Russell as "a desiccated, divorced and decadent advocate of sexual promiscuity ... who is now indoctrinating the students at the University of California ... in his libertarian rules for loose living in matters of sex and promiscuous love and vagrant marriage ... this corrupting individual ...”⁵⁶

But as easy as it may have been to discredit a pacifist philosopher, it was much more difficult to discredit the world’s leading pacifist scientist, at least outside of Germany, anyway. He was a German-born Jewish mathematical physicist, the Nobel Prizewinner Albert Einstein. It was Einstein’s recognition of the relationships between energy, mass, gravity, space and time, (with his famous statement that $E = MC^2$), which had provided the vital key with which other scientists were able to unlock the secrets of the atom. And in any case by the time Hahn and Strassman split their atoms, those who were looking for military power, with or without an alliance against Germany, had no need to discredit Einstein on account of his pacifism. Hitler had very obligingly converted him, temporarily, into a first class militarist who wanted an atom bomb developed as a matter of the highest priority so that an end could be put to the Fuhrer before he could put his final solution into effect.

Germany had been pre-eminent in scientific research and development since before the Great War and, largely because of the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute and its refusal to bow to Vatican policy, it still held a dominant position after the war. This was in spite of restrictions which the allies imposed as part of the peace settlement and the expropriation of many of its patents. Research in nuclear physics was also in progress in other countries but Germany was the undisputed leader in the field. Furthermore, in the absence of Christians entering the field, Jews had become so pre-eminent in nuclear physics that Hitler disparagingly labelled it “Jewish science,” a fact which must have pleased the Vatican no end. Such was their pre-eminence that thirteen Nobel Prizes for physics were awarded to Jews between 1901 and 1959, or one every four or five years. Four of those prizes, in 1921, 22, 25 and 38, were awarded to workers who later had a direct role in the development of the atomic bomb.

This concentration of effort and influence in a vital new field of science was neither a slip of fate nor a coincidence. It was the result of the interaction of several factors already discussed and it was yet another manifestation of the trouble in the triangle. The Vatican’s policy on scientific development and the Jewish question had become so intimately entangled in the affairs of the white Christian Western World that the tangled web even influenced where and by whom the atom bomb would be developed. The way in which churchmen had interpreted the Biblical creation story (after canonizing the selections which suited them) led to differences in emphasis between Christian and Jewish attitudes to investigation and research. These had become important as early as the medieval period when the best the church could do was “preserve” existing written concepts through its monks and monasteries while both Jewish and Muslim scholars pressed on with important developments in medicine. Then the church actively and vigorously suppressed scientific enquiry in the period leading up to the Reformation, while its deliberately oppressive policies forced the Jewish community to turn more and more to education as an aid in its struggle to survive. Next came the church’s negative response to Darwin and the Christian community's destructive reaction, coupled with the final destruction of the ghetto and the release of a flood of Jewish academic initiatives.

Finally came the papal efforts to suppress scientific investigation, to warp scientific thinking to fit the Vatican's existing teaching and selfunderstanding and to restrict scholars as much as possible to the humanities in which it had a better chance to influence their attitudes and decisions – just as the secrets of the atom were being uncovered. The gap between the Jewish and Christian communities in matters of scientific initiative were therefore enormous and the concentration of nuclear physics research capacity among Jewish scientists in Germany when Hitler came to power was indeed remarkable. There can be no doubt that if Hitler's sole aim had been German aggrandisement through imperial expansion backed by military capacity he had the scientific expertise within German-speaking Europe to convert that aim to reality.

However the parody of Mein Kampf came into play. The measures which he took to discredit Jewry and everything Jewish as he moved to achieve, through his final solution, what the church had failed to achieve – the elimination of Judaism in all but an historical sense – brought chain reactions which made it impossible for him to achieve either aim. His early measures drove the cream of his scientists out of Germany so that he was left with Germany's second-tier scientists to help achieve his goals. Then those who left Germany were united by a common determination to see that his final solution could not succeed. They were prepared to reject their ties with the country of their birth and to throw their weight into the destruction of Hitler's Third Reich. By the time World War II was declared virtually all of Germany's key Jewish scientists were working in other countries.

But the trouble in the triangle was simmering steadily and Jewish scientists fleeing before Hitler's rage didn't automatically head for the shores of his arch protester, Britain. A few went there and a few went to Scandinavia but the majority went to the United States. They were not welcome, politically, in Britain because of its troubles over Palestine and they were not eager to appear to be supporting its Palestine policies. Neither were they universally welcome, politically, in the United States which was still hung up over its race and religion biased migration laws sponsored by the eugenicists. But at least they were much sought after in university circles where the vision of America was dominated by the benefits of the Wayland-style Protestant Work ethic rather than by eugenics. Information from any source was proper if it helped towards that vision

The dilemmas and the paradox of Albert Einstein's life show just how complex the trouble in the triangle had become. He was born at Ulm on the Danube in March 1879 during the crazy period when Bismarck, having floundered from the height of success to the depth of political uncertainty, was trying to change religious boats in midstream. His anti-Vatican Kulturkampf, set in motion in 1870, had run out of steam by 1878 when he encouraged Adolf Stocker to set up his anti-Semitic Christian Socialist Workingmen's Union. He then signed his concordat with Pope Leo XIII in 1880, received the infamous petition with 255,000 signatures which called for the disenfranchisement of Jews in April 1881, (when Albert was just two years old), and accepted his Vatican knighthood in 1882.

In 1880 the Einstein family moved to Munich after the failure of the small electrical and engineering workshop which Albert's father had operated. No doubt Stocker's C.S.W.U. was a factor in the failure, even though the Einstein's were not strict in their religious observance, and Albert was enrolled at a local Catholic elementary school from the age of five to ten. It does not seem to have bothered him when a teaching sister displayed a nail like the ones from the crucifixion, to discredit the deicidal Jews, nor when the Dreyfus affair caught the limelight in his middle teens. In quick succession his father's business failed a second time (in 1894); the family moved to Milan; Albert was expelled from school for being "a disruptive influence"; he failed a university entrance exam but gained admission to the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology in 1895; and he formally renounced his German nationality in 1896. He applied for Swiss citizenship three or four years later and it was granted in 1901.

Einstein's mathematical brilliance was soon recognized, he was advised to change courses, he gained a diploma and went on to gain his MD in 1905 with a series of three papers which included his Special Theory of Relativity. He wanted to teach but had to take a job as an examiner in the Swiss patents office. However with an unusually probing mind he continued to produce such papers that he was appointed Extraordinary Professor of Theoretical Physics in Prague in 1911, and returned to the Polytechnic as professor of physics in 1912. His fame had spread so rapidly that in 1913 he was appointed to the new post of Director of the Kaiser Wilhelm Research Institute for Physics which was being built in Berlin, even though he detested the spirit and the policies of the emperor and his empire. Although fame was his, domestic happiness was not and when he moved to Berlin the next year he and his wife, married since 1903, separated.

His separation may have led to other issues coming to the fore in his thinking, too. Seeing Berlin's scientific establishment devoting itself to war with hardly a murmur of dissent, Einstein was driven towards a commitment to each of internationalism, pacifism and socialism. He joined the peace movement Bund Neues Vaterland, and reacted in the same way as Karl Barth when the Manifesto of the Ninety Three was published in August 1914. The strain of the conflict between his deep personal commitment to peace, and holding a senior post funded by a military foundation soon showed and he suffered a break down in health in 1917. Then in 1919, with the scars of the Great War showing clearly, he adopted the Zionist cause. He reached a divorce settlement with his wife which he later paid from his Nobel prize money, and he married a cousin, Elsa. When he came to realize that the conduct of the Allies had been as rotten as that of imperial Germany, making it impossible for the republican government to function, he signed a call for "a peace that does not conceal another war."

Einstein, made increasingly aware of his Jewishness during the war, became torn by anti-Semitism in the early 1920's. He had already rejected overtures to use his mass-energy equation to develop explosives, and he became labelled as an intellectual left-wing pacifist Jew. He joined the Republic League; he toured the United States with Weizmann to raise funds on behalf of Keren Hayesod; and he agreed to join the League of Nations International Committee on Intellectual Cooperation. However he resigned in view of threats against him (which were coupled with the rising tide of anti-Semitism) and his anger at the French occupation of the Ruhr. After being honoured with the Nobel Prize for physics he rejoined the League of Nations Commission for a while, only to resign again in protest at the decisions of the League's "disarmament conference."

Drawcard and money-spinner for Zionism that he was, Einstein was certainly not its unqualified asset. He was an enigma. He was an embarrassment to Weizmann at times and his forthright views on religion drew more wrath from Christian churchmen than the most pious traditional Jews with whom they felt at home in debate by comparison. His Zionism was based on an intense awareness of Jewish culture, a dedication to the preservation of its people and a deep respect for its intellectual tradition. But his feelings for Judaism as a faith apparently went little beyond kindly tolerance and the belief that it did no more harm to people than other institutionalized revealed religions. While many of his colleagues saw assimilation as an answer to the problem of survival for Jews, and some of them crossed the baptismal barrier into the church, Einstein stayed with Zionism but against Jewish nationalism. While Weizmann saw a Jewish national home in a political sense, Einstein saw in it only a cultural focal point and he didn't draw back from saying so on the same platform. He understood the position of non-Jewish residents in Palestine and insisted that the first priority of the Zionist movement should be an understanding and agreement with the Arabs.

When Cardinal O'Connell of Boston accused him of being an atheist whose theories cloaked the ghastly apparition of atheism with befogged speculation which produced universal doubt about God and His creation, Einstein responded that he believed in Spinoza's God. God is manifest in all of nature, he said, and belief in a future life is not necessary for ethical behaviour in this one. And Protestant America was rather put out when he said that personal commercial sponsorship was corrupt and was to be rejected absolutely.

In Germany he had to contend with the Nazi propaganda book "One hundred authors against Einstein," published in 1929, as anti-Semitism gathered pace. Then in America he had to contend with the reaction to his view that there were three states of religious development: religion based on fear, religion based on morality, and cosmic religion with neither dogmas nor God made in man's image. That view had been given front page treatment by the New York Times Magazine in November 1930, only weeks before he sailed for his second lecture tour of the United States. It concerned him that his views may be seen as un-American or subversive because an impersonal God, a deterministic universe, a churchless religion, disregard of money and material gains, world government, pacifism and socialism were all generally lumped together and thought of in that way. In fact the belief which underpinned his whole theology was that a rational God stands at the heart of all things and there is therefore no place for discontinuity or chance in the equations of nature. He rejected the notion of a God playing dice with the universe.

Einstein stood firmly with his pacifism in spite of steadily mounting attacks on him by Nazis and anti-Semites on both sides of the Atlantic. He remitted his autograph income to Berlin for the relief of the poor and continued to attack the misuse of science, at least until Hitler came to power on January 30, 1933. In March, less than three months later, his house was ransacked, his bank accounts were confiscated and his books were burned or marked “translated from the Hebrew” while he was still overseas. He began to realize what Hitler’s crony, Kube, had meant when he told the Prussian Diet that “when we clean house the exodus of the Children of Israel will be a child’s game in comparison.” His pacifism rapidly gave way to pragmatism. In July he confirmed that he would never return to Germany and renounced his rights as a German citizen for the second time. He announced that the European situation made pacifism inadequate and that he would save Europe from Hitler with fire bombs, poison gas and bacteria if necessary.

From that point Einstein threw his enormous prestige and personal efforts into the campaign to get a better deal for Jews both within and beyond the British Empire with greater vigour than ever. He visited British Government leaders in July 1933 and a few weeks later told the world that “every sword that is drawn against Germany is now a sword of peace.” A German group promptly put a price of 1,000 pounds Sterling on his head. In January 1934 he was a guest of President Roosevelt overnight at the White House, in March, Congress resolved to grant him the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States, just a day before his name was published in a list of thirty six people deprived of German nationality, and in 1936 the transformation was completed when he took formal United States citizenship.^{57 58 59 60 61 62}

Our awareness of the universe in which we live, and our capacity to exploit the matter of which the universe is composed are much greater because of the work of Albert Einstein. But his work should not only be viewed in that manner. His contribution towards our eventual understanding of creation, and therefore our understanding of humanity’s relationship with God and with every other human being, is no less important. It stands as a beacon in the stormy passage towards that wider understanding. This made his presence a stimulus to the work of those around him and inspired others to want to work within his shadow. It was no idle platitude when one writer compared the impact of Einstein’s move from Berlin to the United States with that of a reigning pope deserting the Vatican for the New World. And it was therefore natural that when refugee Jewish scientists recognized that the Hahn-Strassman achievement in splitting the atom could be used either by Hitler to achieve his final solution or by another power to prevent him from achieving it, they turned to Einstein for help. They asked him to approach the US President with a request that he authorize and finance the development of an atomic bomb as a matter of the highest priority. Their initial approach to the US Navy had already been rejected.

It does not appear to have occurred to Hitler that his capacity to achieve his aims had been greatly undermined when he forced his Jewish physicists out of Germany, but there can be little doubt that the United States could not have produced the atom bomb during World War II without that same group of people. Nor could it have achieved its temporary world dominance in both the arms race and the world economic and social scene.

The welcome which the German Jewish physicists received in America, the decision-in-principle which Roosevelt made to take advantage of their skills to develop atomic bombs (even though the United States had not entered the war against Germany at that time) and the actions which the president took which eventually led the United States to assume the role of principal sponsor of Zionism were important factors in edging the nation into the war and therefore in Hitler's defeat.

Later, after the threat of the final solution had subsided and the whole world became aware of the horrors of the atomic bomb several of the key figures in its development adopted or reverted to pacifism and became strong opponents of the further development of nuclear weapons. But it was too late. The United States liked the idea of being able to stay on top of the economic and political dunghill by virtue of nuclear superiority, and Israel needed its military umbrella. Subsequently Albert Einstein declined nomination for the office of president of Israel. It was a strange twist to the continuing saga of the trouble in the triangle that a new parody – contemporary Zionism in the State of Israel – should grab centre stage from Mein Kampf so smoothly and without most of the people of the amorphous Christian gel realizing that their own conduct had been the basic cause of both of them.

CONFUSION, CHANGE, CONFRONT MISSIONARIES AT TAMBARAM

Against that background of excitement in the scientific world and tension in the political world – but being just as ignorant of the details as the rest of the world due to the conspiracy of silence – Christian missionaries and churchmen gathered late in December 1938 for two weeks for the International Missionary Conference at Tambaram, India. The IMC was the third main thrust of the Ecumenical Movement which had been involved in negotiations towards the establishment of the World Council of Churches, but it was organized quite differently to its sister movements because of the purpose of its programs. Its members were the missionary societies in each country and they accepted that “the International Missionary Council has no meaning except in so far as it is a constant reminder of the Christian obligation to the evangelization of the world” and that within the structure of the new world body “the distinctive service and organization of the IMC should be maintained.”⁶³ The ecumenical movement therefore took a strong step forward when the conference resolved that the IMC should set up a joint working group with the provisional committee of the W.C.C. But it wasn't sitting on its hands waiting for union with the other movements, and its 400 delegates, working in sixteen sections, developed a number of new policies and took a number of initiatives. It could never be claimed that they were unanimous on all issues but they made a valiant effort to make Christianity relevant to the battered, bruised world in which they lived and worked, and, due to the initiative of John R. Mott, the conference was a remarkably representative gathering. Half of the delegates were from the younger churches, as opposed to the older churches of Europe, and half were below the age of 35. Mainstream Protestant mission agencies predominated, but churchmen with views as diverse as Anglo-Catholics, Quakers, high Lutherans and Baptists gathered and worked in amicable fellowship. It was also due to Mott's initiative that the WCC subsequently made a strong effort to take full advantage of "the spiritual gifts which the younger churches were now in a position to offer,"⁶⁴ to involve indigenous churches of countries on all continents, and to avoid reliance on the theologians and hierarchies of the old established churches of Europe.

Vigorous participation by delegates from the African and Latin American continents helped the conference to a shared appreciation of the impact of division between the churches. There were divisions which resulted from different origins in cause, time and place and, as a consequence, different emphasis in their theological understanding. There were differences between those of the 'old world' of Europe and the 'new world' of Africa and Asia, and in this context it was always hard to classify the Americas, North and South, because of their 'melting pot' environment. There were differences resulting from the cultural and philosophical traditions and heritage of countries in which 'young' churches had been planted, such as India and China. And there were differences because each 'young' church tended to have closer links with its parent church in Europe than with neighbouring churches whose links were with other countries or churches in Europe. Those links all led to differences in the mission fields, to separatism – even isolation and antagonism – based on differences in liturgy, organization, status and authority of the clergy, welfare and school building programs, the nature of the evangelical message, and, of course, relations with colonial agencies, diplomats and commercial operations. These issues were encapsulated in a statement by the Co-operation and Unity section of the conference which noted that it was "abundantly clear that the divisions of Christendom were seen in their worst light in the mission fields." There was "disgraceful competition, wasteful overlapping ... (and) ... disunion is both a stumbling block to the faithful and a mockery to those without." This required "honest study of those things in which the churches have differences (and) a widespread teaching of the common church membership in things that make for union ..." It also called for "venturesome sacrifice on the part of all."⁶⁵

The major issue of concern to the delegates at Tambaram were Japan's invasion of China. Although the conspiracy of silence orchestrated from Downing Street ensured that they knew little about the way in which Britain was digging an ever-deeper whole for itself, they were painfully aware of the crisis to their north. Their conference had originally been planned for Hangchow, in China, and the venue had to be changed to Tambaram because of the Japanese invasion. However, in spite of the strain which this caused in relations between Japanese and Chinese delegates they all participated fully in worship and discussion at the conference.⁶⁶ In addition there was the Civil War in Spain; continuing depression in the United States; and Italy's colonial adventure in Ethiopia to which the Vatican had given qualified support – although in a less blatant manner than with Muslim Libya a generation earlier. Pius XI had issued a declaration that wars of conquest were unjust, but the church had made no clear-cut protest. In fact, as already noted, it had sought to take advantage of the adventure to extend papal authority over the Ethiopian Church, as ancient as the papacy itself, which had never previously succumbed. (See chapter 20)⁶⁷ When seen together with all those issues the Jewish question seemed relatively minor. Europe's Jews were not allowed to claim Palestine – the Vatican said so – but Europe's Christians were welcome to countries like Libya and Ethiopia.

Noting that “confusion and change (were) fundamental features” of the time, they recognized that behind them “there is the deeper fact that the dominating social and economic order throughout the world has been organized in such a way that it is difficult for man with his fellowmen to realize the Christian meaning of community where the stewardship of natural resources and the worth of each individual can be realized.”⁶⁸ That showed a remarkable shift in attitude from the churches' absolute resistance to change when Karl Marx had first thrown out his challenge three generations earlier. It drew into focus the consequences of earlier Protestant theologians having thrown their full prestige and influence behind the unrestrained expansion of the Capitalist system in spite of that challenge from Marx. Together with another statement from the conference, it also highlighted the failure of the European Christian reconstruction of the non-European world. An indigenous Church, whether young or old and whether in the East or the West, was, according to the conference, one which was rooted in obedience to Christ and spontaneously used forms of thought and modes of action natural and familiar in its own environment. Such churches, it said, arose in response to Christ's own call.⁶⁹ So much for fixed liturgies tied to evolved doctrine and dogma with “bread and wine in a yams and coconut community.”⁷⁰

The conference also helped to move the churches forward in their self-understanding. No claim was made implying that the church was the exclusive representative of God on earth endowed with all of God's authority. The preface to its report indicated that the church's work of priestly, pastoral and prophetic ministry was animated by the life of the risen and ascended Christ who is at once the great High Priest, the Chief Shepherd of Souls, and the eternal word of God. This ministry is committed to the church as a function of the whole body of Christ and “from the time of the Apostles there have been special orders and ministries of the church, given by God, for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the Body of Christ.”⁷¹

That was another strong breath of fresh air, but unfortunately not much progress had been made on the interfaith issue since the 1928 Jerusalem conference. Non-Christian faiths were acknowledged as having “values of deep religious experience” but it was noted that “Christians are not agreed ... whether ... as total systems of thought and life (they) may be regarded as in some sense or to some degree manifesting God's revelation.”⁷² And there had been quite a lot of pain and debate before the conference reached even that position. To assist missionary agencies and churches to think through the issues of working together rather than in competition in a multi-faith environment, Professor Hendrick Kraemer, a specialist in comparative religion, had been commissioned to write a book, The Christian Message in a non-Christian World, for study by delegates before the conference. Kraemer maintained that Christianity was the product of “Biblical realism” while other religions were the products of a human “religious approach.”⁷³ Such a statement may have reasonably described those faiths which were founded and evolved without contact with the Biblical or the Messianic experience. However it was an unfortunate reflection on both Judaism, the primary source of the Bible and the community from which the early Christians broke away, and Islam, the inspiration for which was certainly Biblical and Messianic, and it tended to polarize opinion in the manner just noted. The delegates and their agencies were no closer to agreement on a common Messianic understanding. They simply proceeded on the basis of “expectant evangelism” and “mutual trust and common loyalty to Christ.”⁷⁴

Hitler’s parody could never be far from delegate’s minds, even if they didn’t think of it that way, but occasionally it intruded directly into debate, such as when the life of the church was under scrutiny. The German delegation called for “distinct orders of sex and family, nation and race (which) in the period of transition between Christ’s resurrection and his Second Advent” should not be dissolved.⁷⁵ It was an ill-disguised attempt to steer the conference into de facto recognition of Hitler’s Jewish program, and both the parody and the facts of life on which it was based show clearly in the rejection of that call and the adoption of “the new order” to which the conference believed mankind was called through the Gospel. Because each human being is a person for whom Christ died there cannot properly be discrimination on account of race, culture, social status or sex, it said. On that basis mankind is one and the unit of cooperation must be the human race. There were under-developed classes and races, it said, but *every person has infinite possibilities. There are none permanently superior or inferior. All men do not have the same abilities but they should have equality of opportunity. And since economic means can purchase opportunity, there can be no equality of opportunity without a redistribution of the world’s economic goods.*⁷⁶ [Emphasis added.] Marx would have been proud of the church. Perhaps if it had been pushing that line ever since urbanization became general across Europe, Marx may never have had to throw down his challenge. Perhaps ‘Munich’ may never have happened. Perhaps ...

But back to the major issue of concern to the delegates: China. They knew that by the time Britain’s Prime Minister Chamberlain had flown to Munich to placate Hitler with the gift of a few pieces of Czechoslovakia, China was effectively divided into three areas of influence. A puppet regime controlled one area on behalf of Japan; Chiang Kai-shek controlled so-called “free China” from his new headquarters at Chungking; and the vast poverty-stricken hinterland was being organized by the Chinese Communist Party. But in addition there was “independent” Manchuria which had been the subject of the dispute trumped up to launch Japan’s bid for an empire which, it hoped, would free it from Western Christian domination and influence. That was a matter of real concern.

New Year’s Day 1939 came and passed, but it was a working holiday for Craigie. He proposed that the Western Powers should unite in refusing to purchase any more gold from Japan, warning that the question was no longer merely one of protecting particular trade or investments in China but of “preventing, while there is time, the formation in East Asia of a valid and economic entity which may have serious repercussions on credit of every category of power.”⁷⁷ In one simple sentence he proved all of Japan’s complaints about European trading and political policy in Asia to be correct and, in particular, Arita’s view of British practice and intentions to keep Asia in economic bondage. Britain could have its economic bloc, but Asia and Japan were not to be permitted the same privilege.

Roosevelt opened his New Year preparing for his State of the Union address on January 4. He had already shown his sympathies for Hitler's opponents during the closing months of 1938 when he willingly cooperated with a French mission which sought discussions on the purchase of aircraft and supporting equipment and then designated Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau Jr. to coordinate aid to the Western Allies.⁷⁸ However he was in a dilemma. He was 'locked in' by the Neutrality Act and by the strength of public opinion, and any aid was supposed to be strictly within the letter of the law. He now made a tentative move to change the situation and used his State of the Union address to show his impatience with the existing Neutrality Act which, he said, might be of aid to an aggressor. He suggested that there were methods "short of War" which could make it clear that America would not stop with a mere verbal condemnation of such nations.

But in the West, Schacht's plan to provide a 'soft landing' for Germany's remaining Jews had struck opposition on all fronts and this made settlement of the Jewish Question 'short of war' less and less likely. The plan ran counter to revived plans for a boycott of German goods which were again gathering momentum. Jewish communities feared it would aggravate widespread anti-Semitic claims of a worldwide financial network under Jewish control and they therefore sought to have their governments implement the plan instead of Jewish community organizations or the Jewish Agency. But not even the expulsion of the Polish Jews or Crystal Night had been enough to soften the hearts of Western Christian governments, and apart from not wanting to help the Jews or to be seen to pander to them, those governments would do nothing which appeared to strengthen Germany's economy or give it a trade advantage. Germany's Jews objected to it as "an ill-disguised plunder of Jewish property." And finally, the German government: it was divided between those who were prepared to support the scheme (including, for a time, both Hitler and Goering) and those who opposed anything which appeared to give Jews an advantage or raise their influence in the international arena, such as Ribbentrop.

Schacht was removed from his position as president of the Reichsbank on January 20, 1939. [Goering subsequently turned against the Schacht Plan also but, in spite of that, negotiations continued through the Inter-governmental Committee, somewhat sporadically, until a charter was actually drawn up and published in July. By that stage it was being overtaken by events and nothing ever came of it.⁷⁹] Next day, January 21, with the Schacht Plan apparently scrapped, Hitler announced that he could not guarantee the security of Czechoslovakia any longer unless all Jews were expelled. He told the Czech foreign minister that "This vermin must be destroyed. The Jews are our sworn enemies and at the end of this year there will not be a Jew left in Germany." The day of reckoning had come, he said, and they were not going to get away with what they had done in November 1918. On the same day, after he had personally "ordered that it be transmitted without delay," the draft encyclical against racism and anti-Semitism was finally delivered to the ailing pontiff, Pius XI.⁸⁰

In the United States confidence in its seemingly unassailable national security – smug security – on the basis of its grand isolation, its extraordinary resources and its neutrality was beginning to weaken. Unease began to surface, at least among the well informed, as a result of the ease with which Japan was able to challenge China. And although the ‘unification’ of Germany and Austria appeared logical and there was widespread support for Hitler’s philosophy and his ambitions for his people, the expansion of Nazi Germany was of steadily growing concern. The pressure which Hitler was exerting on Czechoslovakia, the Munich crisis and the ease with which he violated the Munich Agreement without any real opposition from the other signatories convinced Roosevelt that neutrality could prove dangerous. It had become quite apparent that in the event of a war with Germany, the Western European democracies would have to buy arms and borrow large sums of money from the United States if they were to survive. If they could not, and if they did not survive, then the US would have to contend with an entire continent under despotic totalitarian government. The problem was how and when arms and adequate funds could be arranged.⁸¹

Then, on January 23, 1939, the issue of America’s relations with the European powers and arms supplies became more real in the public mind when an American bomber crashed on a test flight with French Air Ministry officials on board and Roosevelt had to state publicly that he had personally given permission for the sale of the aircraft.⁸²

By that time the refugee dilemma had become very acute indeed. Hoards of refugees from the occupied territories, including thousands of Jews, were banked up on the border of what remained of Czechoslovakia. The Czechoslovak government simply refused to admit them. It took the view that as Britain and France had forced it into its predicament they should help solve its problems. Czechoslovakia would allow its former citizens transit if other countries would provide them with visas. But as already noted, none would, in substantial numbers. Britain agreed to advance a loan of 10 million pounds Sterling to Czechoslovakia, basically to assist it in resettlement within Czechoslovakia of refugees from the areas surrendered to Germany and for associated costs, but not for settlement in Britain or Palestine. On January 24, Hermann Goering, to whom Hitler had delegated responsibility for the Jewish program, instructed Reinhard Heydrich to take all measures necessary for the enforced emigration of all Jews from Germany.⁸³

A German Foreign Ministry circular to all diplomatic and consular missions made the policy of total expulsion official and not just a point in Hitler’s debating armoury. “The ultimate aim of Germany’s Jewish policy is the emigration of all Jews living on German territories,” it said. The resistance of other countries such as America, France, Holland and Norway to accept even the 100,000 Jews who had left Germany since 1933 had grown to a ground swell of anti-Semitism with nations hermetically sealing their borders and this confirmed the validity of shipping out Jews en masse. The goal of German policy, it continued, “will be an international solution of the Jewish question in the future, not dictated by false sympathy for the ‘Jewish religious minority which has been expelled,’ but by the mature realization by all peoples of the danger which the Jews represent for the racial preservation of the nations.”⁸⁴ It could well have been compiled from the pages of the Jesuit press, from eugenics handbooks, or from a selection of both, with United States immigration laws and Britain's program for Palestine used as its models. As a first step thousands were promptly rounded up and incarcerated in concentration camps at Dachau, Buchenwald and Mauthausen.

In what can only be interpreted as a desperation bid to soften the impact of further expulsions from the occupied territories into the rump of Czechoslovakia, a joint Anglo-French programme of 16 million pounds Sterling financial assistance for Czechoslovakia was agreed to (presumably additional to 10 million pounds Sterling which had already been provided) but it was not immediately put into effect.⁸⁵

THE ANTI-COMINTERN PACT ADAPTS TO NEW NEEDS

As 1938 drew to a close Ribbentrop sought to broaden the three-power pact between Germany, Japan and Italy from its Anti-Comintern focus to a military alliance directed against any fourth power. Italy approved of the proposal but Japan was cautious. It advised its partners that certain imports essential for its operations in the Sino-Japanese war might be prejudiced by the conclusion of such a pact and that "in this respect, Japan's relations with England and America are necessarily different to those of Germany and Italy at the present time." The interception of a telegram with that advice from Arita to Japan's ambassador in Germany by Britain's 'Blue Jacket' diplomatic intelligence decrypting service on January 26, 1939, strengthened Britain's hand considerably. A second telegram was intercepted three days later, indicating that Japanese ministers planned to provide their own draft treaty rather than the draft prepared by Ribbentrop and that this would be carried to Europe by a special envoy in the latter half of February.⁸⁶ Britain's efforts turned to driving a wedge between Japan and its two European treaty partners.

Then, with the German Foreign Ministry circular hardly out of the diplomatic mail bag, Hitler again vented his spleen against world Jewry in general, against the Jews of Vienna and against Jewish international financiers in particular in his infamous speech to the Reichstag on January 30. He referred to his previous 'prophecies' that he would take over the leadership of the state and settle the Jewish problem at which the Jews laughter was "uproarious" and then said: "... but I think that for some time now they have been laughing out of the other side of their face. Today I will once again be a prophet: if the international Jewish financiers in and outside Europe should again succeed in plunging the nations into a world war, the result will not be the Bolshevization of the globe and thus the victory for Jewry but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."⁸⁷

The "gloomy apprehensions" triggered by Hitler's prophecies and the rapidly deteriorating world situation did not prevent the provisional committee of the WCC from meeting in an atmosphere of goodwill and fraternal understanding in the room in which Louis XIV had been born at St. Germain-en-Laye, Paris, over the next few days.⁸⁸ It decided that "in spite of the political tension and the menace of war" it would plan for the first assembly of the World Council in August 1941 and, in response to the decisions taken at Tambaram a few weeks earlier, it established a joint committee of the WCC and the IMC. It also resolved to keep the Vatican informed of progress in establishing the World Council and to invite cooperation and consultation in matters of common interest.⁸⁹ That decision was certainly not taken lightly because many Protestant churches regarded the Church of Rome as having departed so far from the Gospel that it deserved only “resolute and uncompromising opposition” and they objected to any approaches to the Vatican by the Ecumenical Movement. However Archbishop Temple proceeded to draft a letter of invitation to be addressed to the Vatican Secretary of State.

Chamberlain visited Mussolini in Rome early in February during preparations for the opening of the Round Table Conference on Palestine. No doubt the Jewish question and the PM’s bid to get the Duce’s support for Britain’s Palestine policy were high on their agenda and we can assume that British officials accompanying the PM also called on the Vatican. The British press contingent which travelled with the PM was accorded lavish hospitality which encouraged the spate of pro-Mussolini publicity which both the dictator and Chamberlain were looking for.⁹⁰ However not everyone would have been impressed and Hitler’s Crystal Night and Italy’s new anti-Jewish regulations were still a vivid memory for many of the participants when some of the world’s leading physicists met for the Fifth Washington Conference of Theoretical Physics at the same time that Chamberlain, having returned from Rome, was welcoming delegates to that emergency Round Table Conference on February 7.

During the night of February 9 Pope Pius XI died after what has been described as a prolonged period of suspended animation in the Vatican. During the final stages of his illness he got “only what others want him to get” and although he was supposed to be still in “good psychological condition” in spite of a series of heart attacks, the last of which was the cause of death, he was not able to do much on his own.⁹¹ It was in such circumstances that the draft encyclical Humani Generis Unitas had finally reached him nineteen days earlier when he was apparently in no condition to do any serious work on it, even if he had been eager to do so. Strangely enough, the draft encyclical, and the text of an address which had been prepared for Pius XI to deliver to the Italian bishops next day to mark the tenth anniversary of the Lateran accords, “disappeared” from the pope’s desk almost immediately, in circumstances of intrigue.⁹² The tactics which had been used to delay publication of Pius’ planned encyclical against racism and anti-Semitism had proved effective. When the draft was rediscovered some years later, Vatican authorities were very evasive in explaining its disappearance. They said only that the texts were “transmitted to Pius XI by the then Superior General of the Society of Jesus, W. Ledochowski, at the end of 1938 or the beginning of 1939” and that they “cannot be considered a true pontifical document, but at most the draft, requiring many revisions and redevelopments, of a future encyclical.”⁹³ Exactly when the draft reached the pope’s desk remained a matter of conjecture until the note from Fr. Abbott was disclosed. However the matter of how it reached his desk is still a matter of conjecture. As already noted, Fr. Rosa, to whom Ledochowski had referred it, had died on November 26, the day the British government announced that the partition of Israel would not proceed, some ten weeks before Abbott said it arrived on the pope’s desk. In all probability Rosa had not read it either and he certainly did not deliver it to the pope. Who was holding it from the time of Rosa's death to its delivery to the ailing pope, and why?

To suggest that clumsy presentation or the need for further revision justified the subsequent decision not to complete and publish the encyclical begs the question. When the church's leadership on the Jewish Question was needed more desperately than ever before, it was pigeon-holed in the Vatican. The unpublished draft was certainly not without its blemishes and the influence of the co-authors whom Ledochowski had nominated to muzzle LaFarge is quite clear, but the fact that the pope had ordered the preparation of Humani Generis Unitas was an enormous leap forward. The publication of an appropriate encyclical at that critical time could have been a restraining influence on Hitler and it certainly would have strengthened the opposition against him. But those who were either opposed to softening the Vatican line on Jews and Judaism or who considered that to raise the issue of anti-Semitism "could put 'peace' in danger" had won the day.⁹⁴ Their idea of "peace" was security for the re-established papal state and Vatican self-understanding. Their fear was that to raise the Jewish Question at a time when the Italian government had adopted a hard line in cooperation with Hitler, and so soon after the "Roman Question" had been resolved in favour of the Roman Catholic Church, would undermine relations between the Vatican and the governments of both countries and prejudice not only the two concordats but the Lateran Treaty as well. Of course they should not have worried. It was, after all, Pius XI himself who had said, when the Lateran Treaty was signed: "We are persuaded that We have given God back to Italy, and Italy to God," and that future dangers to the sovereignty of the papal state could only be hypothetical and "(such dangers) are certainly never more unlikely than today." (See chapter 17)

However the *Hidden Encyclical*⁹⁵ is of such importance that it must be considered closely. From close examination of the authors' styles and the thrust of their previous writings it has been suggested that the first 76 paragraphs of the 179 paragraph work were "inspired by Gundlach" and that the balance "probably resulted from discussions and compromises among the three writers" and it is difficult to establish what contribution was made by the third writer, Desbuquois.⁹⁶ The signs of compromise, or even conflict of views, are quite clear in the later sections. This suggests that although it was LaFarge who was instructed by Pius XI to prepare the encyclical, with free rein to express progressive views, it was Gundlach, probably strongly influenced by Ledochowski, whose approach dominated the completed draft. In fact Passelecq & Suchecky say that the work was "written in a speculative, theoretical, and laborious style that more resembled Gundlach's manner of thinking than LaFarge's"⁹⁷ and this is supported by the statement attributed to the person appointed to translate the draft into Latin, Fr. Heinrich Bacht, S.J., that "Gundlach wrote the larger part of the draft, whereas LaFarge wrote most of the key sections on racism and anti-Semitism."⁹⁸

THE HIDDEN ENCYCLICAL

The opening paragraphs of Humani Generis Unitas are an unusually bold, frank and direct confrontation of the philosophies, policies and practices of not only Hitler and Mussolini but also Britain, the United States, each of the European imperial powers and their colonial settlers and administrations, the Communist powers, and much of the non-European world as well.

The unity of the human race has been forgotten, so to speak, because of the disorder in contemporary social life, in relationships among individuals as well as in relations among groups and nations. This disorder is found in factual reality, but it is still more evident in people's minds. That this is so is clearly shown by the variety of remedies proposed for curing the illness.

In one place we find rigid doctrinaires proclaiming the sovereign value of the unity of the nation, in another a leader rousing people's souls by an intoxicating appeal to the unity of the race; whereas Eastern Europe throws out to the whole world the promise, tinged with terror and blood, of a new humanity in the unity of the proletariat.

To the often incompatible demands of these various collectivities – nation, race and class – we must add the obligations imposed, in the name of the unity of the state, on the political community proper.

However the breadth of its generalities concealed the fact that without it being intended as such, that paragraph was a sweeping contradiction of the teachings of the Catholic Church ever since it adopted the Athanasian Creed (see chapters 2 & 3); all of the teachings of each of the churches which subsequently flowed from that creed; and the destructive attitudes and policies which resulted when those teachings merged with a misunderstanding of the work of Darwin, the evolving Protestant work ethic and the social policies of both the Colonial era and the industrial revolution in the nineteenth century to form the amorphous Christian gel. (See chapter 15). It was dynamite!

The writer(s) proclaimed that “the church has a duty to speak to the world” without realizing that its ‘speaking’ was fundamental to the crises noted in clause 1, then claimed that “her purpose is to remind so-called purely human wisdom, which has gone astray, of God's Wisdom” and “she does not engage in ‘politics’”! Its teaching mission and its ‘continual intervention in matters that concern social life’ were a sacred pastoral responsibility entrusted by “her divine Founder,” subject only to the rules of the Gospel “of which the Church is the guardian and interpreter,” and these responsibilities concerned “not only the immediate or mediate content of Christian revelation, but also everything required to enlighten and direct consciences in everyday life.” She was “a supernatural society of souls (which) provides the world with an example of a unique community: the most unified, most ample, most durable social reality on earth.” That was a plug for authority that went well beyond the limits of any concordat and made absolutely no allowance for any social teaching role of any other faith, especially Judaism which the church claimed – in spite of its demonstrated greater ‘durability’ – was superseded by Christian revelation.⁹⁹

Then there was a remarkable admission that the church was responsible for the nature of the amorphous Christian gel in an arrogant statement which was intended to show the superiority of the West over the rest of the world. “Whether or not they are aware of it, civilized peoples in the West still live by the teaching and principles with which the Church, acting like a true mother, endowed them in the past; and in turn they have transmitted this teaching and these principles to other peoples all over the world. Thus the Church is fully justified – not only by her nature and proper function, but also by her actions in history – in considering herself the true principle of life for human society ...” [Emphasis added.] ¹⁰⁰ Having claimed that authority and that level of influence the Vatican could never again distance itself from the crises caused by the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel once that clause was in the public arena, whether by deliberate announcement or, as happened, by default. That clause simply encapsulated what the church had been claiming in various ways throughout its sordid history.

This was followed by an analysis of the nature of human society which attempted to put the blame on everyone else for the disunity in the church and in society. In particular it offset “the conclusions of sound philosophy and the teachings of Christian Revelation” against “the erroneous theses of materialist or positivist philosophy,” which, in the circumstances of the day and in the light of much material published by the church press, would have been interpreted as an attack on Jewish influence and Marxism jointly. That led into a statement that the state “is in fact the institution best suited to resort to external constraint in the interest of order, and moreover this preserves its God-given spiritual and moral character.” Although that statement sat very uncomfortably alongside criticism of various forms of “the state,” the Communist Soviet authorities would have agreed with the first part of it, up to the point about its spiritual and moral character being “God-given,” and Hitler would have agreed with every word of it. The specific reference to Christian Revelation guiding man’s drive towards unity rather than the totality of Biblical Revelation had the effect of excluding Jewish Revelation at the very time that the Vatican was defending the study of the Old Testament in German schools against Nazi attacks because it was a means of showing that Christianity was the successor to Judaism. ¹⁰¹ Hitler would have been delighted!

He might not have been so delighted at the use of the story of the Tower of Babel to illustrate the point that a profession of nationality through a single language expressed only “a deceptive unity” but his smile would have returned when he read that “humanity can remain united only insofar as it takes its inspiration from the Holy Spirit, obeys its laws, and determines its goals and the hierarchy of its values in accord with it.”¹⁰² That was a distinct compliment to Hitler and Mussolini for having concluded concordats.

There was a similar thrust in the next few clauses which referred to the monotonous uniformity and depersonalization of human life with ordinary man in constant danger of being caught up and carried away by blind mass movements without a will of his own, with his enthusiasm for a cause raised or his opposition to it inflamed by incessant and insistent propaganda from the press, radio, movies and public meetings. These things were set against “the energy and material resources that are spent today on educating young people and adults in order to make them worthy of being called men.” We are left to assume that church meetings and services were in some way different to other public meetings and that they were purely educational, with absolutely no component of propaganda. But even if he lacks a full education “the true Christian stands as straight and strong as a tower” with faith, in union with God, with the Spirit of Truth and Order, solidity of character and calm assurance of the soul. And if the evolutionary factors (discussed earlier in the encyclical) were all to come together “the values we admire in rare men who bear the plain stamp of the Christian ... would then be every man’s lot ...”¹⁰³ Those clauses were clearly intended to establish that the only solution to the world’s problems was “true Christianity” in cahoots with appropriate governments. Those who wished could read the criticisms as applying to the excesses of totalitarian government while those who wished could read them as applying to the excesses of Capitalism, but in any case there was no place for Jews.

Then came an attack on all of the “desperate, not to say fierce efforts” at maintaining the genuine unity within humanity, except through the Catholic Church, since the Great War. The language of attack encompassed Western-style cooperation through systems such as the League of Nations, Communism, National Socialism and Fascism, and even the Ecumenical Movement. Efforts to put these various incompatible formulae into practice, it said, “inevitably further increased the division among men and within humanity ... and drove men into different, violently opposed camps ... minimizing that (concrete) unity by opposing it to other concrete realities, for example race, nation, or class ...” The unity of the human race is known through both reason and Divine Revelation, with “human nature identical in all men and in all times ... founded on the supernatural truth of the Redemption, just as it is presupposed by the very fact of original sin, and found in the supernatural relation of all men to their Redeemer, Jesus Christ.” But it was “slipping towards an interior rupture.”¹⁰⁴

There was some discussion that the essential duty of the state was to ensure the equality of rights for all citizens without exception; economic collectivism, with condemnation of any system of communal occupation of land such as Kibbutim or the numerous systems of land tenure in non-Western countries which did not recognize that absolute private ownership of land was “founded on natural law”; and invasive foreign policies which imperil the unity of the human race. Special reference to the deprivation of human liberty under Marxism which was “utterly incapable of establishing any form of human unity” followed, of course. There was the usual underlying arrogant assumption of the correctness of imposing the values of the amorphous Christian gel on the entire world and a note that “affirmation of human personality ... is as old as the creation of man, as old as the redemptive mystery of the redemptive sacrifice on Golgotha, and therefore as old as the supernatural link uniting human personality with the One God in Three Persons, through the Sacrament of Baptism.” In that fantastic compression of the human time capsule there was, yet again, the implicit exclusion of the Jews from both the unity of humanity and redemption because of their rejection of the church’s interpretation of the Christian experience and their association with Marxism.¹⁰⁵

The author(s) of Humani Generis Unitas then turned to the question of authority. The dignity of the human person was established, they said, by the fact that “human authority in itself is derived from God (and) by assigning it this lofty origin, one strongly emphasizes the dignity of the human person.” They skirted around the church’s well trodden definition of the divine right of kings, saying that human authority entails relationships of subordination between one man and another, spiritual and moral, and that these relationships can be grasped “only in the exercise of God’s own authority, communicated by God to man.” However the legitimacy or illegitimacy of any action taken by a sovereign power on the basis of that authority could not be established on the basis of the common good of the social system “but must be solidly based on their full accord with Divine moral law” – as conveyed and interpreted by the sole representative of the Triune God on earth, of course. They then criticized the measures which had been introduced in Italy progressively during July to September in much the manner of the Jesuit press attacks on the ‘Manifesto of the Italian Race’ in August 1938. (See chapter 21). In particular they referred to “the sanctity of home and hearth” being violated when “the freedom to marry, to educate children, and even the practice of conjugal rights is limited, with no authorization and in direct connection with the interests of the national, racial, or proletarian collectivity,” thus depriving individuals of the right to decide in accord with their consciences and in contradiction of “the immutable truth that all human authority proceeds from God.”¹⁰⁶ [Emphasis added.] Their main concern, consistent with the long running Roman theme, was the authority of the Vatican.

That theme continued: “we Christians are still more firmly convinced that true unity among men can only come from the spirit, inspired by the uncreated Spirit whose Divine Person has been poured ‘into the hearts’ in ‘mysterious fullness,’ and who at the birth of the Church made all Christians ‘of one heart and mind,’ achieving the miracle of making it once again possible for all the representatives of the most diverse peoples to communicate in a single and unique language. This Spirit is the spirit of unity, since He Himself is the love of the triune God in all its fullness. Wherever He is poured forth, there unity is poured forth ... (and) a unity of (humanity) is possible only by virtue of the spirit that produces it.” Then, in a radical contradiction of the obligatory Oath Against the Errors of Modernism which Pius X had imposed in 1910 and which was still very much in force (chapter 16) they drew on science to confirm the Old Testament teaching of human unity from the point of creation. However they then highlighted the division from the time of Christ by referring to the “unifying stream of bodily life – the blood stream ... in which all men are plunged ... by virtue of a formal decree of God ... (because of which) ... the melancholy heritage of original sin would not be passed down through the generations.” Moreover, deliverance from the bonds of original sin could be accomplished only through the Redeemer, Jesus Christ ... and “what was not assumed by Him was not healed.” However it was “sad to observe that there are men who still want to be Christians, at least in name, who do not admit this mystery of the blood ... (and who) ... grossly exaggerate the role of accidental and in any case very superficial accidents of blood and blood relationships in the formation of social groups larger than the family.” In opposition to the Catholic faith “they absolutely reject the unity of the human race and seek to erect insurmountable barriers between the different communities of blood and race.”¹⁰⁷ [Emphasis added.] In those lines lay a massive challenge to – or a vigorous repudiation of – the Jewish people, coupled with a provocative reference to the Reformers who reject Catholic teaching on transubstantiation, and tempered by a less vigorous repudiation of Nazi philosophy. Nazi attitudes were simply a matter of mere ‘sadness.’ The world was to be told that the Jews could not be delivered from the bonds of original sin, so what did it really matter if the Nazis did build an insurmountable barrier between them and the redeemed? But that was not all. Those lines also imply that rejection of the church’s doctrine equates to the rejection of the unity of humanity: a totally insupportable position.

If Pius XI was looking for a genuinely new direction in race and interfaith relations – and there is every reason to believe that he was – he would have been deeply disappointed by what he read. It is fair to conclude that he was deeply disturbed by the re-presentation of exactly the same line that the Vatican had been peddling for a very long time and even during the months since he issued his instruction for the Jesuit press to cease its attacks on the Jewish community. His instructions to LaFarge had been totally circumvented. In his situation, to whom could he turn? Those around him who were supposed to be supporting him were clearly on a completely different wave length. It is therefore also reasonable to conclude that the reason it was on his desk when he died three weeks after it was finally delivered to him was not that he had yet to read and consider it, but that he would not order its publication in the form in which he received it and he was not then in a position to rework it himself or to order its revision by those around him. This was hardly the prescription which a doctor would write for an elderly patient struggling in the middle of a series of heart attacks. The world would simply have to struggle on with no change in the dominant Christian attitudes towards the Jewish question and the Nazi-Fascist policies. The parody of Mein Kampf was certainly not being understood.

But we have not yet considered all of the draft encyclical and there is much worse to come. That first portion was apparently the sole work of Gundlach. The larger portion – the portion dealing with practical issues – is considered to be the merged work of both LaFarge and Gundlach with possible contributions from Desbuquois also. It begins with a distinct change of style and there are signs of a struggle to accommodate the first portion and the actual position being adopted by the Vatican, to what Pius XI had asked of LaFarge. It was certainly a struggle.

The ‘merged’ portion opens with a statement that God entered human history “when the fullness of time was realized” through the incarnation of His Son when God became man and entered the temporal life of men living together, not as a stranger but as a member of the family. It was another rejection of the Jews and reinforced the concept of change at the time of Christ. It then proceeds to lament the contemporary condition of church-state relations. The church “finds herself here in accord with all types of society (and) both internally and positively, with nations” since by their nature “they are all rooted in history, in tradition, in the temporality of our social life,” they said. “If there are state-systems that call themselves Catholic because they are based on a dynasty or a crown anointed by the church, this is the result of a historical encounter with the Church that was not merely a positive fact, as in the case of other nations, but also a religious fact.” That statement was true as far as it went, but it was an understatement amounting to misrepresentation of the gross politicking for power and authority by the church during that ‘historical encounter.’ Then: “in the view of the Church and of these states history was and is above all, since the incarnation of the Son of God, the history of God and of the work of His grace.” No one could say the church was trying to conceal its self-understanding and its claim to be the sole representative of the triune God on earth in succession to the failed and rejected Jews. And: “what a lamentable decline resulted from the misuse or waste of special graces given to the community, when this consciousness (of a magnificent, profound, and fruitful unity) on the state’s part evaporated, and the state’s Catholicism became merely a political formula used by the rulers.”¹⁰⁸ [Emphasis added.] That was a pathetic claim to make about the effect of the collapse of the Holy Roman Empire and an equally pathetic admission about the nature of the Vatican’s concordats.

After stating the “natural right” of “the human person” to use the external goods of the earth the authors qualified that right by a statement which would have warmed the heart of every Western Christian Capitalist: “the exercise of this right must be constrained by the institution of private property.” Then there was a restatement of the church’s position on the waste of war, personal squander, and labour and work before a return to church-state authority in civil matters. Christ, “The Man-God himself consented to enter” the sanctified matrimonial community and then raised the marriage contract between man and woman “to the dignity of a sacrament.” Pursuing the church’s claim that the state held only subordinate authority in such matters, they said “its authority also proceeds from God, and that person who holds that authority is acting as a ‘servant of God’ ... (and) ... it is naturally also not the fault of the Church, if the majority of present-day states rarely or never agree to recognize overtly the religious character of the state’s constitution, or even completely deny it.” And concerning “the domain of the state’s activity, salvation must first be sought in this direction: the Church must return to her essential functions (and) ... she will ensure the proper development of the social organizations that are constituted, ... not derived from the state, to govern themselves, and normally must be recognized by public law.”¹⁰⁹

Then the draft turned to Realpolitik. Concerning the threat of a breakdown in relations between stronger and weaker states it said: “We, who through Our God-given office are the father of all men, do not wish and must not allow this to happen.” It proposed the establishment of a Court of Justice which would make internationally binding decisions on the basis of principles laid down by “eminent Church doctors such as Saint Augustine, Saint Thomas Aquinas, and Saint Robert Bellarmine,¹¹⁰ and great theologians such as Francis of Vitoria¹¹¹ and Francis Suarez”¹¹² to give visible expression to the fraternal unity of peoples.¹¹³ That proposal can be seen as an attempt to establish a system of international mediation and judgement such as was set up a few years later and, if that was the case, it was indeed a far-sighted initiative which would do the Vatican much credit at the same time that it actually weakened its capacity to intervene directly with governments and to exercise coercive influence over them. On the other hand it can also be seen as a bid to intervene directly in current political crises and controversies and because that passage is soon followed by: “Christians must not allow themselves to fall into the kind of humanitarianism found in all the possible forms of an internationalism that mixes and confuses all sorts of things and peoples,” it must, unfortunately, be taken to refer to Germany and Czechoslovakia, and as a bid to intervene directly to influence the pathetic defensive and self-interested Munich negotiations in which Britain and France were engaged at the time that it was drafted. If that was the case, then considering the writings of the ‘eminent Church doctors and great theologians’ whose work was to guide it, and the Vatican’s concordat with Germany, Hitler would have been delighted and it would have augured badly for both Czechoslovakia and the Jewish community.

We can assume that it was drafted and redrafted during August-September 1938 and that it was completed before LaFarge arrived in Rome to deliver the final draft towards the end of September. We know that LaFarge listened in horror to Hitler’s broadcast on September 26, together with his Jesuit colleagues in Rome; that Chamberlain had flown to Munich on September 29 after the mobilization of the fleet for his torrid meeting with Hitler; that the Munich Agreement was signed on September 30; and that Hitler occupied the Sudetenland on October 1 – the same day that LaFarge left Rome for New York. [See chapter 21, p. 45.] We do not know and – unless relevant documents come to light from sources such as the Vatican archives – we seem to have no way of knowing whether LaFarge made any additions or amendments to these key clauses after his arrival in Rome while he was making the final draft of ‘the Authentic and complete (French) text’ presentable for delivery to Ledochowski, and, in particular, whether he made any changes between listening to Hitler on the 26th and leaving for America on the 1st.

However that passage is qualified immediately: “The reason [why Christians must not fall into humanitarianism that mixes and confuses all sorts of people] is that humanity assuredly constitutes a genuine unity, but a unity within a self-ordered plurality ... (and) ... humanity finds its origin and mode of development ... in the Holy Spirit, which cannot produce, approve, and sanctify a social life in which there is neither order nor unity in plurality.” This passage has a substantially different thrust to the first portion of the encyclical and the passages immediately before it, especially when read together with the passage which followed: “Saint Augustine calls upon the Holy Spirit to establish the foundation of relationships within humanity, among persons and among groups ... (and) ... exclaims: ‘it is certain that we are not obliged to provide all things to everyone, but we are obliged to love everyone, and injustice toward anyone is unacceptable.’”¹¹⁴ [Emphasis added.] That is the thrust of LaFarge’s earlier work which caught the attention of Pius XI and led him to commission the American to write an encyclical against racism and anti-Semitism and it is an excellent illustration of the confusion in the second portion of the encyclical.

After that flash of inspiration the writers moved back to provocative statements about the formation of groups, the processes of “particularization, separation (and) differentiation” which were understood because “unaided reason declares it and Christian revelation teaches it very firmly.” They then set out criteria which define, firstly, “the falsity of human groupings” and, secondly, “a justifiable group.” A false group, they said, “by the way it is established and its members bonded, suppresses and destroys the inviolable source of humanity itself ... pursues goals and proclaims values that contradict objective goals ... claims for its own advantage, an extensive totality (and) because of its own goal and the value it attributes to itself ... makes a mockery of the fundamental structure of humanity ...” It can be argued that this description of a false group was intended to relate to later clauses which dealt with the manipulated absorption of one population into another – especially the piecemeal absorption of Czechoslovakia into Germany – but if that is the case the choice of words was most unfortunate because the “doctrinal points” listed bore a remarkable similarity to points which had been used over a very long period to describe the Jewish community. A justifiable group, on the other hand, “will bear fruit for humanity as a whole ... (show) fecundity ... by a certain characteristic vigour ... consistency and solidity ... realizes the general objective goals of humanity (and) simply by living in accord with its own essence ... supports and gives life to the internal edifice of humanity, namely its genuine unity in its genuine plurality.”¹¹⁵ Then: “there is no special rule of private morals for any people ... every result proceeding from man (must) be measured by this rule: Does it put God’s stamp still more deeply on the world, the stamp of the God of justice and love?” If the answer for a group’s actions was ‘no’ then “it is therefore blasphemous when by such cases peoples and their leaders claim that their successes are proof of Divine benediction, as if success were a sign of particular favor.”¹¹⁶ It may also be argued that this passage dealing with a justifiable group was intended to challenge Hitler’s messianic self-understanding but if that was the case the words were equally ill-chosen because that statement also, unfortunately, resembles a restatement of the church’s attitude to Jews.

So we come to the clauses dealing with the concepts of territorial nationality, nationalism and “Volk” which Hitler was exploiting to absorb regions with a minority German-speaking population into the Third Reich. Here the authors of the encyclical had to tread very carefully because the questions of language and state, religion and state, and culture and state run in parallel, are intertwined and they related directly to the Risorgimento and the “Roman Question.” [See chapter 15, pp. 21, 37.] Hitler’s language and culture push carried a definite threat to the continued existence of the Vatican State. They therefore sought to distinguish between a nation and a state and to define what these terms may encompass. They said the nation is “a large association of men who have common memories and whom a common tradition, particularly with regard to spiritual culture, has shaped and continues to shape.” But territorial nationality referred to “an association of men more or less conscious of what they have in common, insofar and inasmuch as they were born on the same soil and are consequently permanently marked by the same personal characteristics.” With such questionable statements they were floundering and they sought to isolate several considerations. They noted, among other things, that: “it would therefore be false to consider in advance as unnatural the fact that human groups belonging to different territorial nationalities may be brought together in one state, or that members of the same territorial nationality may live in different states.” And, they said, it would be equally false for one state which was represented by members of its territorial nationality in another state to claim any kind of sovereign power over those people in the other state, or for those people to “seek political union” with another state. Talking of the bonds between nations and states they said: “Belonging to a given state is in and of itself distinct from belonging to a nation.” They were recognizing the tidal waves of migration, invasion and refugee movements which had shaped Europe and other regions, but they were deep into politics rather than the human rights of population dynamics. On one hand their statements could be read as justifying Hitler’s claims and on the other hand they could be read as justifying Czechoslovakia’s defence against his claims, while the Nazis in Czechoslovakia were definitely being told not to seek integration with Germany or to secede to form a separate state. However that required a defence of the Vatican’s position as a religion-based nation-state so we read: “... the solution of the ‘Roman Question’ was made possible only by abandoning this false idea of the nation, which would necessarily have entailed the maintenance of the integrity of the state, and returning to the true idea of the state, which is based on history.”¹¹⁷ [Emphasis added.] Indeed that would have been music to Hitler’s and Chamberlain’s ears.

Then: the questions of state, race and religion. “The nation has the right to fully develop its own nature, that is, to be intensively totalitarian; but it does not by itself have the exclusive right to control the legal order or the state, and still less the Church; it does not have the right to be exclusively totalitarian. For in that case we would have nationalism.” Put simply, the Vatican wanted to share in the exercise of totalitarianism, and Hitler’s policies had highlighted the contradiction in its self-understanding and actions: imposing itself on the state. It was being forced, yet again, to justify its demands as a religious institution for temporal power. People had to be free, according to the authors, to fulfill “their obligations to the divine moral order.” Christ himself had done this, they said, when he taught the people of the Old Testament. It “caused the Messiah [sic] to weep over Jerusalem; it is in perfect accord with the feelings of the Church which, as a visible, historical society, cannot avoid encountering nations in a positive manner on the terrain of history.” The authors then referred back to their criteria for false and legitimate groups and concluded that “racism denies, practically if not theoretically, that there are objective goals and values common to humanity as a whole,” noting that racism’s moral teaching – “the strength of the race and the purity of its blood must be preserved ... (and) ... any means that serves this end is ... good and legitimate” – had only recently been condemned.¹¹⁸ But then they set out to separate race and religion and, in doing so, justified discrimination against Jews on virtually the same basis that the Jesuit press had done for years, saying: “Although the unity of the whole of human culture is important to Catholic faith and to morality, let us limit ourselves here to considering only the relations between race and religion.” Then: “religion is based on the relation between the human person and a personal Being distinct from man, and on which man totally depends ... there is one God for all men and for all races ... (and) ... The Christian religion, the only true religion, is thereby fundamentally adapted to all and ordained for all races.” No one can change it in any way and “the loss of its objective and obligatory character would cause religion to lose completely its characteristic of universality.” And because it based its claim to authority on its own interpretation of Matthew 28:19–20, that all power over heaven and earth had been given to Christ, the Church “puts no people or group under any constraint in order to impose on it anything contrary to its true nature.” [Emphasis added.]¹¹⁹ At least it was not denying that it had put, and still put, people under constraints. It had simply written off as untrue and irrelevant all other religions – Judaism in particular but all others – whether they had evolved before or after Christianity.

The draft then noted that there was no basis in either biology or theology, “in the sense of divine election or rejection,” for racism and that it was destructive because it “erects barriers between superior, inferior, and indigenous races” measured on the basis of “the outward manifestations of their cultural life” but which are attributed to “invariable differences in blood.” And although it failed to recognize the historic role of the church and its doctrines in the development of those attitudes it clearly identified a vital factor, saying: “If the colonizing nations, urged on by political ambitions and the thirst for material gain, neglect their duty to raise the cultural level of certain human groups by means of beneficent political, social, and economic measures, and ... even keep the colonized peoples at this inferior level, then they are violating the elementary principles of Christian morality and natural law.” It called on “men of goodwill” to put an end to “all unmistakably defamatory and discriminatory distinctions in public life” and noted that it was “a fearful insult to a race” to “systematically prohibit” marriage between races. Special reference was reserved for “certain parts of the American continent” where the “unleashing of the basest human instincts in the so-called lynch law” occurs in circumstances in which the idea of a fixed distinction between inferior and superior races has been kept alive by “the artificial nurturing of prejudices.” However some of the gloss was stripped from that statement by the note that the races will observe “actual, even if not unchangeable and rigidly normative” unwritten matrimonial impediments in their own interests.¹²⁰

But the question of anti-Semitism, or religious separation, was different.

The authors canvas the question of whether the contemporary debate about racism is really a debate about religion and note that “many subdivisions of a single race are judged and treated differently by the same men at the same time” and “the struggle for racial purity ends by being uniquely the struggle against the Jews.” They then claimed that persecution against the Jews, which had been carried out since antiquity, “have been censured by the Holy See on more than one occasion, but especially when they have worn the mantle of Christianity.” They were quite right. One occasion was in 1928 when the ecclesiastical Friends of Israel Association was suppressed, with ulterior motives. [See chapter 17, pp. 17–32.] A second was still fresh in their minds: Pius XI’s attempt to eliminate anti-Semitism within the church, of which the writing of Humani Generis Unitas was to be the centrepiece. They then noted that the flagrant denial of human rights had sent many thousands of Jews wandering as helpless persons from frontier to frontier as “a burden to humanity and themselves.”¹²¹ Then came the crowning statement.

But however unjust and pitiless, this campaign against the Jew has at least this advantage, if one can put it so, over racial strife, that it recalls the true nature, the authentic basis of the social separation of the Jews from the rest of humanity. This basis is directly religious in character. Essentially, the so-called Jewish question is not one of race, or nation, or territorial nationality, or citizenship in the state. It is a question of religion and, since the coming of Christ, a question of Christianity.¹²²

This was followed by a concise explanation or restatement of the church's attitude to the Jews. They were the only people in the history of the human race who "had a calling, properly so called." They were chosen by Almighty God to prepare the way for His Only-Begotten Son, Jesus Christ. "His mission and his teaching were the completion of the historic mission and teaching of Israel; His birth, life, sufferings, death, and resurrection from the dead were the fulfillment of Israel's types and prophecies." But the Saviour "was rejected by that people, violently repudiated, and condemned as a criminal by the highest tribunals of the Jewish nation, in collusion with the pagan authorities who had held the Jewish people in bondage. Ultimately the Saviour was put to death." Then: "Through the sufferings and death of the Saviour, the work of the Redemption was wrought for all humanity; the sins of the world were taken away; the doors of Heaven were opened ..." man was restored, but "... blinded by a vision of material domination and gain, the Israelites lost what they themselves had sought."¹²³ And:

Moreover, by a mysterious Providence of God, this unhappy people, destroyers of their own nation, whose misguided leaders had called down upon their own heads a Divine malediction, doomed, as it were, to perpetually wander over the face of the earth, were nonetheless never allowed to perish, but have been preserved through the ages into our own time. No natural reason appears to be forthcoming to explain this age-long persistence, the indestructible coherence of the Jewish people.¹²⁴

Then: a few more clauses of theological discussion, including statements that Israel has incurred the wrath of God; hastened evangelization and conversion of the gentiles; remains the chosen people because Israel's election has never been revoked; and it may yet share in the redemption made available by its own rejection. And another remarkable misrepresentation of history: "... we find a historic enmity of the Jewish people to Christianity, creating a perpetual tension between Jew and Gentile which the passage of time has never diminished, even though from time to time its manifestations have been mitigated." This is followed by a barely disguised attempt to justify discrimination and enforced isolation. The Church's ardent hopes for Jewish salvation "do not blind her to the spiritual dangers to which contact with Jews can expose souls, or make her unaware of the need to safeguard her children against spiritual contagion ... (and) ... so long must the Church use every effort to see that the effects of this (persisting) unbelief and hostility are not to rebound to the ruin of the faith and morals of her own members." And the facts that anti-Semitism involving persecution is pitifully inadequate, utterly unfit for the Church's task, and defeats its own purpose by producing only greater obstacles to cope with, "clearly demonstrate the need for energetic measures to preserve both the faith and morals of her members and society itself against the corrupting influence of error

...” To show that the Church had always understood this, there was then a quotation from the Holy Office decree of March 25, 1928 – out of context with the purpose of the decree – on the suppression of the Friends of Israel Association. There was then an acknowledgment that injustice incites injustice, persecution leads to vengeance, resentment leads to manipulation of public opinion and common hatred for the Christian faith.¹²⁵

As significant as they were, even those admissions and acknowledgments would hardly seem to be the justification which Pius XI was looking for to encourage a change in policy on racism and anti-Semitism or to provide a basis for a new policy. The encyclical could be expected to include some positive initiatives. However it noted that anti-Semitism attempts to embarrass the Church by giving her two alternatives: either join the anti-Semites and be associated with their campaigns of vilification and hatred, or become involved in political machinations and struggles in her legitimate defence of the Christian principles of justice and humanity. The Church’s answer to this challenge was “unequivocal and unchanging.” The Church desires only the salvation of souls and:

*Her sole care is that the custody of truth committed to her care be preserved intact and that her children be preserved against error and sin; that the principles of life taught by her Saviour be carried out in their integrity; and that through her beneficent action upon earth as many souls as possible may be brought to their eternal home in Heaven.*¹²⁶

That was a very blunt statement that the Roman Catholic Church would perpetuate the teachings and attitudes already set out above. Moreover:

*Her concern is not with political victories and triumphs, not with the alignments of states and the devices of politicians; hence she is in no wise concerned with the problems concerning the Jewish people that lie within those purely profane spheres. Thoroughly aware that the great diversity of circumstances in which Jews of different countries find themselves gives rise to very different problems in the practical order, the Church leaves to the powers concerned the solution of these problems. She insists only that no solution is the true solution if it contradicts the very demanding laws of justice and charity.*¹²⁷

That was an equally blunt statement that Hitler and Mussolini could carry on as they had been going because nothing which they had done so far contradicted the justice and charity which the Church believed was the due of the Jews on the basis of their history and Divine malediction. After all, the authors said, “the position of the Jewish people is unique” and occupies a singular and painful place in history. It was a paradox involving special Providence, the rejection of that Providence, and the injection of “a stumbling block of contradiction into the history of all peoples,” yet it was still “the object of a mysterious preservation by the same Providence of God.” The bitterness of Christian reproach and Jewish response over the spiritual issues show how difficult it will be to reach a solution and: “Both sound reason and Christian Faith bid us to look to a spiritual means, not to violence, force, or brutally coercive measures.” The authors noted that the hour and the manner of “the return of the Jewish people as a whole to their Father’s house in the Church of Christ remains God’s secret” but they looked forward to the day when, again, “Jew and Gentile will be united in their Father’s house” and they invoked “the all-powerful intercession of the Holy Mother of God, herself a daughter of Israel,” towards that end.¹²⁸

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF HUMANI GENERIS UNITAS

The authors of the encyclical didn’t have a crystal ball any more than Maimonides did. Those final quotations indicate that they did not recognize what either Maimonides or Muhammad had written. They had missed each of the triggers which had helped raise the curtain on the Night Journey. They could not have picked them anyway because the church did not recognize the Night Journey as legitimate. But neither did they recognize the parody of Mein Kampf in which they were involved and through which both the Night Journey and the prophetic understanding of Maimonides, coupling the return of the Jewish people to Israel with the unfolding of the Messianic Age would, in due course, be understood.

If it had been published, Humani Generis Unitas could not have had the effect which Pius XI was looking for when he commissioned it. The thrust of the document was against racism, quite clearly, and against violent treatment of Jews in a muted manner. But against anti-Semitism? No. In fact it restated, consolidated and provided a statement confirming and justifying the Vatican’s long-standing anti-Semitic policies and practices more concisely than probably any previous single pontifical document. Those who were either opposed to softening the Vatican line on Jews and Judaism or who considered that to raise the issue of anti-Semitism could put the future of the Vatican State in danger had won the day. Actually it never became a pontifical document. It was not approved and authorized for publication by Pius XI or by anyone else. And that is just as well. It certainly would not have been a restraining influence on Hitler and clearly it was not the intention of those who dominated its preparation and determined its thrust that it should be. LaFarge and Pius XI had been derailed in no uncertain manner.

There can be no doubt that although he commissioned it, Pope Pius XI certainly would not have published it. If it had been published, Hitler and Mussolini would have been confirmed in their policies. They would have had a papal blessing for all that they had done and unexpected encouragement and support to press on with the isolation, oppression and expulsion of the Jews. The draft encyclical said, very clearly indeed – and in spite of Pius XI’s statements in July-August 1938 after he had commissioned the encyclical – that the Vatican would not intervene to influence policies of government and that the Jews were only getting what they deserved. This means that the Lateran Treaty would have been safe. The future of the Vatican State would have therefore been secure also. This means that the “Roman Question” would not have been forced back onto the agenda and, with it, the role and self-understanding of the Roman Catholic Church and the theology which underpinned them.

However the encyclical would have thrown Britain, France and the United States into chaos. Each of them had been criticized, along with the Nazis and the Communists, for some aspects of racial, social and economic policy but those were minor matters compared with the Jewish question. On one hand they would have been confirmed in their negative attitudes and their lack of interest in doing anything spontaneous to help the Jews – consistent with their responses to the Evian conference, while on the other hand they would have come under intense pressure from Jewish and Zionist organizations who would have known immediately on its publication that their people would be subjected to greater oppression. What effect might it have had in Czechoslovakia in the wake of the Munich Agreement where, at the time it was completed, Hitler was only about to occupy the Sudetenland? Or in Poland? The Jewish communities would also have known that very few governments in the Christian West with significant Catholic populations and faced with such dramatic theological justification for Hitler's policies would have had the political will to help. And what of Britain's Palestine policy, the Round Table Conference, and Britain's relations with the Arabs? When the Zionists stepped up their pressure for settlement the Arabs would naturally have turned to Hitler and Mussolini for additional support. The implications for British defence policy in the Middle East and the Far East were very serious. So what of Japan's reaction to the strengthening of Hitler's position and the weakening of Britain's, the future of Craigie's negotiations in Japan, and the effect on Sino-Japanese relations? The Soviet Union's frontiers were still open to Jews and the Birobidzhan autonomous region project was still open. Would the Jewish populations in Central Europe have overcome their reserve and migrated there? If they did, what would have been the impact on Anglo-Soviet and Soviet-American relations? And how would the Protestant and Orthodox Churches, and the Ecumenical Movement on its way to the establishment of the World Council of Churches have responded?

The implications which would have flowed from the publication of Humani Generis Unitas are very far reaching indeed. This draws our attention to the question: why did Ledochowski, and whoever else was involved, withhold the document from the pope? They must have realized that he would reject it as inconsistent with the commission which he had given LaFarge and with his public statements shortly afterwards. If they were happy with it, were they trying to avoid amending it by holding it until the election of a successor who might approve it? It was widely expected that Pacelli would be that successor. According to all available published statements Pacelli was not aware of the drafting or completion of the document. But is that plausible? In the circumstances it is simply not believable. If they were not happy with it, what aspect concerned them? Ledochowski referred it to Rosa for 'expert opinion' two days after Hitler's Swiss-inspired direction that all Jews must carry marked passports and in the wake of his most vitriolic attack on the Jews of Austria. Why Rosa? Ledochowski knew that the document was a faithful reflection of what Rosa had written for La Civiltà cattolica only a few weeks before.

Did Ledochowski want the encyclical strengthened, to be even more aggressive towards the Jews? Or was he, perhaps, concerned that Hitler was taking full advantage of the high profile support of the Catholic press, that what he was doing would be followed by even more rigorous regulations and oppression, that this was no longer acceptable and that the Catholic press had over-stepped the mark? Was he hoping that it would be modified to be less antagonistic to the Jews and therefore less provocative and less encouraging to Hitler? Did he realize that the Vatican was ‘selling its soul’ in its bid to avoid the reopening of the Roman Question? Did he fear that the Roman Catholic Church’s frankness on the Jewish question might inspire competitors in the Ecumenical Movement to further reconsideration of that question and, as a consequence, the wider theological issues which flowed from it? Was he fearful of the possibility of an anti-Catholic backlash in those countries which were implicitly criticized in the encyclical? Or, more likely, did he realize the immediate international political complications which would flow from its publication? If that is the case, was he waiting for those complications to be eliminated by further political manoeuvring and the passage of time? Or was he hoping that the encyclical could be reworked to avoid the Vatican being accused of precipitating such complications? If any of these later considerations were involved in his thinking it is quite inconceivable that he would take any action without consulting his close colleague and hierarchical superior, the Cardinal Secretary of State Pacelli.

In due course we may have some answers to those questions because pressure is growing for the Vatican to open its archives of the period of the Holocaust for joint study by Catholic and Jewish scholars.¹²⁹ However the encyclical was not published, so Britain, Europe and the world puddled on as they were going, oblivious to the way in which their crises were very nearly compounded. The question therefore is: what do we learn from the aborted preparation of the Hidden Encyclical? First: although Pope Pius XI had changed direction on the issue of anti-Semitism the dominant Vatican hierarchy had not. Second: the church was totally oblivious to the fact that Mein Kampf was a parody of the amorphous Christian gel and the church on which it was based and around which it had congealed, and that it was a warning signal that the Night Journey was about to become reality. Third: that as the world was being drawn relentlessly into a major war there was a desperate need for a reassessment of the self-understanding of the church, its relations with its partners in the triangle of Semitic Messianic faiths, and the fundamental theology which underpinned its self-understanding, its teaching and the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel. Fourth: the church’s corporate attitude was such that reassessment could not and would not take place until the world had experienced the Night Journey and had awoken, in due course, to the realization of the reality of Maimonides’ understanding of the way in which the Messianic Age would unfold with interaction between those three Abrahamic faiths. Fifth: Humani Generis Unitas is a time capsule of the Roman Catholic Church’s attitudes and policy on the Jewish question at the time that it was completed, late-September 1938, right at the time of Munich and the occupation of the Sudetenland. But time capsules can be time bombs. In this regard, some observations made to one of the co-authors of The Hidden Encyclical, Georges Passelecq, by the Rector of St. Anselm Pontifical College in Rome, Fr. Ambroise Watelet, O.S.B., in 1976 in a letter in connection with their research for that work are especially significant. Fr. Watelet wrote, in part,:

The draft encyclical is not primarily concerned with the Jews, but rather with the general problem of racism. That said, there is a dossier on the matter in the Vatican archives, but it is still in the secret part of the archives, and thus not accessible through the ordinary avenues.

... A final consideration: Father Graham thinks that so far as this draft encyclical is concerned, the Vatican would probably not wish to draw attention to the publications on the Jews at this moment of tension in the Near East. [Emphasis added.] ¹³⁰

In addition there is the observation made by Fr. Gordon Zahn that “it is unwise to make too much of the ‘intrigue’ which delayed and finally prevented” the appearance of Humani Generis Unitas. So: Pius XI was dead and so was the project to produce an encyclical against racism and anti-Semitism. On October 31, in a letter which was mainly concerned with the first encyclical of Pius XII, LaFarge was advised by Fr. Vincent McCormick, the rector of the Gregorian University who was responsible for the American meeting Pius XI in June 1938 (chapter 21, p. 32) that: “Your document came through without difficulty and is resting in our archives.”¹³¹ [Emphasis added.] But the disappearance of the secret draft encyclical was not the only consequence of the illness and death of Pius XI. By coincidence, Archbishop Temple’s letter inviting cooperation with the World Council of Churches and addressed to the Vatican Secretary of State was dated and ready for posting on February 10.¹³² The secretary of state to whom the letter was addressed was Pacelli who had become the dominant figure in the Vatican. He was then pre-occupied, waiting – not so much in the wings but in centre stage – for the conclave to elect a new pope. As a result, Temple’s letter sat, unattended to for five months.

PAPAL POMP: CAMOUFLAGE FOR HITLER’S SUPPLY PROBLEM

However the Vatican was not the only body which was suppressing information and the conspiracy of silence was so effective that very few of the people to whom Hitler’s prophetic outburst on January 30 was directed would have realized that the immediate cause of his outburst was his irritating little supply problem. His ‘guest’ in the Hotel Metropole, Baron Louis de Rothschild, in league with the British government, still wouldn’t let him play coal miner-steel miller at Vitkowitz. Even if they had known, it is questionable whether it would have altered their response. The knowledge of Britain’s critically weak bargaining position simply bolstered their will to gain US support. And there was little point in turning to the churches for support or intervention. Those in Germany were firmly under Hitler’s thumb, the vast majority of the world’s Christians couldn’t have cared less, and somewhere in the Vatican was the draft of Humani Generis Unitas which would have sent shock waves down their spines if they had known about it. In the overall view of the churches the Jews were an irrelevancy and their troubles were all their own fault. Let them sink or swim. In fact it was the church’s responsibility that there was no wider understanding. Trouble in the triangle? What triangle?

During the next couple of months both the refugees and Hitler took steps to solve their problems but the refugees had less success than Hitler. Two of them, the Italian-born Nobel prize winner Enrico Fermi and Hungarian-born Leo Szilard, tried to interest both the US Army and the US Navy in the development of atomic weapons but they couldn’t even raise support for their research.¹³³ Himmler, as intermediary for Hitler, at least got Baron Louis talking money. He would agree to hand over Vitkowitz, on behalf of the British owners of course, for three million pounds Sterling, but only after he was safely out of Austria.¹³⁴ The selling price was a real bargain at about one third of the real value.¹³⁵

Hitler knew that it was only a matter of time before he would have control of vital parts of Czechoslovakia, including his strategic prize, Vitkowitz which he would not really need to pay for if he was able to occupy the country first. He had been outwitted at Munich when he agreed to a commission to fix the boundaries of regions to be ceded to Germany on the basis of ethnic community interests and thereby lost the chance of a plebiscite. But he had read history, so he knew the rules for the game divide-and-rule very well. In fact he had refined some techniques a bit as he gained experience playing Britain and France. They had been happy to respond to ethnic manoeuvring when it suited them in the western region so they could not decry similar moves in the eastern region. Czechoslovakia could be dismembered piecemeal and he would take his share, including Vitkowitz. The strategy worked.

As with the Rhineland, Hitler's generals had warned him of the dangers of trying to fight his way into Czechoslovakia and of having to defend his occupation against counter attack, and the plot to depose him if he ordered a frontal invasion has already been noted. He was well aware of the capacity of the Catholic hierarchy to stir up opposition, even to the point of calling for military intervention. But he was also well aware of the value of headline-grabbing pomp and religious ceremony as a distraction from other matters, right across Catholic central Europe. On this occasion his judgement was again spot on.

While Britain's Round Table Conference on Palestine was in session, and also on February 10, Japanese forces occupied Hainan Island, adjacent to the border between China and French Indo China, and considerably extended Japan's influence and reach into South East Asia. Pope Pius XI died the same day and a conclave to elect his successor was called for three weeks later. Taking full advantage of that distraction and the absence of the Catholic hierarchy for the election and enthronement of the new pope in Rome, and while Chamberlain waited for his Round Table Conference to produce some results, Hitler stepped up his massive campaign of propaganda and political manipulation in Slovakia against the Central Czech Government in Prague and formalized his plans to expel all Jews from his territory.

The level of intrigue during the Round Table Conference as the Zionists and the Arab supporters of the Palestinian cause jockeyed for position at Britain's expense almost defies imagination. According to Aarons and Loftus, Jack Philby, one time British intelligence agent, retained by oil companies and King Ibn Saud, lunched in secret with Weizmann, Ben-Gurion and a foreign affairs official for Ibn Saud, Fuad Hamza, and sought to arrange a deal under which substantial Jewish immigration into Palestine would be arranged if the Zionists would support the country coming under Saudi domination. The proposal was not pursued after it was somehow leaked to the press.¹³⁶ But at the same time, Germany's special emissary in Iraq, Grobba, visited Saudi Arabia to improve Germany's relations with King Ibn Saud who was expected to remain neutral if a war erupted, while Ribbentrop tried to strengthen the three-power alliance. Then, when Ibn Saud, concerned at Italy's unconcealed ambitions in the Gulf

Regions, expelled the Italian Air Mission, Grobba recommended to the Berlin Foreign Office that Germany should pay more attention to Arab policy. Diplomatic relations were promptly established and Grobba was accredited to Jedda as well as Baghdad.¹³⁷

During that period, while that finance and property wrangling was reaching a climax, Hitler's position strengthened enormously and Britain's weakened correspondingly. Britain and France each recognized Franco's government on February 27, but Hitler again outmanoeuvred them to gain both Franco's Spain, and Hungary as partners in the Anti-Comintern Pact and began applying increased pressure to gain concessions from Poland. Together with Italy and Japan (which had demanded and secured recognition of its puppet regime in Manchuria two years before as its price for signing the pact to isolate the Soviet Union) the signatories to the pact now formed a formidable group, even if somewhat disparate.

When the pontifical conclave opened in Rome on March 2, Cardinal Pacelli was elected pope the same day. His election was contrary to prevailing Vatican protocol, but it had been widely expected and some observers say it was a matter of logic in the circumstances, given that Pacelli had worked so closely with the late pope in all of the major diplomatic and political ventures of recent years and in spite of the weakening of the ties between them over the Jewish question. In fact Pius XI had been grooming Pacelli as his successor for some years, (see chapter 20), and in view of the dominant role he had played in the negotiation of a number of concordats – especially the Reich Concordat – there could have been a significant drop in the level of international acceptance of the Vatican as a political force if he had not been elected.

Next day, March 3, in an intimately linked domain of diplomacy and politics, Ambassador Kennedy reported to the White House that Britain and France were no longer powerful enough to maintain the balance of power and the United States must face up to the possibility of a totalitarian-dominated Europe. He warned that the burden of rearmament for the US would be heavy and "civil liberties would have to be sharply restricted in the interest of national security. America, alone in a jealous and hostile world, would find that the effort and cost of maintaining 'splendid isolation' would be such as to bring about the destruction of all those values which the isolation policy had been designed to preserve."¹³⁸

Then, with indecent haste following his election as pope, Pius XII conferred with the cardinals from Germany and Austria who had come to Rome for the conclave and penned a letter of apostolic blessing to "the illustrious Herr Adolf Hitler, Fuhrer and Chancellor of the German Reich!" Dated at St. Peter's on March 6, it was surely one of the first communications made by Pius XII. He had not yet been formally enthroned as pontiff. Preparations for that great pageant were still in progress. He wrote:

"Here at the beginning of our pontificate we wish to assure you that we remain devoted to the spiritual welfare of the German people entrusted to your leadership. For them we implore God the almighty to grant them that true felicity which springs from religion. We recall with great pleasure the many years we spent in Germany as Apostolic Nuncio, when we did all in our power to establish harmonious relations between Church and State. Now that the responsibilities of our pastoral function have increased our opportunities, how much more *ardently do we pray to reach that goal. May the prosperity of the German people and their progress in every domain come, with God's help to fruition."*¹³⁹

What other encouragement did Hitler need? Pius XII had the concurrence of his cardinals that he should pursue détente with Hitler and that, in this spirit, Rome should seek an understanding with Germany and refrain from statements of an unfavourable and condemnatory kind. As faithful instruments of the Vatican, L'Osservatore Romano and Vatican Radio were very willing to comply and to "modify their manner of reporting German news."

On March 7, while Hitler was no doubt gloating over the blessing he had received from Pius XII and while the Round Table Conference was still struggling with major disagreements, Chamberlain undertook a programme of public brain washing through his compliant press barons without consulting either his Foreign Secretary or the Foreign Office. It was a transparent bid to further camouflage Britain's military unpreparedness in the face of the crisis in Europe, to lull the British public into acceptance of appeasement, and to patch over the cracks in the Commonwealth. In a speech to guests at a Conservative dinner he said there was no crisis on the horizon, the Russian danger was receding, and the dangers of war with Germany were getting less every day. He followed that with advice to the lobby, on March 9, that the Spanish 'affair' would soon be over, that the Franco-Italian problems could then be tackled, and that disarmament could follow.¹⁴⁰

On the same day, with its authority being eroded as a consequence of all the campaigns around it, the Czechoslovak Central Government played into Hitler's hand by dismissing the Slovak provincial government. Hitler immediately recognized it and transferred his guarantee to it. He had to act quickly to avoid either Russia or Britain acting on their separate guarantees to Czechoslovakia – if either of them had the will to do so. He need not have worried, but he had to have a pretext to "respond" to an internal appeal for German intervention. It was, after all, "to the spiritual welfare of the German people" that Pius XII said he remained devoted. Not the Czechs.

Cadogan noted on March 10 that the 'ridiculous rainbow stories' in the press were much too optimistic and 'dangerous', encouraging Germany to more adventures. Having traced them to the PM's lobby briefing he noted that the PM should not do this, or he should at least consult the Foreign Secretary first. Halifax admonished Chamberlain in a personal letter which brought an apology for the error in his method, but no repentance for the content of his statements. One more day and he could file intelligence reports that Hitler had ordered the invasion of Czechoslovakia, and four more days and he could note that Moravska Ostrava and Vitkowitz had been occupied because, on the 10th, Hitler cancelled a planned visit to Vienna and it took him only four days to engineer the kind of crisis he needed.

The Soviet Union was being squeezed in an ever more invidious position. It had been rebuffed by the Western powers in its proposals for a system of collective security against Germany, and, in response, had rebuffed Britain's overtures to improve Anglo-Soviet relations in the wake of Munich. Italy had proceeded to join the Anti-Comintern Pact and the Soviet Union feared direct exposure to Germany if Poland succumbed as well as Czechoslovakia. The Soviets were therefore ready to consider both a renewal of the non-aggression pact which they signed with Poland seven years earlier and to extend a recently signed trade agreement with Germany to include the purchase of arms.

Stalin vented his feelings when he addressed the Eighteenth Party Congress, also on March 10, saying that a new imperialist war had begun with “a redivision of the world, of spheres of influence and colonies, by military action.” Using words similar to those which Ribbentrop used in conversation with Mussolini when Italy joined the Anti-Comintern Pact, he said that two blocs of imperialist powers had formed. In one were three aggressive states united by the Anti-Comintern Pact, and in the other, “a group of non-aggressive states, primarily Britain and France.” Then, after referring to the unquestionable economic and military strength of Britain and France he turned to their motives for rejecting his proposals for collective security or collective resistance and for taking up a policy of non-intervention or neutrality. “The policy of non-intervention means conniving at aggression, giving free rein to war,” he said. It was a dangerous game aimed at having all the belligerents sink into the mire of war, weakened and exhausted, and of “encouraging the Germans to march east, promising them easy pickings and prompting them: ‘Just start war on the Bolsheviks and everything will be all right’.”¹⁴¹

It was a remarkable and frank assessment, except that Stalin does not seem to have realized just how weak Britain’s position was. If he had realized, then given the circumstances and the history of Western Capitalist policies concerning Soviet Russia, he could be expected to have taken full advantage of it. That suggests that Chamberlain’s policy of concealment and misrepresentation of information had been remarkably effective in preventing foreign governments from exploiting Britain’s critical position even if it had, at the same time, lulled the British people into a false sense of security

How could Hitler’s Czechoslovakian coup be so swift and unopposed?

While Hitler was engineering a crisis, the Catholic hierarchy and the faithful of Europe were still busy celebrating the election of Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli and preparing for his enthronement as Pope Pius XII on March 12. No doubt Hitler was celebrating it, too! He knew the nature of the man extremely well indeed. During their negotiations he had learned the Vatican’s method of operation very well. He knew its susceptibilities and its strengths, what was important to its self-understanding, and the level of control it exercised over the Catholic Church in countries beyond Italy. He had outwitted Pacelli to achieve his objectives and to harness the whole of the Christian church in Germany and not only the Catholic Church. He knew that the church had to remain a compliant ally or suffer the consequences, and he knew very well that it would be a very useful ally, even if a reluctant one, in his struggle against Communism – at least as long as Pacelli, now Pius XII, remained pope. And he knew that as long as he dangled a carrot or two under the new pope’s nose to offset the restrictions and repression which he intended to maintain against the church, the Vatican would favour him in any of its peace endeavours with the Western democracies.

Therefore, even though Hitler did not countenance extravagance, and he expected those around him to be very sober and reasonably frugal in their conduct, he would have had no objection to the fantastic extravagance of the papal enthronement and celebrations which Pius XII had ordered. It would be a distraction from the realities of international affairs and the fact that he not only had troops moving on the Czechoslovak border but he was mobilizing forty divisions of troops: it would do him no harm at all for the pope to achieve a higher international profile – and to amplify the Christian message in relation to the Jews – and in addition he would benefit from reflected glory because of his precious concordat. Pacelli had decreed that no expense should be spared in the enthronement. This was to be a coronation like no other. There would be nothing humble like palm branches and donkeys. The pope was to be “borne aloft by a bevy of white-gloved Black Nobility on the sedia gestatoria, the traditional papal sedan,” fanned by ceremonial feathers, with foreign royalty, ambassadors and other representatives of governments spread before him in splendour befitting and demonstrating the authority which the Catholic Church claimed for “the father of princes and of kings, the ruler of the world, the Vicar on Earth of our Saviour Jesus Christ” and “the supreme arbiter of moral values.” It was to be performed in the open air in front of 40,000 invited ticket holders with such elevated pomp and ceremony that one million persons were expected to gather around St. Peters or the route leading to the spectacle. And the entire spectacle was to be staged, broadcast and filmed “not so much to bring the Pope among the people as to distance him and elevate him, to amaze the world,” not by the humility of the occasion but in what could be described as “the apotheosis of triumphalism.”¹⁴²

On Tuesday March 14 Hitler’s puppet, Tiso, responded to his order to declare Slovakia independent and it took only an extra day of ultimatums and intimidation to extract a declaration from President Hacha to the effect that he confidently laid the fate of the Czech people and their country in the hands of the Fuhrer of the German Reich. Hacha arrived in Berlin shortly after midnight on the morning of March 15 for talks and Hitler told him that the German army was under orders to occupy Czechoslovakia at 6 a.m. that morning to “protect” the German speaking minorities if he didn’t sign the declaration. Hacha knew that resistance was pointless. In fact elite troops of Hitler’s bodyguard division had already occupied Vitkowitz and Ostrava at dusk the previous evening, March 14, while Hacha was travelling by train to meet the Fuhrer and while papal fanfares still echoed around the continent. He was taking no chances that Poland, encouraged by the church or Britain and France, might stake a claim to Vitkowitz on the basis of its Polish ethnic minority before he had legalized his own invasion. By the time most of the cardinals arrived home Czechoslovakia was no more.¹⁴³ But He need not have worried. He had the pope’s blessing and the Poles did not.

That afternoon Chamberlain addressed the Commons, concluding with a statement that he would go on with his policy of appeasement. Cadogan simply noted “Fatal!”¹⁴⁴ and Hitler must have felt satisfied that he need not waste any more time in haggling with Baron Louis or with the president of the Board of Trade, Lord Runciman, and that he had his stranglehold on the future of the Little Entente. But the friends of Hitler’s hostage still had a card worth playing, perhaps. There was a lot of Czech money, gold and of course securities such as the Vitkowitz shares deposited in Britain or with British banks and they must have been worth a trick or two. However the Fuhrer wanted all of that plus a hefty ransom for the release of his prize guest, and he held by far the stronger hand. He established a 'protectorate' over Bohemia and Moravia on March 16. Then Rumania received its ultimatum on March 17 and immediately sought an indication of how Britain would respond if it was invaded.

Next day (only a week after Stalin's scathing attack on Britain and France) Chamberlain reversed his position and at a special cabinet meeting he proposed an approach to Russia, Poland, Yugoslavia, Turkey, Greece and Rumania to consider joint action. The reasoning was simple. If Hitler gained control of Rumania's oil fields it would offset British sanctions and give Germany access to the Mediterranean through a friendly Bulgaria. Cabinet feared that Italy might take advantage of disarray within the western bloc to occupy Albania or to make territorial claims on France. In either case Britain's access to its critical Middle East oil supplies would become very brittle and its balancing act with the Arabs and the Jews in Palestine would become even more critical. Anglo-Soviet talks began almost immediately.

Construction of a refinery at Haifa with a capacity of one million tons of oil per year had begun some twelve months earlier by arrangement between the Iraq Petroleum Company, Anglo Iranian Oil Company, Shell and the British Government, and the refinery was scheduled to go into production in a few months time. Provided Mediterranean naval superiority was maintained it would then provide a reasonable degree of security for Britain's strategic oil supplies. If access to Rumania's supplies was lost then Britain's reliance on either its share of Middle East supplies and Mediterranean naval superiority, or good will and continuing supplies from the United States, became more critical. Several days of frantic diplomatic activity followed. Poland's reluctance to cede Danzig and the corridor meant that alternatives had to be considered.

In the middle of that turmoil (on March 20) Sir Alexander Cadogan made a personal diary entry in which he noted that Britain was not ready for war and made an oblique reference to the continuing conspiracy of silence. He wrote: "These are awful days. The crisis is worse, really, than last September, but the public don't know it. It's more critical, more imminent, and more acute. And I'm afraid we have reached the cross-roads. I always said that, as long as Hitler could pretend he was incorporating Germans in the Reich, we could pretend that he had a case. If he proceeded to gobble up other nationalities, that would be the time to call 'Halt!'. That time has come, and I must stick to my principle, because on the whole, I think it right. I don't believe that he can gobble all Europe, or at least I don't believe that, if it does, it will do him much good. But we must have a moral position, and we will lose it if we don't do something now."

But Rumania had not received a reply from Britain when Hitler (spurred on by Britain's rejection of a prior call by Russia for four-power talks aimed at checking his expansionism) issued Poland with territorial demands on March 21. Urgent talks between Britain and France then brought an understanding on March 22 that they could jointly guarantee a Polish-

Rumanian Mutual Guarantee Pact if one was entered into. However the French Foreign Minister, Bonnet, admitted that if war erupted and France could not rely on British help for the first eighteen months the consequences might be 'profound and irretrievable'. He begged for the introduction of conscription in Britain.¹⁴⁵

On the same day, March 22, just one week after Hitler occupied Vitkowitz, the British Government rushed an urgent bill through the House of Commons to block any cash or property transfers to Czechoslovakia except for certain specified government transactions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir John Simon, told parliament that the bill was necessary to validate what the Bank of England, the joint stock banks "and other financial institutions" had already been doing at the request of the government. Those institutions, he said, "were naturally entitled to have from parliament the authority which would make their action unchallengeable and to be offered adequate indemnity if there was any case in which they could be held responsible," he said. What he did not say was that Britain wanted to minimize Germany's opportunities to commandeer funds which might be, or which might have already been, channelled to Czechoslovakia as part of the trade off for the enforced surrender of territory and that it wanted Czechoslovakia to pay any ransom out of money already provided. [However, at about the same time, the government did agree to renew a loan of 500,000 pounds to the Jewish Agency for Jewish emigration which had been granted earlier but could no longer be utilized because the Germans had already seized control of the banks in Czechoslovakia.¹⁴⁶]

With even more refugees arriving at the border of the remnant of Czechoslovakia after Germany occupied all of Bohemia and Moravia, including Vitkowitz and Ostrava, the Chancellor put a Bill to the Commons on the same day to implement the Anglo-French loan of sixteen million pounds sterling for a refugee re-settlement program which had been agreed to in January. He made a short speech in the best of gobble-de-gook which reads rather like a cover-up for the payment of ransom money. At that time, in the middle of the conspiracy of silence, few readers would have had any idea what it really meant. The Times report of it read in part:

"There had already been withdrawn out of the fund of Sterling 10,000,000 pounds with which the House was familiar a sum of Stg. 3,250,000 pounds. He was not sure that he had ever made it plain to the House that that 3,250,000 pounds which passed from the Bank of England to Czechoslovakia by Germany was composed in part of drawings from the free gift of 4,000,000 pounds directly to assist refugees, and in part from the other account which was in the nature of a loan, and which the former Czechoslovak Government had undertaken to repay. It appeared to him that so far as the amount was in the nature of a part payment of a loan they would be entitled to regard that amount as the amount to be recovered. On the other hand, so far as the sum of 4,000,000 pounds was to help refugees and could be devoted to that purpose, it ought to continue to be devoted to it."

In responding to the chancellor an opposition spokesman, Mr. Pethick Lawrence, said he was normally strongly opposed to hasty legislation but as this was a special matter and speedy action had to be taken he would support it. But he urged caution, saying that in this matter it was of supreme importance that the House should address itself to three questions. First of all there was the question whether the Bill did in fact achieve the purpose for which it was designed; secondly, whether by inadvertence it achieved other purposes which might be undesirable; and, thirdly, whether it carried as a consequence developments in the future which might have been entirely unforeseen.

Then came his key lines. So far as he could judge the Bill did achieve the main purpose which the Government had in view, which had nothing whatever to do with the Government loan and gift of 10,000,000 pounds to Czechoslovakia.

Mr Lawrence said it was quite impossible to disguise the fact that this Bill and the action which it was intended to implement could not be regarded with favour by the Government of the German Reich. It was obviously designed to prevent the Reich from taking undue advantage so far as this country was concerned of their military occupation of Czechoslovakia. It was therefore the duty of the Government and the House of Commons to make sure that they were prepared to meet such action as the Reich Government might take by way of retaliation. While it would be improper for them to ask the Government to explain in detail what they proposed to do in case the German Government retaliated, he hoped that the Government would tell the House that they had carefully considered the matter, and that they were in a position to act in such a way as to ensure that any retaliatory action would not be injurious to this country. (Cheers.) He recognized that this moratorium was desirable and even necessary. It was a very grave action and he asked for an assurance that the Government had contemplated all the consequences which might flow from it.¹⁴⁷

Very few readers would have been any wiser. What ‘undue advantages’? What ‘retaliatory action’? What ‘consequences’? The conspiracy of silence continued and so did the negotiations. But Hitler kept the pressure on. Next day, March 23, he annexed the Lithuanian territory of Memel on the well established premise of German ethnic unity.¹⁴⁸

Two important announcements were made on March 31. In the first, Japan advised that the Spratly Islands, strategically placed in the South China Sea, (midway between Indo China and Borneo to the north and south, and between the Philippines and Malaya to the East and West), were being brought under the administration of Formosa. This caught Whitehall on the wrong foot because, only two days before, the Admiralty had rejected a Foreign Office proposal to place a naval squadron at Singapore and had confirmed its commitment to the Mediterranean, saying that the limited number of capital ships available made it impossible to station any battleships in the East until 1942! Whitehall’s reaction therefore was that Japan was being prompted by Germany and Italy to stake a claim in that critical area in order to force Britain and France to divert scarce resources to East Asia. In the second, Chamberlain announced Britain’s partial guarantee to Poland. Its borders were not guaranteed, only its independence, and this left open the question of whether Britain was committed to military support from the moment that German action began against Poland or only when its existence was threatened. It also left open the questions of territorial claims of the nature of piecemeal demands made against Czechoslovakia (notably the largely German-speaking Polish Corridor), the protection of ethnic minorities and refugees, and the possibility of intervention by Russia on one side or the other.¹⁴⁹

Other questions of territorial claims were to come tumbling out in quick succession. Mussolini invaded Albania on Good Friday, April 7, and two days later, in his first official homily as pope on Easter Sunday Pius XII made it clear that he was not interested in such matters. In the framework of his catch cry that “the Pope is working for peace” there would be no more attempts by the Vatican to call the Fascists and the Nazis to order.¹⁵¹ Next day, on April 10, in a bid to discourage Hitler, Chamberlain announced a guarantee of Poland’s independence. But the Fuhrer received encouragement from another quarter the same day when the pope sent a telegram of congratulations to Franco on his assuming absolute power in Spain. The Vatican’s alliance with Fascism was complete. Every right-wing dictator in Europe had the backing of a papal blessing, a concordat, or both.

Over the next few weeks there was a flurry of activity. France banned the export of minerals from Indo-China to Japan and, on April 17, urged Britain to ban exports of zinc and iron ore from Malaya, but after consulting the US and learning that there was no support for trade restrictions of any type against Japan, Britain eventually declined – six weeks later in an atmosphere poisoned with other tensions. Britain also declined Chiang Kai-Shek’s proposals of Anglo-Chinese cooperation in the case of war in Europe, knowing that it would certainly precipitate Japanese cooperation with the Axis powers and preferring Japanese abstention rather than Chinese participation.¹⁵² Himmler paid a personal visit to Baron Louis. Mosley made his powerful speech against intervention to protect capital investments in Europe. A Czech plebiscite showed that 97.4 percent of the population did not favour incorporation into Germany, but Britain acknowledged German authority over Bohemia in spite of it, and the Bank of England repatriated six million pounds Sterling in gold to Czechoslovakia.

In mid April President Roosevelt sent both Hitler and Mussolini a thinly veiled threat of US intervention in a telegram which asked: “Are you willing to give assurance that your armed forces will not attack or invade the territory of the following independent nations?” He listed thirty-one countries, some of which were mandates or puppets of the major powers, such as Syria and Palestine, and some of which were major powers themselves, such as Britain, France and Russia. The benefit of a favourable response was to be American participation in worldwide “discussions” to relieve the world from “the crushing burden of armament” and to open up avenues of international trade. In other words the US would help dismantle the British imperial tariff preference system and cooperate with Germany and Italy in exploiting the resources of the rest of the world. Mussolini declined to recognize the message but Hitler took full advantage of it, ably aided and abetted by Archbishop Orsenigo, the papal nuncio in Berlin, who, at the express wish of Pius XII, opened a gala reception on April 20 to honour Hitler’s fiftieth birthday which was also the subject of prayers in Catholic churches throughout Germany.¹⁵³ On April 28, after making diplomatic inquiries of most of the thirty one countries other than the big three and Poland Hitler devoted one of the most important speeches of his career to his response to it at a specially convened session of the Reichstag. With a masterful selection of historical notes he made a mockery of American efforts to play the chief international policeman and the arbiter of international ethics in succession to the European colonial powers. The two-hour speech was broadcast by hundreds of radio stations around the world. It was printed in English by the German embassy in Washington for mailing to tens of thousands of community decision makers and it was a personal humiliation for Roosevelt. Hitler thus boosted the confidence of his German audience and attracted sympathy from friends of Nazi Germany abroad in what W. L. Shirer described as probably his most brilliant oration which reached a new level in eloquence, craftiness, irony, sarcasm and hypocrisy. It was a worthy extension of the parody of 'Mein Kampf'.

There was a blast for the iniquities of Versailles, admiration for Britain, and an attack for its distrust and its policy of encirclement; there was censure for the "mere inventions" of the international press, and the annulment of the Polish-German nonaggression pact which, he said, Poland had unilaterally infringed. Turning to Roosevelt's call for a conference, Hitler reminded him of his predecessor's role in setting up the League of Nations and America's subsequent rejection of it. North America's independence had not been achieved at the conference table, neither had a civil war settlement. And Germany after the Great War had been "subjected to even greater degradations than can ever have been inflicted on the chieftains of the Sioux tribes," he said., and Ireland regarded England and not Germany as a threat. The vast United States had enormous wealth and resources yet, in comparison, he was lifting a small state out of ruin to full employment, order and progress through education, he said. And taking up a theme dear to every American heart, Hitler said Providence had placed him in his role and he was concerned for the "justice, well-being, progress and peace of the whole community." Of the thirty-one countries which the president had listed, certain ones, such as Syria, were "not in possession of their freedom, but are occupied and consequently deprived of their rights by the military agents of democratic states" so they could not respond to his inquiries, he said.¹⁵⁴ But while Hitler directed that sharp attack at the Western presence in the Arab World in a general sense he reserved his most violent expressions for Britain's policies in Palestine and his speech had an electrifying impact on Arab opinion in general and on the Palestinians in particular.¹⁵⁵

All the manoeuvring had strengthened Hitler's claim to the Polish Danzig corridor between Germany and East Prussia¹⁵⁶ and with it the justification for annulling the non-aggression pact with Poland. He did it in the context of his Reichstag response to Roosevelt, on April 28. He also dismantled what was left of the Little Entente by negotiating a German-Rumanian trade agreement which effectively recognized the countries of the Danube valley and the Balkans as "the storehouse of Greater Germany" and gave him the control of Rumania's oil which he needed and which Britain feared so deeply. Having picked off, one by one, the countries which otherwise could have formed part of a strong encircling alliance against him, such as Russia had proposed, Hitler was easily able to gain nonaggression treaties with Estonia, Latvia and Denmark and move towards the confirmation of his Pact of Steel with Italy.

The balance of friendships, or at least the balance of alliances forged through fear, was shifting rapidly in favour of Hitler. Those who were well informed knew that if only one or two more countries lined up with him, Britain could come under the same kind of pressure as Austria or Czechoslovakia. It could be forced to cede colonial territories to avoid a war. It might have to fight a small war on someone else's territory to avoid ceding some of its own territories and this would make it even harder to avoid fighting a much bigger war, with fewer and fewer allies. With what allies?

Hitler was having conspicuous communication successes but Britain had to admit to a mixed bag. Chamberlain complained of 'false' reports (another way of saying embarrassing) in the News Chronicle, Halifax saw Lord Camrose about critical leaders appearing in the Daily Telegraph, and for the second time the BBC was instructed to 'restrain' highly controversial reporting about the Munich Agreement. Then on May 3, a Times leader, again 'inspired' by sources in the PM's office without consultation with the Foreign Office, gave everyone, including Hitler, a clear message with its comment that the Polish Corridor and Danzig were not worth a war. If he occupied those areas Britain would not act on its guarantee to Poland.¹⁵⁷

Next day another Papal Note was circulated which prompted a cool reception from everyone – except Mussolini. Pius XII knew a great deal about Hitler's plans for Poland, and the national leaders thought they knew quite a lot about the pope's plans as well. His proposal, favouring Germany, was talks between Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Poland on questions threatening to bring on war. He suggested that in view of the injustices of Versailles, Poland might yield on the question of a corridor "under pressure from a Vatican sponsored international peace conference." At least Pius XII was being consistent with both the intention of the unpublished encyclical Humani Generis Unitas and his declared intention that there would be no more attempts to call the Nazis or the Fascists to order. He had already discussed his proposal with Mussolini and received an enthusiastic response but he told neither his nuncios of the other governments of this. He had also instructed Orsenigo to discuss the matter with Hitler. During their one-hour discussion Hitler – no doubt very pleased to have strong support from his friend, the pope – brushed aside the proposal. Danzig is a free town under the League of Nations, he said. There could be discussions and negotiations, but it was not inevitable that there would be war. Orsenigo persisted and raised Pius XII's crucial question. "Would an agreement from the Poles reduce the tension?" Hitler persisted too. He was not afraid of Poland but he did not want to attack it "unless forced by ill-advised Polish provocations," he said.¹⁵⁸

When the pope's proposal was considered by the British Foreign Office on May 5 it received a cool reception and was declared suspended on May 11. Vansittart argued that Russia should be included, but Cadogan thought this impractical, presumably because Britain had already rejected Russia's proposal for talks and because of antagonism between the Vatican and Russia. He was probably much more eager to see the results of cooperation in naval planning and exercises between Britain and the US which Roosevelt had just authorized. Whether the British and French responses would have been different – either more favourable or more antagonistic – if they had known of the Vatican approaches to Mussolini and Hitler is problematical. Hitler and Mussolini both declared that there was no threat to peace, but Stalin thought otherwise. Molotov was given responsibility for the Anglo-Soviet talks and insisted on a full-blown political and military alliance. Perhaps that proposal was not consistent with the cooperation in naval planning and exercises between Britain and the US which Roosevelt had just authorized but in any case the Anglo-Soviet talks bogged down for some time amid British fears of the consequences if it agreed to make guarantees involving countries from the Black Sea to the Baltic, including those important oil wells, and Soviet suspicions about Britain's real motives.

On May 12, Baron Louis de Rothschild was told he could go free – just over seven weeks after those parliamentary non-debates. The 'sale' of Vitkowitz had finally been agreed, in principle, after much behind-the-scenes politicking, a combination of ransom and informal financial pressure exerted by international banks¹⁵⁹ aided by the British Government – and the German occupation of Czechoslovakia.¹⁶⁰ In fact during the ten weeks from March 7 when Chamberlain began his brain-washing exercise in the middle of the Round Table Conference, through the German occupation of Czechoslovakia, the seizure of Vitkowitz, the Commons debates over the manipulation by the Treasury and the Bank of England over 'refugee loans', to the completion of the deals on May 12, the conspiracy of silence had plumbed new depths. It did so with the full connivance of the British Opposition and in such a manner that Britain's parlous state was concealed from the world at large. But it was also concealed from the British public in such a manner that it could neither grasp the significance of the situation, nor understand how their country had got into it and make value judgements or political judgements about the way ahead.

THREATS ON TWO FRONTS CALL FOR A WHITE PAPER

Britain's motives for not pursuing Anglo-Russian or multi-lateral talks in Europe came under very close scrutiny soon enough when the British government released its White Paper on Palestine on May 17. The Arabs were soon much happier. The purchase of land by Jews in some areas was prohibited and restrictions on land transfers were applied in other areas. The Arabs were especially happy with the British Government's undertaking that Jewish settlement would remain restricted to 15,000 persons per year for five years and that after 1944 it would take place only with the approval of the Arab authorities and with the provision that they would share in government in proportion to their population. At first glance it appears that the British government had changed course from the philosophy reflected in its Balfour Declaration of 1917 but in the same way that the Declaration was a product of the imperial resources grab the White Paper was also. Britain was locked into the need to improve its relations with the Arabs of Palestine for many reasons but one was now becoming critical. Oil. The Haifa oil refinery, with a capacity of one million tons per year, had just commenced operations. It was not yet in full production but it would be vital to Britain's war effort – especially in the Mediterranean and the East with the loss of access to the Rumanian fields. Its security simply could not be guaranteed if the Arab rebellion continued. In the wake of the White Paper the Arab rebellion and the tempo of the running battle between the Arabs and the Jews fell dramatically.

Naturally the Zionist Organization and the international Jewish community objected strongly to those new restrictions. The Jewish Agency issued a statement describing the new policy as “a breach of faith and a surrender to Arab terrorism” which denied the Jewish people “the right to rebuild their national home in the ancestral country.” It “delivers Britain’s friends into the hands of those who are biting her and must lead to a complete breach between Jews and Arabs which will banish every prospect of peace in Palestine.” It was “a cruel blow, doubly cruel because it comes from the government of a great nation which has extended a helping hand to the Jews, and whose position must rest on foundations of moral authority and international good faith.” And finally: “The Jewish pioneers who ... have shown their strength in the upbuilding of a derelict country, will from now on display the same strength in defending Jewish immigration, the Jewish home and Jewish freedom.”¹⁶¹ There could hardly have been a more blunt warning of what lay ahead in due course. The Jewish Agency lobbied member governments in an effort to have the Council of the League of Nations reject the White Paper as being in conflict with the mandate. The Permanent Mandates Commission of the League decided unanimously that the White Paper was not in accordance with the mandate but only the Council had the authority to direct that it be withdrawn or to vary the mandate. It was due to meet in September 1939.

Hitler watched as Britain lurched from one problem to another. He was supremely confident. Confident but confused, and uncertain about just what course Britain might take. But he was so confident that he made three moves in quick succession. On May 20, taking advantage of the change in Soviet foreign policy direction, he instructed that the German ambassador in Moscow should seek to reopen the economic talks which had been broken off at the beginning of the year. Stalin’s response, relayed by Molotov, was that trade negotiations could proceed if the necessary ‘political basis’ had been established first. That prompted Hitler to think very carefully about Stalin’s capacity to manipulate concurrent German-Soviet and Anglo-Soviet talks.¹⁶² On May 22 the Pact of Steel with Italy which had been under negotiation for two weeks was signed. Then next day, May 23, Hitler summoned his fourteen principal armed services commanders to brief them on his firm decision to go to war, why he had to invade Poland, and why they had to be prepared to do battle with Britain and France as well. The die was cast. The only issue to be decided was the timing. Hitler’s military advisers told him that because of the expected weather pattern, August 25 was the latest date for an attack on Poland and he was confident that he could isolate each of Germany’s potential enemies by that date so that it did not have to do battle with Poland, Britain, France and Russia all at one time.¹⁶³ Everyone, including Hitler, knew that such a war would be unwinnable even with Italy and Japan as allies. A special planning group was to be set up within the High Command and absolute secrecy was required. Not even the General Staff or those allies, Italy and Japan, were to be advised.¹⁶⁴

Pius XII was “badly shaken” by the announcement of the Pact of Steel. He had withdrawn his peace conference proposal on May 10 on the purported grounds that there was no longer any danger of war but now, on June 4, he sought to negotiate directly and independently between Germany and Poland, telling Britain that it was making mediation more difficult because of its guarantee to defend Poland. This prompted a senior Foreign Office adviser to speculate that the papacy had abdicated its moral authority, that the pope was morally impotent, and that there was “an element of self-seeking hubris” in his neutrality, while the Poles regarded him as a pro-German Italian.¹⁶⁵

In June Hitler gained another moral victory and a boost to his prestige when the US Senate blocked Roosevelt’s attempt to amend the Neutrality Act in a way which would have enabled him to place an embargo on exports to Germany and to give preferential treatment to Britain in arms supplies. And in a very hostile mood a number of Senators supported moves for the United States to force Britain to complete its Great War debt repayments, saying that if it didn’t do so the US should seize the West Indies to balance the account. American companies trading in competition with the British preferential tariff system were increasingly bitter about it because it had made America’s task harder as it lagged behind Europe in shaking off the Depression. Many of them were at least as eager as Hitler to take a bite out of Britain’s colonial possessions. But on the other hand US Army Chief of Staff General Malin Craig supported proposals to sell aircraft to the Allies as a means of stimulating and increasing the production potential of the American industry in view of increasing anxiety within the military establishment about the state of US preparedness.¹⁶⁶

Concurrent with the manoeuvring of May and June, British Foreign Office and diplomatic staff in China made a series of inept decisions without adequate consultation with other authorities which aggravated tensions between Britain and Japan, resulting in the Japanese commander at Tientsin (occupied North China) imposing a blockade against food going into the British Concession and searching all residents, men and women, moving through the barrier.¹⁶⁷ Eventually, on June 18, ‘seething with righteousness’, Craigie sent a long and damning critique of British policy which, he said, was letting Britain and Japan drift towards a long conflict. In marked contrast to the views he had expressed at New Year, he pressed for another round of talks rather than a continuation of the “open partisanship” in British policy which lead to picking quarrels and did “more credit to our heart than our head.” He was supported by Lord Runciman who warned Chamberlain that if Britain was to make effective use of its fleet it should look after Europe first and “when we are secure in this theatre we can later on deal with the Japanese Navy ... (and) ... to go to war with our present divided forces without the active cooperation of the USA would ... be disastrous, and I could not accept any responsibility for this course.”¹⁶⁸ Whitehall was still deeply divided over sanctions and a show of force when Craigie, without formal approval, contacted Arita who agreed to another round of talks.

In Europe at this time there was a stalemate for a few weeks while each party jockeyed for position, but Britain’s press barons were becoming convinced that Chamberlain was out of touch with the situation in Europe and that the government had to be strengthened by the return of Churchill to cabinet. Lord Astor arranged a meeting on June 30 with Lord Camrose, Eden and Harold Nicholson at which he confided to them that Halifax was also in favour of Churchill’s return. It was agreed that public pressure would be applied to Chamberlain through a rolling series of editorials. The series began on Sunday, July 2, and involved the Observer,

The Daily Telegraph, Manchester Guardian, Yorkshire Post, Daily Mirror, Evening News, The Star and the News Chronicle, but the Kemsley and Beaverbrook presses were conspicuous by their non-involvement in the campaign. Chamberlain turned defensive, called for an explanation from Lord Camrose who had previously been his firmest supporter, interpreted the change as some sort of 'sickness' among the press corps, and began an offensive campaign to discredit Churchill and his new supporters through The Truth.

Such manoeuvring tended to focus public attention on the dramatically deteriorating world situation and while most people, whether in the professions, academia, business or the churches were increasingly jittery and concerned they felt powerless to influence the situation and felt no option but to leave the thinking to their politicians. However the Provisional Committee of the World Council of Churches felt that it had to take some initiative and, in conjunction with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, it convened a small conference of specialists in international affairs in Geneva early in July. Each of the participants were well known authorities in their own right but one was achieve world prominence within a few years. He was John Foster Dulles of the USA. The conference report became the basis of a statement which was sent to all member churches, world wide, calling their attention to the tasks of the church in time of war. A key extract from the conference report reads: "We believe that no decision secured by force of arms will be just and that out of the evil forces thereby set in motion, more evil is bound to come. We believe that decision by negotiation, conference, and methods of conciliation should always be an available alternative method. We believe that such procedures should be adopted free of the menace of force." And the statement of tasks read: true Christian prayer and preaching centred on the righteousness of the Kingdom; maintenance of brotherly relations between the churches in spite of propaganda; preparation of a just and lasting peace; counteracting hatred; and ministry to prisoners of war and refugees.¹⁶⁹

The second round of Craigie-Arita talks in Tokyo began, after some delays, on July 15 when Arita pressed for a formula which would provide for a general settlement of all of the matters of tension between Britain and Japan. These included Anglo-Japanese relations in China, the legal problems which resulted from the Tientsin drama, and economic policy. He proposed:

*The British Government fully recognize the actual situation in China, where hostilities on a large scale are in progress and note that, as long as that state of affairs continues to exist, the Japanese forces in China have special requirements for the purpose of safeguarding their own security and maintaining public order in the regions under their control, and they have to take the necessary steps in order to suppress or remove any such acts or causes as will obstruct them or benefit their enemy. The British Government, therefore, will refrain from all acts and measures which will interfere with the Japanese forces in attaining their above mentioned objects.*¹⁷⁰

It was a brief, direct and very simple formula. The major implication behind such a declaration, (refraining from all acts and measures which will interfere with the Japanese forces in attaining their objects) was that Britain would, in effect, withdraw all support from Chiang Kai-Shek, including financial support, allowing Japan to proceed with the war unhindered until

China was forced to negotiate an armistice. Any support at all would have allowed the diversion of funds to China's war effort and therefore interfered with Japan's aims. Interpreted that way, it went beyond what has been described as 'benevolent neutrality.' In fact such an agreement may not have been to China's disadvantage in the long run because, while it would have involved some loss of sovereignty in the short term within the Greater East Asian Sphere or the New Order for Asia, it would also have involved the establishment of an immense economic bloc which would have been to its advantage. At the same time, Chiang Kai-Shek, (or his successors if he were forced out of office), would have had the backing of Japan in bypassing, or suppressing, the Chinese Communist Party. A completely new set of relationships would have then evolved and, being no longer confronted by Britain in China, Japan would have had no compelling reason to continue its alliance with the Axis powers. How much serious consideration the Foreign Office and the British government gave to that aspect of the proposal is rather difficult to assess. They were more concerned with the immediate implication that it would mean the end of Extra-Territorial Rights for Britain, the European powers and the US in China, and the revision of all existing treaties and trade arrangements. That was what Britain really feared; the loss of its privileges and trade supremacy, and the loss of influence in other parts of Asia which would have assisted other efforts to escape from colonial subjugation, especially in India. And that was exactly what Japan was aiming for.

The wording was unacceptable to Britain but outright rejection would have aggravated the crisis and encouraged Japan to increase its war effort and collaborate more closely with Germany and Italy. Craigie therefore proposed to London that the wording of the formula be 'diluted' to make it innocuous, or at least to be seen to be accepting the Japanese position against China as far as possible while preserving Britain's "legitimate rights" in the region. Drafting began immediately.¹⁷¹

At that stage Whitehall officials began to share the US Chiefs of Staff anxiety about the state of US preparedness. After a visit to the US, made with Roosevelt's full support, Lord Riverdale advised the government that the US could meet Britain's requirements for the next two years provided that the United States was not at war, in which case its requirements would leave little surplus for sale to Britain, and provided that Britain's reserve of dollars held out.¹⁷² Craigie returned to Arita with Britain's revised draft agreement on July 19 and after two further days of discussions the final wording of the Arita-Craigie Agreement was agreed and the document was formally signed on July 24. The first sentence of the Japanese draft was retained and a new sentence was substituted for the second. It read:

*His Majesty's Government have no intention of countenancing any act or measures prejudicial to attainment of the above mentioned objects by Japanese forces and that they will take this opportunity to confirm their policy in this respect by making it plain to British authorities and British nationals in China that they should refrain from acts and measures.*¹⁷³

The subtleties of the English language may have been lost on the Japanese and differences in the way the two countries interpreted the agreement were soon apparent, but Craigie had succeeded in securing a form of words which meant that British officials in its concessions in China were bound to exercise neutrality, but the government in London was not restricted in providing either direct or indirect assistance to Chiang Kai-Shek. In most countries the agreement was interpreted the way the Japanese read it, and most of the British press were critical of the apparent appeasement of Japan, but Whitehall was delighted. The situations in the Far East and in the Middle East had actually combined with Riverdale's report on US preparedness to prompt the government to accelerate its vexatious discussions with the Soviet Union also, and a draft treaty had actually been agreed in Moscow the pervious day, July 23.

However, on July 26, as part of Hitler's plan to neutralize the Soviet Union, Germany's chief economic negotiator, Karl Schnurre, having been briefed by Ribbentrop personally, hosted the Soviet negotiators at dinner and discussed the real prospect of a German-Soviet 'understanding'. Schnurre told them that the best England could offer Russia was participation in a European war and the hostility of Germany. On the other hand Germany could offer "neutrality and staying out of a possible European conflict and, if Moscow wished, a German-Russian understanding on mutual interests which would work out to the advantage of both countries." When questioned, Schnurre assured his guests that "a high-ranking German personage" would put forward similar views in discussion with "a high-ranking Soviet personage." He had noted only one condition: "the possibility would be lost the moment the Soviet Union signed an agreement with Britain." German policy was directed against Britain, not Russia, he said, and in spite of their ideological differences Germany and the Soviet Union shared a common opposition to the capitalist democracies.¹⁷⁴

Being unaware of that dinner party, Halifax had told cabinet earlier that day that the Craigie-Arita Agreement lessened tensions and gained time to act on the government's policy of holding on and doing anything necessary "to extricate ourselves from a difficult position."¹⁷⁵ The government relaxed just a touch. But within hours it was shocked to learn of the momentous US announcement – made without prior consultation with London – that the United States would abrogate its 1911 Commercial Treaty with Japan in six months time.¹⁷⁶

At that point Lord Kemsley, one of the press barons to whom Chamberlain turned for support when the others deserted him, visited Hitler. At private talks on July 27 he belittled Churchill with vigour, doing all he could to persuade the Fuhrer that Britain was with Chamberlain in having no aggressive intentions towards Germany and in attaching "tremendous importance" to the documents signed by Hitler and Chamberlain at Munich.¹⁷⁷ But Kemsley, like Halifax, did not know of the previous day's German-Soviet discussions. Nor did he know that Craigie was already struggling with difficult negotiations in the next stage of the process of 'holding on and doing anything necessary for Britain to extricate itself from a difficult position' and that Craigie was reporting to Halifax on a deadlock with Japan over currency and silver trade while he 'exchanged' confidences with Hitler. Perhaps there was no exchange. It may have been all one way traffic.

Hitler had even more reason to be supremely confident and his special planning group was moving quickly. But for a couple of months he had appeared less sure of his moves, even though he had averted an attempted coup against him by the success of his Czechoslovakian adventure. There was a bit of a lull in the action. He was getting only qualified support from Italy and Hungary, so, with Russia very close at hand, Hitler had to tread warily over the Polish issue and he was jockeying very carefully for position. Britain and France had given Poland their pledge to maintain its territorial integrity a week after the Memel incident. But in view of the ease with which he had talked Britain out of Czechoslovakia, he had little to fear from those guarantees to Poland unless Britain confirmed a treaty with Russia or unless the United States intervened. However he knew Britain was still adopting an arms length posture towards Russia on political grounds while it sent delegations to talk trade and to seek economic cooperation.¹⁷⁸ If Hitler played his cards right and continued the way he was going at home, Britain could be out manoeuvred in the East and could be effectively isolated internationally. It would be dependent solely on the support of its dominions and colonies, several of whom were either pressing hard for independence or were under threat of annexation by other powers, and some of whom did not want to become involved in another war in Europe.

In July, as if he was trying to buy time so that pro-German sentiment could grow in the United States, or, perhaps, so that he could mend fences and develop a closer working arrangement with Britain, Hitler had even agreed to pay the three million pounds Sterling for Vitkowitz for which Baron Louis had pressed before the occupation of Czechoslovakia.¹⁷⁹ However it appears that he was really trying to buy time with which to outmanoeuvre Britain in their competition for an understanding with Russia. A contract was never signed, payment was never made, and Hitler's pact with Russia was about to catch Britain completely by surprise.¹⁸⁰

But even if the British government thought that there was still a chance of avoiding war the Jewish community had little doubt about the future. A little-known group called 'Focus for the Defence of Freedom and Peace' was urgently casting around for ways of strengthening the government's will to stand up to Hitler. It became their immediate aim to ensure that Churchill, a known supporter of Zionism, was again included in cabinet. Thousands of posters began appearing on advertising hoardings in London early in July with slogans such as 'Churchill must come back' and 'What price Churchill'. Editorials and readers' letters in most of the major papers debated the merits of his likely recall and scores of volunteers carried sandwich boards with the same thrust in front of the House of Commons. While Chamberlain suspected Soviet involvement in the campaign, which he found a distinct embarrassment, the controversial historical writer David Irving refers to strong circumstantial evidence that part of the finance for the campaign was provided from a $US3 million fund raised by the American Jewish Committee in its bid to stop Hitler.¹⁸¹

When Germany occupied Czechoslovakia in mid-March, exports of uranium were promptly banned so that the refugee scientists had little doubt about the future either. Fermi, Szilard and others took the ban to mean that Hitler was pressing on with nuclear weapon development and they feared that he would apply pressure on Belgium to get control of the other major source of supply in the Belgian Congo. Therefore when Szilard and Eugene Wigner, another Hungarian-born refugee from Nazism, called to see Einstein early in July, just when the debate on US neutrality, trade embargoes and seizure of the British West Indies was gaining momentum, well fuelled by Hitler's speech, they were equally as concerned to prevent the Congo falling under Hitler's control as they were to see work undertaken to develop an atomic bomb. Einstein was known to be on personally friendly terms with Queen Elizabeth of Belgium and they canvassed the idea that he should write to her. However it was agreed after several discussions involving a wider group of people that a letter to the US President was the most appropriate course. Accordingly Professor Albert Einstein, possibly the best known Jew, the most highly regarded theoretical physicist of the age, the onetime house guest of the president who had been honoured by congress, and the man whose pacifism had been rudely shattered by Hitler, addressed a letter to President Roosevelt on August 2, 1939.

It was a very pragmatic document, drafted with meticulous care in collaboration with those who suggested it and, like so much of the diplomatic and political manouvring involved in the trouble in the triangle, it carried no indication of the real motive behind it. It was pitched to highlight the advantages for the United States if it were the first to develop an atomic bomb and if it controlled the main source of uranium, and to set the president thinking about how disadvantageous it would be for the United States if another power were to develop nuclear capacity first. Those who helped to draft the letter were well aware that to promote the development of atomic weapons as a means of preventing Hitler from carrying out his anti-Semitic policy was potentially counter-productive. They could leave nothing to chance and the letter could not be left to take its course through the ordinary White House correspondence system. A personal confidant of the president, economist Alexander Sachs, was asked to deliver it personally at the first opportune time. However, because of the state of debate in the United States, Sachs decided it was not opportune to deliver the letter and he held it for a few weeks.¹⁸²

The extent of that turmoil is reflected in a message considered at the close of the World Conference of Christian Youth in Amsterdam on the same day that Einstein drafted his letter to Roosevelt. "The nations and peoples of the world are drifting apart," it said. But reflecting a mood of optimism within the ecumenical movement that the churches might be able to exercise some influence, it continued: "the churches are coming together. There is a growing conviction of the essential togetherness of all Christians."¹⁸⁴ Unfortunately that optimism was misplaced because the conference churches were not aware of the machinations of the Vatican.

And there were other messages being considered that day, too. Halifax confessed that the position in the Far East was then "causing him more anxiety than the position in any other part of the world." He proposed to cabinet that Britain should use continued anti-British demonstrations in both Japan and occupied China as an excuse to break off the Anglo-Japanese talks, and that if it was decided that 'retaliation' was necessary, then Britain should also 'denounce' its commercial treaty with Japan. Chamberlain, and cabinet, did not agree and when they sought Craigie's advice he dismissed the possibility of cooperation with the United States, saying that he hesitated to regard the actions of the current American administration seriously because they had "run away so often from their own initiatives" and he believed it would negotiate a new treaty with Japan well before its six months notice had expired. Considering the power play within the Japanese government he believed Britain's interests were best served by concessions to Japan and not confrontation.¹⁸⁵

For two weeks cabinet considered conflicting advice, the fact that the US was opposed to anything which weakened the Chinese currency, and French inability to cooperate. During that time Hitler's position strengthened substantially, partly due to procrastination by the British and French in sending a joint delegation to Moscow to progress the draft treaty. That delegation finally arrived in Moscow on August 11, ready for discussions next day. But unknown to them or their governments, on the day those talks began, August 12, just thirteen days before the weather-induced deadline for an invasion of Poland which Hitler had been working towards, Molotov authorized discussions with Germany on the basis of Schnurre's dinner party. Politicking and negotiations proceeded at break-neck speed.

About that time, in mid August, unknown to all the world except Hitler's key associates and the Vatican, Germany's Roman Catholic bishops received top secret instructions on where priests should report for military pastoral care in accordance with the secret annex to the Concordat, and they were promptly summoned to meet in conference. It can only be assumed, in the absence of information to the contrary, that the new pope, Pius XII, made no effort to inform either Britain or France of the secret German instructions to the bishops and the designated chaplains. If he had done so it would have certainly changed the course of allied decision making. It may have precipitated a decision by the United States to oppose Hitler's plan and, in so doing, it may have changed the course of history. The decision to honour the secret annex to the concordat therefore stands as one of the seminal decisions of the war and there can be few better illustrations of the consequences of the church's self-understanding. In honouring its ghastly secret – a consequence of its pathetic and grovelling hunt for a concordat with Hitler's regime – the Vatican ensured that Europe would continue along the path to war and the Holocaust. If there is any justification for its inaction it is the fact that unless a decision to advise Britain or France also led to Hitler being deposed and to his Reich government being promptly overthrown, it would almost certainly have prompted a terrifying onslaught against the Catholic Church. (See chapter 18 for the negotiations for the secret annex.)

With no knowledge of those instructions, on August 18, after Halifax insisted that concessions would get very little positive result in exchange for worsening relations with the United States and China, the Japanese government was advised of Britain's decision: no change.

However, parts of two messages by the pope may have been intended to alert the allies to imminent crisis without disclosing his or Hitler's secrets. If they were, they were much too subtle. The message certainly did not register. In the first, issued on August 19, Pius XII said that the conflict which he was working hard to avoid would “by all forecasts surpass the previous one in destruction, in material and spiritual ruins” and the appeal to force would be “an unspeakable responsibility.”¹⁸⁶ However, even if the Allies missed the point it appears that the Fuhrer may have recognized it.

Hitler was becoming increasingly frustrated by Molotov’s resistance to cutting corners and his insistence that the economic treaty had to be finalized before a Non-Aggression Pact could be drafted. During the evening, following the publication of the pope’s first message, while Hitler waited nervously for word that the trade treaty had been signed, he relieved his feelings by ordering that 21 U-boats and two pocket battleships take up war stations in the Atlantic in readiness to attack British shipping. It is quite conceivable that he was irritated by that message which the pope had released. The German-Soviet trade treaty was finally signed on Moscow’s orders at 2am, after Hitler had given up waiting and gone to bed. That afternoon, Sunday, August 20, he wrote personally to Stalin, suggesting that a supplementary protocol and a pact should now be signed without delay. He said that Ribbentrop could fly to Moscow in two or three days time with full authority to draw up and sign both the protocol and the pact. Stalin agreed. On the same day Japan declared the Anglo-Japanese talks broken down and leaned further towards Germany. Then next day, August 21, with an unbridgeable gap between them over the question of Polish cooperation with Russian forces, the Anglo-French delegation met the Russian delegation in Moscow for the last time, without result.

GERMAN-SOVIET PACT BRINGS TURMOIL

It was also on August 21 that Hitler announced to his generals that a pact with Russia was about to be signed and the Soviet newsagency, Tass, broadcast that Ribbentrop was flying to Moscow to sign a Non-Aggression Pact. When “the sinister news broke upon the world like an explosion”¹⁸⁷ the British government turned its attention again to how it could pay for the arms which, quite clearly, it would have to negotiate with the United States in anticipation of a war with Germany. Over ten days from August 24 to September 3 the Treasury and the Bank of England rushed through regulations aimed at conserving US dollars, registering marketable securities and controlling all dealings in gold and foreign currencies. The Truman administration also took up the matter, ordering an assessment of Britain’s gold and dollar reserves, and stepping up its campaign to push amendments to the Neutrality Act through Congress. They were to face stiff opposition.¹⁸⁸

But the shock waves didn’t only affect the Western World and its church. They ran on through the Fascist regimes with which Hitler was linked in the Anti-Comintern Pact and they affected Japan more than any other country. The Japanese government had broken off its talks with Britain only the day before.

When Japan signed the Anti-Comintern Pact in 1936 a key reason for doing so was to gain Germany’s recognition of its puppet regime in Manchukuo (Manchuria) which it had set up in 1932 at China’s expense in the first stage of its own imperial expansion. That recognition was very important to Japan's international standing because it had withdrawn from the League of Nations in March 1933, a month after the League had refused to recognize its authority in the region. It had confidently precipitated a clash with Russian forces two years earlier, disputing an area on the Amur River which formed the southern boundary of the Bira-Bidzran Jewish settlement, before it began its campaign in China. With a favourable outcome it had then pushed on to consolidate Japanese control over Manchukuo, to sweep southward towards Central China and to nibble away at Russia's border regions in which it was interested at the same time. Japan was confident that Russia did not have the capacity to resist it and to maintain a defensive shield facing Hitler at the same time. But subsequently Germany did not give Japan any support in its dispute with Mongolia and the Soviet Union over the Khalkin-Gol zone on the Soviet-Mongolia-Manchuria border. In the summer of 1939, while the web of intrigue was being woven in Europe, the Soviet Union supported the semi-Soviet state of Mongolia in that conflict and Japan made no effective territorial gain. Its Russian border campaign came adrift. Then in August, while Ribbentrop was putting the finishing touches to the German-Soviet Non-aggression Pact with Molotov – in complete contradiction to the Anti-Comintern Pact and without taking Japan into his confidence – Russia mounted a full scale attack on the Sixth Japanese (Kwangtung) Army which had been “the heart of the Japanese army faction campaigning for a military alliance with Germany.” According to Russian figures, Japan suffered 50,000 casualties in the four-month campaign compared with 9,000 Russian casualties.

The Japanese government faced a crisis and was looking to its principal treaty partner for support. It was therefore deeply angered and suffered an embarrassing diplomatic setback when Hitler announced the German-Soviet Pact on August 21. Japan's code of behaviour had been dishonored and it had been betrayed by its treaty partner. The sudden announcement caused bewilderment and anger, especially in the Imperial Japanese Army, and stunned the Japanese ruling groups who thought Hitler had sold out his ally to Russia in order to save his own skin.¹⁸⁹ Japan was in real trouble and it had to look for its best option in a bid to stabilize its own situation, recover its authority and move forward towards its objective of a strong Asian economic bloc relieved of European and American domination. It certainly could not increase the pressure on Britain in its Chinese Concessions in the manner which was expected following the breaking off of the Anglo-Japanese talks.

By causing Japan to pause and reconsider its international relationships which appeared to focus on China, but which really focussed beyond China on the European question, Hitler had, quite unintentionally, handed Britain a windfall opportunity. By failing to consult Japan on the Russian question he had demonstrated very clearly that his alliance with Japan was purely a matter of strategic convenience; that he had no real sympathy for it; and that he had even less understanding of Asia than the other European leaders. Of course he had never claimed to have any real love for Asians, for Africans or for anyone other than Aryans. His entire philosophy and his policy were based on an assumption of Aryan superiority which was not seriously challenged in the White Christian West and therefore it should have been no surprise to anyone that he could totally ignore the consequences of his actions for his first Anti-Comintern Pact partner. Hitler was totally transparent. He did nothing to conceal the simplicity of his motives. He was still shouting them from the rooftops at every opportunity and Mein Kampf was being freely distributed in an ever growing list of languages – thirteen before the outbreak of war with Britain, plus another three during the war. But Britain was different. Together with the other White Western Christian powers it was, when it suited it, still justifying its presence as an imperial power in the non-European regions by its divinely imposed ‘responsibility’ to carry the white man’s burden of Christianizing the whole world. Its reward for lifting the rest of the world ‘up’ to Britain’s level of civilization and ethics was the commercial benefits of the task.

The world waited. Especially Britain. Japan could lean towards the Western Democracies in the hope of using their influence to solve the China Controversy, but in that case it would have to accept the continuation of some of the Extra-territorial Rights. On the other hand it could accept the shock of the German-Soviet Pact, rationalize its attitude towards Communism, and seek the support of both Germany and the Soviet Union in pushing the Western Powers out of the Asian region altogether. However Japan and the Soviet Union were still at war over a border dispute and Russia had its own options. It was not expected to convert the border incident into a full confrontation with Japan. But there was a distinct possibility that it might take advantage of its pact with Germany to look southward and attempt to push Britain out of China or even out of Asia altogether. If it did so, what would be Japan’s attitude to an Anglo-Soviet war in the region where it wanted a New Order for Asia? Then Britain itself. There were some foreign policy advisers who favoured appeasement towards Japan in the interests of stability in the Far East, but if this involved foregoing treaty privileges in China and forcing China into a peace settlement with Japan, it would alienate France and “irrevocably alienate Washington”¹⁹⁰ whose privileges would also then be forfeit. That would lead to a drop in the level of American assistance for the Allied war effort in Europe and possibly even tilt American public opinion in favour of Germany.

Thus, although there were dangers in which ever course it took, the initiative passed firmly to Britain – for a moment. At one stroke, by agreeing to negotiate a comprehensive treaty with Japan – under which it would relinquish the detested extra-territorial and trade rights in China which it had secured at the point of a barrel – it could have eliminated the crisis in the Far East, virtually locked the Soviet Union out of the region, reduced dramatically the significance of the Middle East and the Suez passage, and been able to concentrate on Hitler – without even having to withdraw its Christian missions from either China or Japan. It would have been concerned with only two theatres instead of three. However it would have to contend with Germany in a situation in which it had weakened its own alliances, possibly to the point at which it would have no allies in the war other than its far-flung dominions, while Germany would have uninhibited trade in raw materials with each of the Soviet Union, Japan and the United States. It would be in an unwinnable situation and it would have to make peace with Hitler.

Make peace with Hitler? How could it? The need to resolve the Jewish Question would make that impossible unless it was prepared to open Palestine as a lever on others to share in the resettlement of all Jews in the territories of the Reich. That was impossible – at least without concurrent resolution of the trouble in the triangle and there was absolutely no hope of that in the short term. It would very quickly be involved in a conflagration in the Middle East which would spell the end of empire. In reality Britain had got itself into such a situation that even eliminating one potential theatre of war was not going to solve its crisis.

Even before the German-Soviet Pact was a fact of life, on August 22, while Ribbentrop was preparing to fly to Moscow, Hitler set the provisional date for the invasion of Poland as August 26. He briefed his commanders accordingly, but not all of them were happy. They were worried about resources and control of access routes. That had become an issue immediately Britain rejected Hitler's offer of a peace settlement in return for a free hand in Poland and it soon became apparent that if war broke out it would escalate because Hitler had to secure both his access to raw materials from neutral countries in Europe and his access to Atlantic shipping to prevent being encircled by the British-French alliance. There was therefore a new imperative behind his want for 'breathing space', lebensraum. However Hitler had given the matter more thought than the Allies gave him credit for. He told his commanders during the briefing: "Today's announcement of the non-Aggression Pact with Russia came as a bombshell ... The consequences cannot be foreseen ...(but) ... we need not be afraid of a blockade. The East will supply us with grain, cattle, coal, lead and zinc."¹⁹¹

Then, within an hour of Ribbentrop's arrival in Moscow he and Stalin began their first meeting to finalize their Pact. Their meeting was quite a bit like the Munich Conference at which Britain, France and Germany decided Czechoslovakia's fate behind its back. It was just that the parties and their target had changed. Germany and Russia were deciding the fourth partition of Poland behind its back and that matter was the only one which caused significant debate before the Pact and the secret protocol were signed. In the event of a "territorial and political transformation of Eastern Europe" Germany proposed that Poland would be divided into Soviet and German spheres of influence with the question of whether any portion should remain independent to be determined later. Germany also wanted Lithuania plus the region of Vilna, and the southern half of Latvia, and proposed that the northern half of Latvia, Finland and Estonia would be within the Soviet sphere. However Stalin wanted all of Latvia and Bessarabia, between Russia and Rumania. Ribbentrop was not interested in Bessarabia but he phoned Hitler to check on the partition of Latvia. Hitler agreed that Russia could have it. The pact was complete. It was not signed until next day, but without waiting for the signatures Hitler immediately directed that the attack on Poland should begin as planned three days later.

BRITAIN'S GUARANTEE TO POLAND

Britain was worried. Its immediate response when the German-Soviet Pact was announced was to throw up a smoke screen of determination, to say that its obligations to Poland were in no way affected, and for Parliament to approve partial mobilization. It had been common diplomatic talk that the pope was trying to pressure Poland into making concessions to hold the peace, so Britain now chose to use his intervention instead of opposing it. Halifax badgered him to make a radio appeal condemning violence and recommending peace and, presumably responding to that approach, Pius XII went on world-wide radio to propose that as one “standing above all public disputes and passions” he could perhaps play a major role in preventing war.¹⁹² Next day, August 23, Chamberlain wrote personally to Hitler to say “... the German-Soviet Agreement cannot alter Great Britain’s obligation to Poland, which His Majesty’s Government ... are determined to fulfill” and that if necessary the government would “employ without delay all the forces at their command, and it is impossible to foresee the end of hostilities once engaged ...”¹⁹³ That brought a tirade of abuse from the Fuhrer for the British ambassador, Sir Neville Henderson, but that day, when Britain formally announced its mutual assistance pact with Poland, “confirming the guarantees already given,” was the only time his determination to meet his self-imposed deadline faltered.¹⁹⁴ He ordered a deferment while he continued negotiations with Britain through a Swedish intermediary, Birger Dahlerus.

Then, after his shouting match with Henderson, Hitler’s first conciliatory message was that he wanted “a move toward England which should be as decisive as the move towards Russia” and that he was “ready to conclude agreements with England which would not only guarantee the existence of the British Empire in all circumstances so far as Germany is concerned, but would also, if necessary, assure the British Empire of German assistance regardless of where such assistance should be necessary.”¹⁹⁵ In diplomatic parlance he had said that he would support Britain against a US push for the West Indies, against Japan’s push for Hong Kong and against Russian interest in the Persian Gulf region in return for a free hand in Poland. At the same time he stepped up the propaganda barrage against Poland for its anti-German atrocities, in the very familiar manner, and set his demands at such a level that Britain would eventually accept them while Poland would not, and a wedge would have been driven between them.

Next day, August 24, Craigie, seeing the opportunity to eliminate one of the three theatres of crisis and potential theatres of war, advised Halifax to renew the Anglo-Japanese talks and, on a broader scale, to push for a Sino-Japanese peace settlement. The immediate response of the Foreign Office was to support Craigie to some extent, authorizing him to make soundings on the trade questions, but telling him that the “peace talks were still too controversial.”¹⁹⁶ At the same time the so-called ‘moderates’ in the Imperial Japanese Army pushed for better relations with both Britain and the United States, and tentative moves were made to reopen talks with Britain. But British interests were determined not to let those rewards for carrying the white man’s burden slip through their fingers and even the trade talks soon proved a stumbling block.

THE BISHOPS TAKE A STAND

The German Catholic bishops were actually in conference from August 22–24, while Ribbentrop was in Moscow and the German-Soviet Pact was announced, and they apparently drafted their usual pastoral letter to go to all congregations in Germany, plus the occupied territories of Austria and Czechoslovakia, but they did not issue it immediately. It was issued a few days after war was declared. It read, in part:

*"In this decisive hour we encourage and admonish our Catholic soldiers, in obedience to the Fuhrer, to do their duty and to be ready to sacrifice their whole person. We appeal to the faithful to join in ardent prayers that God's providence may lead this war to blessed success and peace for fatherland and people."*¹⁹⁷

However on August 24, (the day the German bishops' conference closed), the pope issued another statement, the 'second message'. It appears to have been drafted as a response to Hitler's announcement of the pact between Germany and Russia which had, by then, become public knowledge, and it is reasonable to assume that it was drafted in collaboration with the Bishops' Conference.

Speaking over Radio Vatican, he said:

"Danger is imminent, but there is still time. Nothing is lost with peace. All may be lost by war. It is by the force of reason and not that of arms that justice advances. And empires which are not founded on justice are not blessed by God ... We make our appeal (to the strong and the powerful) through the blood of Christ whose strength, victorious over the world, was meekness in life and death."^{198 199}

There was still no indication of prior knowledge of the impending invasion of Poland, and the bishops' pastoral letter, already drafted, was withheld and released later, as if it were written after the invasion.

ZIONISTS MOVE INTO ACTION

The 21st Congress of the World Zionist Movement broke up prematurely on August 26 after a couple of days of intense discussions in the wake of the announcement of Hitler's deal with Stalin. Jewish diplomatic activity, both Zionist and non-Zionist, soon reached unprecedented proportions right around the world, but the Chamberlain government was feeling the heat more than any other.

In the absence of any strong reaction from the British, Hitler's hesitation had soon faded and, also on August 26, he issued the final order for the invasion to take place on September 1.²⁰⁰ In doing so, he showed clearly how little time he thought was needed for Britain to "do another Munich" or another Prague-type about-face, and that he was not really interested in anything less than his pact with Russia assured him of. He knew he was on the right track when he was woken that night to receive a message from Lord Halifax which reiterated Britain's desire to reach a peaceful settlement and stressed the need "to have a few days" to achieve it.²⁰¹

Dahlerus was sent back to London immediately with Hitler's six-point response, and a little after midday on Sunday, August 27, he was ushered into a most secret meeting to brief Prime Minister Chamberlain, Foreign Secretary Lord Halifax, Sir Horace Wilson and Sir Alexander Cadogan. He told them that Germany wanted a pact or an alliance with Britain; that Britain's part of the deal would be to help Germany obtain Danzig and the corridor, with Poland retaining the Baltic port of Gdynia, a corridor to it and a free harbour in Danzig; that Germany would guarantee the new Polish frontiers; that Germany was to have her colonies or the equivalent of them returned; that guarantees were to be given for the protection of the German minority in Poland; and that for its part Germany would pledge to defend the British Empire.²⁰² The British government was in shock at virtually being handed an ultimatum.

Faced with such a situation, embroiled in frantic diplomatic activity and with the situation from Britain's point of view continuing to deteriorate by the hour, Chamberlain was exasperated that the press was not reflecting his 'unbounded optimism' and that it may antagonize Hitler. He therefore asked Hoare, through Halifax, to renew his regular contacts with the newspapers. Hoare met them on August 28 and on each of the next three days with the instructions that they should try to keep the tensions down and "get the Poles and the Germans to negotiate." However the press was no longer interested in being a manipulated presenter of Chamberlain's policy. The Times had changed direction so that it was "the most resolute and bellicose paper of all" and on September 1, the day that Hitler finally invaded Poland, only Beaverbrook was represented.²⁰³

On his return to Berlin, Dahlerus relayed the somewhat imprecise British reply to Hitler but it is apparent that the basis of the message was that Britain was willing in principle to come to an agreement with Germany, that it wanted negotiations opened with Poland immediately, and that it would negotiate on colonies but not until Germany demobilized.²⁰⁴ Applying more pressure, Hitler asked for the reply in writing and said it should indicate clearly that "the Poles have been strongly advised to immediately establish contact with Germany and negotiate." Halifax dutifully instructed Ambassador Kennard to see Polish foreign minister Beck "at once" on the afternoon of August 28 and to obtain his authority for Britain to tell Hitler "that Poland is ready to enter at once into direct discussions with Germany." Beck equally dutifully obliged and by 10.30 p.m. that evening Henderson had returned to Berlin and handed Hitler Britain's formal reply.²⁰⁵

Even before Henderson returned to Berlin, some time earlier that day, the Japanese ambassador had actually talked with Halifax. He suggested that as Japan had been double-crossed by Germany, and Britain by Russia, London and Tokyo ought to improve their mutual relations.²⁰⁶ But their talk was to little avail. The government of Prime minister Hiranuma had been in turmoil. It resigned that day and was replaced by one led by General Abe Nobuyuki. It received no spontaneous gestures of goodwill from Britain, and the talks which subsequently took place were of a very restricted nature.

The parody was in full swing and the Fuhrer's orders, sanctified by the papal concordat, the bishops' blessing and their appeal for prayers for the success of his war, would come thick and fast to test the church's credibility and to give it a chance to redeem itself by rejecting those orders. Even that would have required some understanding of the parody and the causes of the trouble in the triangle.

FOR POLAND: YET ANOTHER CARVE-UP

One thing Hitler had omitted to say about his pact with Stalin was that it had a protocol attached under which their two countries planned another partition of Poland. As noted above: “In the event of a territorial and political transformation of the territories belonging to the Polish State, the spheres of interest of both Germany and the USSR shall be bounded approximately by the line of the rivers Narew, Vistula and San,” it said. Whether any independent Polish State should be maintained at all was to be determined in the light of further political developments. ^{207 208}

Hitler didn’t even take the pope into his confidence and yet it affected the Vatican’s interests in that vital buffer zone. But why should he mention it? Such a minor omission was quite consistent with the parody. When Britain and France signed the Sykes-Picot Agreement to partition the Ottoman Empire the world didn’t learn about it until after Lenin and the Bolsheviks had become responsible for the Tsar’s files. But after all, that was only Muslim Arab territory which Christian Europeans all believed they were fully entitled to. That was not the same as Christian European territory which nasty atheistic Communists and heretical Nazi Christians definitely were not entitled to. And there was another excellent precedent for secret protocols which was very dear to Hitler’s heart. It was the annex to the 1933 Vatican Concordat with Germany under which Roman Catholic priests would be assigned to military pastoral care duties in the event of Hitler waging war, and the pope had been perfectly happy to hold that in confidence. He expected to be handed control of religious affairs in Poland on a plate.

When the details of the pact and the partition of Poland later became known, the western allies cried “shame”! How dare Russia partition Poland in a bid to avoid war with Germany! What a dastardly act! The rest of the world was expected to believe that the partition of Czechoslovakia by Britain and France to avoid war with Germany was an heroic act of humanitarianism while Russia’s partition of Poland for the same reason was a brutal and inhuman act of self interest and empire building. In fact political morality had not changed one bit. Ribbentrop and Hitler were very happy. They had gained all they wanted and they did not expect a war. They did not expect Britain and France to honour their undertakings to Poland. Stalin also had reason to be happy. He was expanding the Soviet empire and he did not expect to be involved in a war. He could reasonably expect to remain aloof while the two imperialist and capitalist camps which he had referred to in his March speech – Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy on one hand and the Western democracies, Britain and France on the other hand – fought for their political lives in Europe.

Hitler was supremely confident of the success of his latest initiative. It was a major step in his march to reestablish the German empire and it was the focal point or the pivot on which his capacity to put into effect the key programmes of Mein Kampf hinged. He had prepared the ground with meticulous care with army, naval and critical civil authorities working to meet a deadline of August 25 ever since his special conference of May 23.²¹⁰ He knew he would have to fight his way this time and he had made it perfectly clear to his general staff that this would not be a simple victory by bluff, manoeuvre and negotiation. There would be bloodshed. This was the Jewish heartland of Europe; the Poles knew perfectly well from the events of recent months and from Mein Kampf what policies would be pursued and they were expected to fight rather than back off.

Hitler's confidence in the outcome was quite well founded. He had Russia's assurance, underpinned by the secret Polish protocol, that it would not intervene. He was smugly encouraged that the backing of his Roman Catholic bishops would ensure continued domestic support for his program. And he was confident that Britain's imperial insecurity and worldwide conflicts of interest, centered on the Middle East, would result in it failing to honour its latest guarantee just as they had in the case of Czechoslovakia. The whirlwind round of diplomatic activity since he announced the German-Soviet pact clearly pointed in that direction.

Hitler knew that the Arabs of the Middle East would support him fully, so did Britain, and if Britain sent forces to help the Jews in Poland ward off Hitler it would have to be able to reinforce its position in Palestine and the neighbouring Arab states to avoid a spontaneous uprising, absolute turmoil, and the certain loss of Suez and the oil fields. In addition, the Zionist Movement wanted its own army defending its interests in Palestine, and certainly not more British troops. But if Britain were to be seen to delegate military authority to a Jewish force, it would be interpreted as the first step towards relinquishing sovereignty to the Zionists and that would be anathema to the Arabs. Even a joint military force would represent shared military authority and shared sovereignty. So Britain was in a serious bind over the Jewish question and Hitler knew it. But in spite of that he had sufficient confidence in the fundamental strength of Britain and its ability to control and direct its enormous empire that he was supremely confident that its government would find some spot tucked away somewhere to provide a home for his Jews, even though it didn't love them enough to go to war for them. What was the use of an empire if one could not exploit its space as well as its people and its resources? That assessment of Britain's imperial authority was to prove the start of Hitler's undoing. The British government was no longer able to impose its authority on its empire in that manner. It knew it was going to be dependent on the units of the empire for its very survival.

So: the British Government agreed that a settlement between Germany and Poland was the first step but it said that everything turned upon the nature of the settlement and how it was to be achieved. Britain did not want any advantage at the expense of the independence of a state to which a guarantee had been given, it said. Poland had agreed to direct discussions, and Britain hoped that Germany would agree to this course, with safeguards for Poland's essential interests and its cultural integrity – an alternative way of saying safety for its Jewish population – and with international guarantees to secure the settlement.²¹¹ It is hardly surprising from the tone of that note that when Henderson met Hitler next evening, August 29, the reply that he was handed was such that he described it as an ultimatum. Hitler agreed "to accept the British Government's offer of their good offices in securing the dispatch to Berlin of a Polish emissary with full powers," and he counted on the emissary to arrive next day, August 30. He continued: "The German Government will immediately draw up proposals for a solution acceptable to themselves and will if possible, place these at the disposal of the British Government before the arrival of the Polish negotiator.”²¹²

While Henderson was delivering his note to Hitler in Berlin, Weizmann, in his capacity as President of the Jewish Agency for Palestine was delivering one to Chamberlain in London. It read:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister, In this hour of supreme crisis the consciousness that the Jews have a contribution to make to the defence of sacred values impels me to write this letter. I wish to confirm in the most explicit manner, the declarations which I and my colleagues have made during the last month, and especially in the last week, that the Jews stand by Great Britain and will fight on the side of the democracies.

Our urgent desire is to give effect to these declarations. We wish to do so in a way entirely consonant with the general scheme of British action, and therefore would place ourselves, in matters big and small, under the coordinating direction of his Majesty's Government.

*The Jewish Agency is ready to enter into immediate arrangements for utilizing Jewish man-power, technical ability, resources, &c. The Jewish Agency has recently had differences with the Mandatory Power. We would like these differences to give way before the greater and more pressing necessities of the time. We ask you to accept this declaration in the spirit in which it is made.*²¹³

And also at the same time there were frantic discussions taking place between a papal emissary, Fr. Venturi, and Mussolini, the pope's aim being to get the Duce to do what he could with Hitler to prevent war. Although he was no more eager for war than either the British or French, Mussolini was not eager to approach Hitler directly. He proposed instead that Pius XII should write personally to the Polish President urging him to announce that “Poland does not oppose the return of Danzig to Germany” and to link it with a proposal for negotiations with Germany towards “reciprocal rights for minorities.” The second clause was really a euphemism for ‘Poland will permit a bit more Jew bashing.’ Pius XII agreed, except that the note, sanctioned by him, was signed by the new Cardinal Secretary of State, Maglione, and despatched to the nuncio in Poland for delivery next day, August 30.²¹⁴

A series of meetings that day and the next, August 30 and 31, in both Berlin and London were a pure charade to enable Hitler to maintain the initiative while he waited for his armies to finalize preparation for the invasion on September 1 which he had no intention of stopping. Britain said it was impractical to arrange the meetings Hitler required and Germany said that as the Polish negotiator had not arrived the proposals drawn up as the basis of a settlement were out of date. But Britain continued to press Poland to negotiate, and Hitler kept up the barrage of propaganda against Polish atrocities and efforts to sabotage his peace proposals. Just after noon on August 31 he signed his Directive Number One for the conduct of the war. The attack was to commence at 4.45 a.m. next morning. The neutrality of Holland, Belgium, Luxembourg and Switzerland was to be scrupulously observed with no German forces crossing the western frontier without his express permission. Britain and France were to be isolated so that full responsibility for the opening of any hostilities on that front could be shown to rest squarely on them.²¹⁵ And Pius XII issued a last appeal in favor of peace, begging the governments of Germany and Poland to do their utmost to avoid incidents and steps which could worsen the “present tension.”²¹⁶

But the situation was complicated and Britain’s crisis deepened even more that day when Japan suffered a national humiliation with the decisive defeat of the Kwangtung army by the Soviet army at the disputed Manchuria border region. The immediate effect was that Japan abandoned its Russian adventure and withdrew to regroup and bolster its defence against the possibility of a major Russian attack from another quarter. It also had to curtail its thrust against the Western enclaves in China and against the Kuomintang who, in spite of continuing conflict with the Chinese Communist forces, were receiving support from Russia. The fighting in the Far East stopped for the time being. However, the new government was immediately forced to begin negotiations for a formal agreement with the Soviet Union. It then appeared that Britain’s interests in China and South East Asia may soon be under direct threat from Russia by a southward thrust through China in which Russia could either work with the British-American ally, Chiang Kai-Shek, or bypass him and work with the Chinese Communist Party. At the same time one of Britain’s remote options for defusing the crisis in the Far East, an alliance with Japan which would lock in the Soviet Union, was clearly about to close.

THE ACTION BEGINS

Bombs began to fall on Poland at dawn on September 1. The German armour made rapid progress towards Warsaw from north, south and west but the Poles fought tenaciously and succeeded in destroying the Dirschau bridge over the Vistula before the German forces could cross it and swamp Warsaw. Hitler cabled Pius XII to thank him for his message of the previous day and to explain how Poland had forced him to act by a series of border violations and failing to send their emissary in time. The pope said nothing.²¹⁷ Chamberlain told the House that day that England’s only quarrel with the German people was that they allowed themselves to be governed by a Nazi government. Its methods must come to an end before there will be peace in Europe, he had said, explaining the note which had been sent to Hitler. But he did not order military intervention.

When neither Britain nor France intervened it looked as if Hitler was correct. Their mutual assistance pacts would not be honoured and he would achieve his aim without even having to call on international backing. He knew he would not get it from Italy because Mussolini had told him several days earlier that Italy would not join the war against Poland because its resources had been depleted by its adventures in Ethiopia and Spain.²¹⁸ Mussolini now promptly told both Britain and France that he would not go to war against them either. He tried desperately to set up a Munich-style conference and actually got Hitler to release him from his obligations under the Pact of Steel.²¹⁹

However Hitler did get the support he was looking for from another source. The German Evangelical Church issued a statement next day, September 2, 1939 which read:

Since yesterday our German people have been called on to fight for the land of their fathers in order that German blood may be reunited with German blood. The German Evangelical Church stands in true fellowship with the fate of the German people. The church has added to the weapons of steel her own invincible weapons from the Word of God: the assurance of faith that our people and each individual is in God's hand, and the power of prayer which strengthens us in days of good and evil. So we unite in this hour with our people in intercession for our Fuhrer and Reich, for all the armed forces, and for all who do their duty for the fatherland.²²⁰

Chamberlain was no doubt hoping that God was going to support Magog as well as Gog (or was it the other way round?) and that he would be favoured by a similar declaration from the churches in Britain. It would have made his government's decision a lot easier.

Still neither Britain nor France intervened and both governments even advised Mussolini, and therefore Hitler also, indirectly, that their messages to Hitler had been only warnings and not ultimatums. The Fuhrer was left to make the running as he wished. His understanding of Britain's critical imperial position had been far more acute than that of most observers. When he offered to protect the British Empire in return for a free hand in Poland he had in fact touched the most delicate nerve possible and he kept the needle there as long as possible to enable him to consolidate his position in Poland. His problems were Mussolini's desertion, a vigorously antagonistic world press reaction, and Poland's success in delaying his sweep on Warsaw. A message was relayed through ambassador Fritz Hesse by Ribbentrop, in Hitler's name, for the British government about 7.30 p.m. on September 2, to the effect that provided England agreed to act as mediator between Germany and Poland, and provided also that Germany received Danzig and a road through the corridor, Hitler was prepared to move out of Poland and to pay reparations. Quite clearly the expectation was that with Britain and Poland around a conference table with him, and with some of the heat taken out of world reaction, Hitler would have achieved a piecemeal Munich-style occupation and in doing so he would be able to negotiate arrangements for the deportation of his Jews to his satisfaction. Surely Britain would not want to press that issue to the point of war.

However Chamberlain was not available to receive that message by phone before he spoke to parliament that evening and it appears that Hitler may have misjudged one important factor. It was the Jewish question which he was so determined to solve. Earlier in the day Chamberlain had formally replied to Weizmann's letter of August 29. He wrote:

Dear Dr. Weizmann, I should like to express my warm appreciation of the contents of your letter of August 29, and of the spirit which prompted it.

It is true that differences of opinion exist between the Mandatory and the Jewish Agency as regards policy in Palestine, but I gladly accept the assurance contained in your letter.

I note with pleasure that in this time of extreme emergency, when those things which we hold dear are at stake, Britain can rely upon the wholehearted cooperation of the Jewish Agency. You will not expect me to say more at this stage than that your public spirited assurances are welcome and will be kept in mind.

The failure of the Evian conference, Britain's rejection of the plan to resettle ten thousand German Jewish children and youths; and the tangle which Britain had failed to unravel at its February Round Table conference, had apparently incensed Hitler so much that he either misjudged the situation or was lulled into a false sense of security from an assumption that the Jewish community's political clout was deserting it. Neither had he fully grasped the impact of his Crystal Night, his pact with Stalin and the determination to fight which fear of the future under his heel had generated throughout the Jewish community. He certainly should have realized when his troops followed his bombers across the Polish frontier the previous day that the direct political pressure on governments and individual members of parliament in Britain and the United States would become enormous. There were about thirty Jewish members in the House of Commons,²²¹ or one in twenty of the total of just over 600 MPs compared with one in 100 for the population of the United Kingdom at that time, and there were also several very influential titled members in the House of Lords.²²² That was quite a change from the days of Baron Lionel Rothschild's struggle to gain a seat in the Commons. There were many others who were active supporters of Zionism and who were in no mood for either another round of appeasement or another round of militant anti-Semitism. Thus the House was in a hostile mood, urging a declaration of war, when Chamberlain rose to speak that evening, September 2.

He told members that no reply had yet been received to the government's previous note and that unless a reply was received with a German assurance of withdrawal from Poland, the government would be bound to take action. If Hitler did agree to withdraw the British government would be "willing to regard the position as being the same as it was before the German forces crossed the Polish frontier."²²³ "...that is to say, the way would be open to discussions between the German and Polish governments of the matters at issue between them, on the understanding that the settlement arrived at was one that safeguarded the vital interests of Poland and was secured by an international guarantee."²²⁴ There was no mention of the term 'Jews' or of population resettlement. Chamberlain added that he was waiting for the French to clarify their position because the two governments had to act in concert.

The similarity between Ribbentrop's message and Chamberlain's statement to parliament the previous day indicates that Hitler had hit the nail on the head, but the British Prime Minister had not received the message and there was a real threat of mutiny among government back benches who were not prepared to wait forty eight hours for a French decision. Chamberlain phoned Daladier immediately he left the house and told him the situation was very grave. There had been an angry scene and if France insisted on another two days wait his government would find it "impossible" to hold the situation. He proposed an 8 a.m. ultimatum to expire at midday but neither he nor Lord Halifax could persuade the French, who would bear the brunt of an attack by Germany, to agree.

It was then that Hesse arrived to convey Hitler's message in person but he could see only Sir Horace Wilson who was visibly impressed but reluctant to present it to cabinet because the situation had changed drastically. Roosevelt had secretly promised to help Chamberlain if he declared war and Russia certainly would not fight on Germany's side. Hesse talked hard and apparently persuaded Wilson to relay the message but as he was pondering whether to do so he received a note, thought to be advice of Chamberlain's decision to issue an ultimatum without waiting for France. He read it, destroyed it, pondered again, then turned to Hesse and told him he could not forward the message to cabinet.²²⁵ The die had been cast.

The next fifteen hours must have been sheer hell for Chamberlain. He knew that if he did not declare war against Germany before the house sat in emergency session next day, Sunday September 3, his government would be thrown out of office. Britain would face political turmoil and the units of its empire would be exposed to hostile piecemeal action from several quarters at the very moment in its history when unity was more necessary than ever before. On the other hand, he knew that if he did declare war he was committing Britain and its empire to a programme which it could only carry out at the cost of aggravating tensions which already existed in several units of the empire. The complex relationships, treaties and tensions which were involved were even more likely to encourage hostile action from several quarters. Chamberlain believed that Britain was even less able to cope with that situation and therefore the fragmentation of the empire was even more likely.

Britain was perilously close to a no-win situation unless it had a strong and dependable ally in the struggle which lay ahead, irrespective of which decision Chamberlain took. All the evidence suggests that Chamberlain realized this more clearly than most of those around him, even if he was no more clear on how Britain had floundered into such a predicament. And there was still no certainty of an ally to secure its position. The treaty with Germany which the amorphous gel had forced on Russia left France at imminent risk. The Craigie-Arita formula was only a means of retreat without honour in the Far East. It was not a means of securing an ally. Italy didn't want to fight with Germany but it certainly could not fight against it. That left only the United States. There were no other major powers. Roosevelt had promised his personal support but there was no certainty that he could persuade Congress and the nation to back him. And the political and commercial conflicts of interest in America which the debate of recent months had brought to light suggested that if it did support Britain against Germany the price would be high.

During a night of frantic political and diplomatic activity, much of which was not recorded for posterity, Chamberlain in London had to tell France that his options had run out and that Britain would give Hitler a two-hour ultimatum next morning. Another of his decisions, taken with reluctance, was to reappoint Winston Churchill and Anthony Eden to posts in the ministry, with Churchill also in the War Cabinet.^{226 227}

In Berlin Hitler was furious when he learned at 2 a.m. on Sunday, September 3, of the fate of Hesse's approach to Wilson. Ribbentrop had to take the blame for both that and Mussolini's decision to back away from war. Being in no mood to meet Henderson, Ribbentrop instructed Herr Schmidt of the foreign ministry to deputize for him and to accept the expected ultimatum at 9 a.m. Berlin time.²²⁸ However Ribbentrop was available two hours later, after a plan by Dahlerus, agreed to by Hitler, to arrange a meeting in London between Goering and the British government had been rejected at the British foreign office. He was quite ready to deliver the flat rejection and a defence of Germany's actions which he and Hitler had hurriedly prepared.²²⁹

GOG AND MAGOG AT WAR!

But within an hour Chamberlain had told the world, via BBC radio, that Gog and Magog were already at war. They were not his actual words but they convey the meaning of what he said. He had gained a temporary reprieve for his government but he had not been able to avoid the need for the amorphous Christian gel to act out the parody of Mein Kampf with Britain as a principal player. In all probability he had never read Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed or chapters eleven and twelve of the Mishneh Torah. It is also unlikely that he had read of Muhammad's Night Journey because it wasn't required reading for Christians although, as a Qur'anic Scholar, his new Dominions Secretary, Anthony Eden, could be expected to have some knowledge of it. And come to think of it, Chamberlain may not have read Barth's Epistle to the Romans either, because that sort of stuff was really only for the theologians!

Naturally very few people in Britain would admit to the Gog and Magog concept. It was quite proper to describe Hitler, Nazism and Mein Kampf as "a force of evil," at least after Britain was at war. But how could Britain and its allies with their peace-loving, Christian communities possibly be described as another "force of evil"? At least not unless you happened to have been born into a non-Christian community, or to have been born black, brown or yellow; physically or mentally handicapped; or at the bottom of the socioeconomic scale so that you had suffered discrimination or oppression at the hands of members of the amorphous Christian gel as they accumulated imperial wealth and power by virtue of their guns, your effort and your resources on their ritualistic, prejudice-studded sacramental path to salvation. Of course, according to their doctrines, even you could tread that path if you took part in an approved selection of their sacraments. Naturally you would accept the Gog and Magog concept if it could be shown that there was some direct link between what Hitler wrote in "Mein Kampf" and the policies and conduct of the amorphous Christian gel but there was no evidence of that ... was there?

The amorphous Christian gel's self-understanding and self delusion were so rock-solid that it would be quite a while before most people in the Western World would seriously consider any criticism of their historical conduct, let alone that of the current generation. And after all, the press had been telling them consistently that Hitler was 'the baddy' and everyone in the Western Alliance was among 'the goodies'. The press It was no wonder that as realization of the great conspiracy of silence dawned following the outbreak of war the reputation of the mainstream press fell to a new low. The circulation of those papers which opposed appeasement, and the private newsletters which sprang up after Munich, had increased in circulation strongly at the expense of those which had followed the Chamberlain line, but public confidence in the independent press was shattered. The prompt establishment of the Ministry of Information and a Press and Censorship Office trampled whatever credibility the press had left in the rubble of war²³⁰ and made it even more difficult for the population at large to understand what was going on around them.

India, with its deepening gulf between Hindus and Muslims, provided a prime example of the consequences of Britain's colonial policies and its promotion and preferential support of Christianity, but people in the amorphous Christian gel simply could not understand it. They were puzzled, rather than very concerned, when the Viceroy's declaration of war on September 3, immediately after that by Chamberlain, divided the nation even more. The Congress Party, with its deeply held pacifism, had previously served formal warning that it would not fight in other people's wars and that it was for India to determine whether it would join in any war or not. Its members therefore boycotted the central legislature meeting following the Viceroy's declaration of war at which a Defence of India bill was approved, even though Congress condemned Nazism and Fascism. Then, when its call for immediate Indian independence was refused, all Congress members resigned from their official positions and the Muslim community celebrated with a day of thanksgiving for deliverance from Hindu tyranny.²³¹ The situation was in sharp contrast with that when Britain imposed its discriminatory Victorian divide-and-rule education policies and the change was somewhat surprising, especially in view of the close links between the Muslim communities of India and the Arab countries. Britain's new dependence on Muslim support to keep its grip on India meant that the British government had to tread very carefully indeed in both areas and in its dealings with the Zionist movement.

The French declaration that France would fulfill its obligations to Poland "which are known to the German government," followed the Viceroy's declaration and was fully six hours after the British declaration of war. The French government and the military leadership in particular had tried desperately to find a compromise with Hitler, still using Mussolini and his ministers as intermediaries, but in the circumstances it was impossible. The great reluctance of both governments to declare war and their failure to immediately send any support to Poland meant that the initiative remained firmly with Hitler – especially as the two Western powers continued to make peace overtures until the fall of Warsaw while, at the same time, they continued discussions with Russia in a bid to undermine the German-Soviet pact. These discussions may have helped delay the partition of Poland by a few days but they also contributed to further confusion in international relations.

Reports in The Times next day, September 4, of parliamentary speeches relating to the declaration of war show the way in which the government was forced to change tack. The Prime Minister's speech was reported under the heading: 'MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S DECLARATION: HITLERISM TO BE DESTROYED' referred to his statement on September 1, then quoted from the letter which Ambassador Henderson had been instructed to deliver to the Foreign Office two hours earlier.

... I informed you [on September 1] on the instructions of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that unless the German Government was prepared to give His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom satisfactory assurances that the German Government had suspended all aggressive action against Poland and were prepared promptly to withdraw their forces from Polish territory his Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would, without hesitation, fulfil their obligations to Poland. Although this communication was made more than 24 hours ago no reply has been received, and German attacks upon Poland have been continued and intensified. ... [Emphasis added.]

The report then quoted directly from Chamberlain's speech. "...This is a sad day for all of us and to none is it sadder than to me. Everything that I have worked for, everything that I have believed in during my public life has crashed into ruins." That can only have been a reference to the concept of Britain's Empire. Then: "I trust I may live to see the day when Hitlerism has been destroyed and a liberated Europe has been re-established." That was Chamberlain's first parliamentary reference to 'Hitlerism' and his record over the previous three years suggests that his main interest in Europe was to see that the countries of the Continent and their colonies provided a buffer for Britain's imperial interests.²³²

Then Churchill. His established view of 'empire' in relation to the world was certainly no different to Chamberlain's, so he was somewhat flamboyant in his reference to 'saving the world'. But his attitude to Hitler was quite consistent. His ground had not shifted. Contradicting the tone of the government's letter to Hitler he said: "This is not a question of fighting for Danzig or fighting for Poland. We are fighting to save the whole world from the pestilence of Nazi tyranny and in defence of all that is most sacred to man. This is no war for domination or aggrandisement or material gain; no war to shut any country out of its sunlight and means of progress. [He should have said 'any Christian European country.'] It is a war, viewed in its inherent policy, to establish on impregnable rocks, the rights of the individual, and it is a war to establish and revive the stature of man.*"²³³

When it reported the reactions of the dominions the Times was remarkably measured. It had to be. The situation was very delicate indeed. Australia and New Zealand immediately declared war in support of Britain. Simple self interest and fear of their relationship with Japan forced them to. Canada's leaders declared their support for Britain and indicated that it was for parliament to decide the nation's action the next Thursday. On the other hand, as discussed above, India's British-appointed Governor General declared the country to be at war together with Britain and in doing so precipitated a constitutional crisis. South Africa was deeply divided, with the Prime Minister, General James Hertzog, calling for neutrality while the Deputy Prime Minister, General Jan Smuts, called for cooperation with Britain.

Hertzog, a nationalist and republican, had shown marked sympathy for Germany's cause and planned to keep South Africa neutral. He attempted to achieve that by extending the life of the Senate, thereby avoiding the public and parliamentary debate about the issue which would have been involved in an election, and by taking advantage of the fact that to declare war required parliamentary approval but to remain neutral did not. However he was forced to summon parliament on September 2 to pass the legislation required to extend the life of the Senate and his cabinet immediately split over the issue of neutrality or war in support of Britain. He sought a dissolution of parliament but the British-appointed Governor General, Sir Patrick Duncan, said he would not grant it if someone else, such as his deputy, a former prime minister and leader of the pro-British South African Party, could form a majority government. The issue therefore had to be debated in parliament. Hertzog's motion that the country determine to be neutral, was defeated by a vote of 80 to 67. General Smuts gained the leadership, formed a new government sympathetic to Britain, and declared war on September 6.

Outside the Commonwealth, the Republic of Ireland declared its neutrality. Roosevelt also proclaimed American neutrality but said there was no place for profiteering at the expense of those at war, and indicated where his sympathy lay. He referred to American belief in "spiritual values" and said that the overwhelming masses of the American people sought "peace at home and the kind of peace in other lands which will not prejudice peace at home."²³⁴ And Japan's Prime Minister announced that Japan intended not to be involved in "the European war" and would concentrate its efforts on "a settlement of the China affair."²³⁵

But there was an organization which did not represent a country which also declared its position immediately, on September 3, and announced that it was joining the war: the Jewish Agency. In Jerusalem the Jewish Agency and the Vaad Leumi, together and in accord with Weizmann's letter to Chamberlain, announced that "Britain's war against Nazi Germany is our battle." They said that registration had begun of volunteer Jews and Jewesses aged 18 to 50 "for national service in the first place to the Jewish community, and, secondly to serve in the British Army in Palestine in any way they may be called on."²³⁶ Next day Lord Victor Rothschild broadcast to the world via the BBC that Jews would throw their full support into Britain's war effort, and on September 6 the Times published the exchange of letters between Dr. Weizmann and Chamberlain which the Jewish Agency had made available.

The League of Nations had been due to meet in September to consider the status of the Palestine mandate in the light of the British White Paper but as a consequence of the declaration of war it did not meet. Britain maintained that as mandatory authority it could vary the administration of the territory and that its decisions did not require the approval of the council, but the Jewish Agency for Palestine took the view that the White Paper must lapse because it involved a significant change in direction which had not been ratified by the international body. In the circumstances the dispute was shelved. Ben Gurion made his declaration of support for Britain's war effort and Jewish Palestine adopted a state of armistice with Britain.

Hitler then knew that he had pushed Britain just too far. He had laboured under the misapprehension that its government could use its empire to find a place in which to settle his Jews. Now it had given them what amounted to an assurance of security by honouring its guarantee to Poland instead of doing another 'Munich'. He would have to find alternative solutions. In one sense he had a free hand. He could do more or less what ever he wished, as long as his own people would carry it out. But if he acted too swiftly it might aggravate his own problems by toughening the resolve of the Allies. Perhaps he should use a breathing space to explore his options. While he had them under his control they were always a bargaining chip and if he increased the pressure on them still further it might encourage them to press the Allies for alternatives, too, rather than suffer total degradation by staying where they were.

But Hitler's immediate concern was to counter foreign criticism that Germany was the only aggressor. He got a boost at home when the German Catholic bishops announced that:

In this decisive hour we encourage and admonish our Catholic soldiers, in obedience to the Fuhrer, to do their duty and to be ready to sacrifice their whole existence. We appeal to the faithful to join in ardent prayer that God's providence may lead this war to blessed success for Fatherland and people.²³⁷

That was a big help, but he wanted Russia to occupy its share of Poland, in terms of the secret protocol, as quickly as possible and a formal request that it do so was issued on September 5. However Russia was in no hurry for a number of reasons. The German-Soviet Pact had offended Marxist purists who believed that there should be no compromise with a Fascist regime, but the majority of Russia's people had accepted it as a way of staying out of western Europe's wars – especially in view of British and French efforts to force Hitler to take his colonial cut to the east. Quite apart from the fact that they were not aware of the protocol on Poland they did not like the idea of a simultaneous invasion. They were certainly eager to keep as much distance between German troops and their own borders as possible but equally certainly they did not want to be associated with Hitler's anti-Semitic antics in a simultaneous invasion of Poland. Such an association would be yet another threat to Stalin's efforts to succeed in non-Zionist Jewish resettlement and to develop a greater national cohesion through subordination of ethnic community interests to the national interest.^{238 239} But in addition there was the border argument with Japan at that very point – the Bira-Bidzhan Jewish settlement border area – and although it had defeated Japan in battle on August 31, there was as yet no agreement in place and Russia could not be confident that vigorously anti-Communist Japan would not regroup and try again.

The Russian response to Hitler's request was therefore to suggest a delay to a suitable time when it would issue a communiqué indicating that Russia's occupation of eastern Poland was to protect the population from German aggression. Naturally that was unacceptable. If Russia wanted any benefit from the pact it had to share the blame for the consequences or Germany would enjoy the benefits of occupying all of Poland.^{240 241} Then German troops reached the outskirts of Warsaw during the night of September 8–9 with greater ease than anyone expected. And while they could not break the Warsaw defences their advance to the east in the south of the country soon took them across the Vistula River and deep into the territory which was to be Russia's. Russia was under real pressure to make a decision and, unknown to the Western powers, horse trading between Germany and the Soviet Union took on greater urgency.

On September 11 US Ambassador Kennedy cabled a report to Roosevelt after a meeting with the King and Queen and the Lord Privy Seal, Sir Samuel Hoare. According to Kennedy, Hoare expected that after Hitler “cleaned up Poland” he would propose to call the war off and come to some agreement with Britain and France. Kennedy quoted Hoare as saying that the British Government realized that to continue the war or even to maintain the government on a war footing meant “complete economic, financial and social collapse and nothing will be saved after the war is over.” Kennedy advised Roosevelt that the British Government as such certainly could not accept any agreement with Hitler “but there may be a point when the President himself may work out a plan for world peace” and be “the savior of the world.”²⁴²

Roosevelt wrote, the same day, to Chamberlain and Churchill and confirmed where his sympathies lay. He told Chamberlain that he hoped and believed the US would repeal the embargo against the shipment of arms within a month and that this was a definite part of his administration’s policy. His note to Churchill established close personal contact between them for the first time. Mr. Churchill (later Sir Winston) had been re-appointed to cabinet with the dual roles of First Lord of the Admiralty and a member of the War Cabinet after a long spell in the political wilderness because of the fiasco at the Dardanelles in the first world war. At the same time Roosevelt advised Kennedy, through the Secretary of State, that he saw no opportunity or occasion to initiate a peace plan and that the people of the US would not support any peace plan which made possible “a survival of a regime of force and aggression.”²⁴³

Also on September 11 the principal Jewish military group in Palestine, the National Military Organization (IZL) distributed leaflets in Tel Aviv advising that it was suspending its terror campaign in order to join Britain in the fight against Hitlerism,²⁴⁴ and the Hagana discontinued its terrorist attacks on British facilities – but the Stern Gang did not.

Next day, September 12, while Hitler waited for Stalin to reach a decision, serious top level discussions began in Berlin about how to administer occupied Poland. Field Marshall Keitel (head of Higher Command) told Admiral Canaris (head of Intelligence) that the fuhrer had decided on a purge aimed primarily at the aristocracy and the clergy, and that if the army was not willing to carry out the task it would have to agree to the SS and the Gestapo working alongside it. Over the next eight days a forum of Hitler and key advisers met to plan a system of administration and responsibility for operations.²⁴⁵

JAPAN’S TURN TO TALK TO RUSSIA

Stalin’s position was then strengthened on September 15 by the signing of the Soviet-Japanese Agreement which he had been waiting for.²⁴⁶ Stalin assured the Japanese that he preferred Hitler to Britain, which “grinds in the dust Hindus, Arabs, blacks in Africa and workers at home” and that he had nothing but contempt for France which had deserted Czechoslovakia in its hour of need.” And Hitler explained his pact with the Soviet Union to the Japanese by his need for security in the east while he concentrated on Britain and France in the west.²⁴⁷ The Anti-Comintern Pact was effectively dead. The Soviet Union was the big winner because its two fronts, west and east, were both protected by a pact or an agreement. It was relieved of the major distraction of Japan nibbling at its long south eastern border, and it could concentrate on other things. After a final couple of days of politicking and indecision, during which Stalin clearly held the stronger hand and Hitler had to agree to negotiate further concessions to be sure that his pact would hold together, Soviet troops crossed the Polish frontier on September 17 and swept through to Brest Litovsk where they met the German forces next day. There were distinct benefits for Japan as well. Assured during its negotiations for the Soviet-Japanese Agreement that the Soviet Union had no designs on its territory, Japan was able to regroup, and, having had another change of government on August 28, throw everything it had at China's European enclaves – and in particular the British at Tientsin.

Three days after the meeting of the German and Soviet troops, September 20, Hitler's forum held its final meeting on the administration of the occupied Polish territories under Heinrich Himmler as Commissioner for the Consolidation of German Nationhood. One region would be annexed to the Reich and the other would be known as the Generalgouvernement and would be administered by the occupying forces with Hans Frank as head. The Polish elite, intelligentsia and Jews living in the annexed area would be either liquidated, imprisoned or expelled to the Generalgouvernement where the primitive Poles would be used as migrant labour while the Jews, still Hitler's potential bargaining chip, would be concentrated in ghettos within the cities to facilitate their surveillance, their use as a labour force and their eventual deportation. The first phase of his Lebensraum plan was about to be implemented: Germans would be immediately resettled in the annexed region as it was purged of its indigenous populations.²⁴⁸

Next day Heydrich issued more detailed orders on The Problem of the Jews in the Occupied Areas to the Einsatzgruppen commanders. Priority was to be given to purging certain areas; Jewish Councils, comprised of rabbis and people of influence and known as Judenrat, were to be established to administer the ghettos and other population concentrations; an assessment was to be made of Jewish owned businesses, their integration into a four year production plan and their Aryanization.²⁴⁹

While Hitler's main immediate interest was the Jewish question, Poland's population of 35 million was mainly Catholic, it had the benefit of Pilsudski's concordat, its army and its civilians had fought tenaciously with mounting casualties which were to reach 70,000 killed and 130,000 wounded in the five-week campaign, but up to this date, in contrast to his intervention before the German offensive began, Pius XII had resisted every call for him to make a statement. His 'neutrality,' or failure to denounce Hitler baffled the British and French but shocked the Poles. The Polish ambassador at the Vatican was so frustrated that the Holy See's services were not even announcing to the world what was happening that he prevailed on the Polish government to send the Polish Primate, Cardinal Hlond, to Rome to intercede personally with the pope. When he arrived on September 21 he was warmly received by Pius XII, but the pontiff still refused to speak on Poland's behalf. He simply agreed to give Hlond access to Vatican Radio, which was run by Ledochowski, to make his own broadcast.²⁵⁰ Various explanations have been offered for the pope's silence. The main ones being that he hoped by neutrality to be able to exercise a position as a super-negotiator, and that he feared the consequences for Catholics in Germany and the occupied regions of Poland and Czechoslovakia

if he were to denounce the invasion and the brutality. While both may have been part of his consideration they are not adequate in view of the fact that the Poles were appealing for him to speak up and they believed that Hitler could hardly make their plight any worse. It is therefore reasonable to conclude, in view of what we now know about the pressures which were brought to bear on the drafters of Humani Generis Unitas, that his major concern was fear that Hitler would apply pressure on Mussolini for the reopening of the Roman Question and that he saw the future of the Vatican State at risk.

Until the signing of the Soviet-Japanese agreement the United States had been happy to see Japan preoccupied with Russia but, like Britain and France, it now feared a pincer movement if Russia decided to dump Chiang Kai-shek and support only the Chinese Communist forces in a push southward. Similarly, like Britain, it had reason to fear a Russian push through Iran to the Persian Gulf as well. The Middle East was not yet central to its foreign policy as it was to Britain's, but the oil tycoons of the United States had reason to be well pleased with the events of the first half of 1939. They were very conscious of the legacy left by the earlier round of manoeuvring between Britain and Tsarist Russia. They certainly didn't want to be pushed out of the region by Russia coming in the back door, either on its own or in an alliance with Germany which had also been outmanoeuvred by Britain (and France) over its proposals for a Berlin-Baghdad-Basra railway. The wealthy, conservative industrialists and financiers of the US who had been competing with Hitler in the screaming match for the title of principal Communist hater because of the nasty Bolshevik policy of public ownership of natural resources, were just as shocked as Britain to find themselves facing an alliance between the two powers whose economic and political policies were at the opposing extreme ends of the recognized scale.

Britain had been stunned to find that what French Premier M. Daladier had foreshadowed in April was happening. Hitler was being relieved of the need to look east and could now look west. The buffer of potential alliances had been neatly dismantled. The entire fabric of Britain's Empire was now clearly at risk with its vital interests in the Middle East under triple threat from Germany, Russia and the United States, and with its Far Eastern interests under dual threat from Japan and Russia. The British government knew that on no account must anything which threatened its interests in the Far East divert it from its prime objective: the security of the British Isles. It could not protect its interests and possessions in the Yellow Sea from Japanese attack and the farthest point it could defend was Singapore. It was vital for that 'fortress' to hold out "until the Mediterranean was safe and the Italian fleet liquidated," and Japan was not expected to mount an early invasion of Singapore provided that it was adequately garrisoned and supplied with food and ammunition for at least six months.²⁵¹

Therefore, relying on a United States 'presence' in the region to act as a deterrent, it also advised all British subjects to evacuate Japan and Japanese-occupied areas of China. Japan, relieved of the restraining British opposition, was then able to concentrate on China. The United States eagerly moved to fill the void left by Britain, anticipating that it could succeed to the European powers' role of overlord of Asia, but Japan was not at all eager for it to do so. It ordered all Christian missionaries out of Korea and began a campaign of repression to rid the region of all signs of those ghastly subversive religious institutions which had provided the excuse for European and American military intervention so often in the past. German businessmen were allowed to stay in Japanese-occupied China but they were expected to cut all links with Chiang Kai-shek and to back the Japanese position in return for Japanese support of the German and Italian positions in Europe.²⁵²

LORD ROTHSCHILD'S BROADCAST

Such was the atmosphere in which governments could reflect on Lord Victor Rothschild's broadcast to the world that Jews would throw their full support into Britain's war effort. Few people knew the extent to which the affairs of the House of Rothschild had been enmeshed in the manoeuvring which preceded the war and it is debatable whether it would have been helpful for the world to know because of the depths to which Anti-Semitic prejudice had fallen at the time. It may have helped to bring the pot to the boil more quickly so that the trouble in the triangle could have been worked through and possibly resolved without the enormous complications of the nuclear age. But because the conspiracy of silence was so effective the world did not know and the plot thickened as the parody ran its course. And of course that particular aspect of the conspiracy of silence, unlike that which related simply to economic policy matters, had been developed because of the depths to which religious bigotry had fallen so those directly involved were caught in a vicious circle.

The financial support of Europe's most influential Jewish family, prompted in part by recognition of its role in the Vitkowitz affair and the ransom of Baron Louis de Rothschild, was of considerable importance as the British government prepared for war. Perhaps it cannot be compared with the family's backing of certain European governments during the nineteenth century because of the great changes in financial and corporate structures since the Great War, but it was still important.^{253 254}

However it was the international political implications of Lord Rothschild's broadcast which were of far greater importance. As head of the English House of Rothschild he was accorded something like the status of lay head of the Jewish community in Britain and although the World Zionist Organization had become the focal point for political affairs, with a gulf developing between the Jewish communities east and west of the Atlantic over the implementation of Zionist policy, the name "Lord Rothschild" still aroused an emotional response in Jewish communities worldwide. But his authority did not rest solely on his name. He took an active interest in the Central British Fund for German Jewry and in December 1938, while his cousin Baron Louis was coming under intense pressure from Himmler to resolve the question of control of Vitkowitz, he was instrumental in setting up Lord Baldwin's Fund for German Refugees.^{255 256} His broadcast therefore took on the character of a rallying call for Jewish community support for Britain and its war effort throughout the empire and beyond. In particular it served notice to President Roosevelt and his administration that pressure for the United States to enter the war against Germany would increase sharply. It did. The Hollywood film producers found neutrality increasingly difficult to justify. The Warner Brothers advised Roosevelt that they wanted to do all within their power, using the talking screen, “to show the American people the worthiness of the cause for which the free peoples of Europe are making such a tremendous sacrifice” and Nick Schenck offered to place his entire studio at the president’s disposal “in connection with the movie of national defence and foreign policy” in which he was interested.²⁵⁷

In Europe the inherent mistrust between the Communist and Nazi regimes came to the surface very quickly after the invasion of Poland and manouvring about which power should occupy which sections of Poland and the Baltic States began in earnest. Because of Russia’s late start Germany had occupied some provinces of Poland beyond the frontier agreed in the protocol. It had no option if the Polish defence was to be silenced but Hitler was prepared to vacate them. However they were home to a substantial population of zealously nationalistic Polish Jews, and Stalin was well aware that if Russia annexed those provinces it would aggravate its domestic problems. Notable among these was Jewish resettlement in the BiraBidzhan project which directly abutted the River Amur and two strategic islands which commanded the Vladivostok railway and which Japan had been contesting.²⁵⁸ In fact the resettlement of refugees from Eastern Europe in BiraBidzhan was specifically forbidden.²⁵⁹ If Stalin was not very careful, the issue of Zionism, which had been so divisive and which he had been at great pains to keep separate from the question of Judaism as a religion, would boil over again and Russia would be engulfed once more in the problem which he was perfectly happy to leave for the Western powers to sort out.

The consequences of his own decisions would soon prove that he could not stand aloof from the issue of Zionism but in the meantime Stalin was eager to try. He also wanted the best strategic buffer between Russia and Germany and the most secure access to the Baltic which he could achieve. He therefore took charge personally of frontier negotiations with Germany and forced Hitler to concede a little extra of Poland and to do a swap of Lithuania for the two provinces of Poland which he had already occupied. He gained the buffer which he wanted; he gained control of Germany’s main access routes to Rumanian oil and Ukrainian wheat so that Hitler had to bargain for them; and he gained his more secure access to the Baltic. But against that, he became embroiled in the issue of Zionism in a manner which he could not have anticipated.

While Hitler and Stalin were negotiating over Poland and the Baltic countries, the British government was agonizing over the consequences of the Soviet-Japanese Agreement and whether it was worth diluting economic warfare measures designed to cripple Germany for the sake of gaining Japan’s “benevolent neutrality” and thereby neutralizing the Far East as a third potential theatre of war. Whitehall knew that the struggle to retain British interests and investments in China now had to be considered within the wider task of ensuring that events in the region did not undermine the task of winning the war in Europe.²⁶⁰ The obvious approach was to work for a speedy end to the Sino-Japanese war so that Britain’s role in that war was no longer a major source of tension in Anglo-Japanese relations. But, as already noted, that approach assumed that Britain would forfeit its privileges in China either as a positive initiative in that peace process or as a passive outcome, so there was great reluctance to adopt that approach. People seldom surrender a position of privilege, regardless of how it has been gained, without either a fight or substantial pressure – especially as communities or corporate bodies.

AN ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE?

However not everyone was taking that view. The Parliamentary Undersecretary for Foreign Affairs, R.A. Butler, circulated a memorandum in which he argued that the international situation, and especially confusion about Soviet motives, made it essential for Britain to rebuild its bridges with Japan. He maintained that, regardless of the recently signed agreement, Russia and Japan would remain enemies; it did not appear that there were the makings of a war between America and Japan because “the American interests in the Far East are insufficient to justify a major war”; and it would pay, in view of Britain’s interests in India and the Far East, to return to an Anglo-Japanese Alliance. He said Britain should not distrust everything Japan does for the sake of American opinion and “it is still possible to obtain American interest on our side in fighting dictators in the West, while improving our relations with Japan.”²⁶¹

Butler’s initiative coincided with growing concern within the Japanese government that following the outbreak of war between Britain and Germany, Japan’s access to raw materials from the British Empire may be restricted. A consular telegram to that effect was intercepted and decrypted on September 19, but instead of using that knowledge as a starting point for discussions to ease tensions in the Far East the British Foreign Office and Board of Trade sat on it as a piece of intelligence to use as a lever in the negotiations which they expected Japan would now seek. They did not have to wait long.

On September 22 Craigie was approached by a senior Japanese general with a proposal for direct talks between the Japanese Prime Minister, General Abe Nobuyuki, and Chiang Kai-Shek which he claimed had the support of the Japanese Foreign Office. Clearly if the Sino-Japanese war ended in a peace agreement reached on the initiative of Japan with Britain acting as an ‘honest broker’ there was less likelihood of the loss of all of its privileges.

Then, as expected, a proposal to reopen trade negotiations was received next day, September 23. Japan proposed that Britain would have continuing access to Japanese food stuffs and silk in return for Japanese access to British machinery and raw materials from the dominions and colonies. The Foreign Office agreed. The Ministry of Economic Warfare (MEW) showed little interest because its campaign against Germany was not likely to be affected.

That day the War Cabinet approved a new attempt to start talks with Japan. Trade negotiations began, but opposition soon came from a surprising source and there was no certainty that the British government would accept the role of an intermediary in Sino-Japanese peace talks. On September 28, (the day the Soviets and Germans resolved their differences over Poland), the Chiefs of Staff advised cabinet that because Italy’s ambitions were still unclear, there was a great necessity to prevent any extension of the [European] war to East Asia and that, in their view, the best way of achieving this was to ensure that the war in China continued to act as a drain on Japan's resources. At the same time the Board of Trade turned luke warm, wanting the emphasis put on concessionary British exports to Japan and relaxation of restrictions on British trade with occupied China. In spite of those reservations, Whitehall talks continued, and the channels were kept open even though progress was dampened from October 6.^{262 263}

SEALING THE FATE OF POLAND'S JEWS

The Hitler-Stalin negotiations which had begun on September 5, when Hitler requested the Russian invasion, through the signing of the Soviet-Japanese Agreement on September 15, the Soviet invasion of Poland on the 17th and the occupation of Warsaw on the 27th were finally concluded with the signing of the revised pact on the same day, September 28, that the British cabinet decided to continue playing China and Japan against each other rather than making a bid for a peace settlement. The negotiations had peaked between the 19th, when Stalin let it be known he was no longer interested in a rump Polish state, and the 27th when Stalin offered Hitler two alternative partition plans, both of which favoured Russia, and forced him to make a choice. Hitler, outmanoeuvred, could not tell Stalin to "put up or shut up" because he could not risk wars with Russia, France and Britain all at once unless he was sure of superiority on both fronts. He had to silence the eastern front before he could tackle the west. He agreed to keep the territory in the south which his forces had already occupied and he gave Russia control of Lithuania.

In Stalin, Hitler had met his match as an opportunistic negotiator. He could not bluff Russia into agreeing to his schemes as he had bluffed Britain and France because of their insecurity and he was forced to deal with a somewhat greater population of Jews than he expected in his expanded occupied area: the Generalgouvernement. He wanted a free hand to deal with them and a guarantee from Stalin that he would not intervene in return for control of Lithuania. He pressed for, and Stalin agreed to, another secret protocol, to the revised partition plan. Stalin probably pondered the question: 'What harm could it do?' He couldn't stop Hitler anyway unless, unlike Britain and France, he was prepared to go to war over the issue. It read:

*"Both parties will tolerate in their territories no Polish agitation which affects the territories of the other party. They will suppress in their territories all beginnings of such agitation and inform each other concerning suitable measures for this purpose."*²⁶⁴

On September 29 Jack Philby appeared on the Middle East negotiating scene again, telling Professor Lewis Namier, a Zionist at Manchester University, in fairly plain terms that if Ibn Saud received financial support and armaments from other sources he would reject German overtures. By implication this was to relieve the pressure on the Jews in Europe and to help get Britain out of its crisis in the Middle East. Namier arranged a luncheon meeting at which Philby put to Weizmann and Moshe Shertok (Sharett), political secretary of the Jewish Agency, that in return for 20 million pounds Sterling "the whole of Palestine should be left to the Jews." Exactly where Philby's proposal originated is a matter of speculation.

However, from that point on two things were evident. First: if the Zionists and the Arabs accepted this blatantly British bribe proposal to enable the resettlement of Europe's oppressed Jews, the Vatican would have to dramatically revise its strategy to prevent the return of the Jews to a formal Jewish homeland in Palestine and to maintain its erroneous self-understanding. Second: that the Vatican would also have to change its strategy if it was to bring down Soviet Communism. The German and Russian dictators were at the extreme poles of political, economic and social philosophies but they represented the two major philosophical and external challenges to the church, to its doctrines, its selfunderstanding and the conduct of the enormous amorphous Christian gel of which it was the nucleus. The two dictators had been forced into an alliance which nobody expected – least of all themselves – by circumstances determined by the conduct of the same amorphous Christian gel while the world, without realizing it, witnessed and acted out the parody of Mein Kampf. They both recognized the consequences of Western Christian colonial policies and their countries had both suffered from them. A major distinction between them was that Hitler was determined to take maximum advantage from those policies while Stalin found them absolutely abhorrent and had set out as a young revolutionary determined to dismantle them. And yet there he was, responding to the trouble in the triangle by collaborating with Hitler in the most shameful colonial episode in history. It was the parody par excellence of European Christian colonialism. And when Stalin's negotiating success weakened Hitler's relative strength it even prepared the ground for another round of hostilities through bitterness and mistrust in exactly the same manner as any other exercise in colonialism.

Stalin's agreement to the additional secret protocol confirms that he knew of and was prepared to acquiesce in Hitler's plan to ruthlessly suppress the Jews of Poland but it is unreasonable to suppose from that that he knew of Hitler's death squad and gas chamber extermination plans. The Fuhrer's general plans for Poland's Jews had been shouted from the rooftops so effectively that Stalin's opposite numbers in the West knew at least as much as he did, and they were the reason for such intense pressure on the British, French and United States governments to go to war since the invasion on September 1st. While there is some evidence that Hitler talked Jewish extermination with Herr Heydrich during the negotiations with Russia,²⁶⁵ in the context of preparing for mass migrations, there does not appear to be any evidence that he let it slip to the Russians. This is supported by the fact that it was more than two years before he gave orders for gas chambers to be built and by then he had been at war with Russia for six months. But the political capital which Stalin was able to make out of the Jewish question during those months turned sour very quickly indeed. When the protocol became known he faced a torrent of abuse and propaganda to the effect that his anti-Semitism had contributed to the Holocaust. Zionist interests exploited it cleverly in the run up to the United Nations decision to partition another country – Palestine – and Capitalist interests then picked it up to exploit Jewish community feelings and support in their deepening confrontation with Communism. But that is jumping ahead again.

On September 30, two days after Hitler and Stalin reached agreement on the revised partition plan for Poland with its secret protocols, the Minister for Reich Ecclesiastical Affairs, Herr Kerrl, sent a message to Cardinal Bertram that the entry of German troops into Warsaw was imminent and that a celebration would be appropriate. The Roman Catholic Church thereupon immediately, and dutifully, began a week of noon-hour bell ringing at all churches in Poland in “joyful celebration” and out of “grateful commemoration” of Hitler’s victory.²⁶⁶ Whether the justification for that display was the amnesty which Hitler declared a week after the invasion for churchmen who had spoken against Nazis, or whether it was the Vatican’s concordats with either the victor, Germany, or the vanquished, Poland, it helped to give public credibility to Hitler’s claims that Poland welcomed him. In turn, the welcome helped to support his claims that the state had been an artificial nonviable concoction of Germany’s enemies, and that he wanted peace.

So, as Germany’s offensive against Poland entered its second month and Hitler’s sanitation squads began rounding up Central and Eastern Europe’s Jews for deportation to labour camps, his argument with Britain and France progressively escalated into the second world war but Britain had great difficulty persuading those whom it needed as allies to support its case against Germany. Certainly the US administration was attempting to get changes through Congress to permit sales of armaments to Britain for cash, but it faced strong opposition. Senator William E. Borah, leading the opposition attack on October 2 mocked the proposal on the grounds that any country already experiencing financial problems and unable to pay even the interest on their World War I debts would be able to pay cash for additional arms for any length of time. He said that if the United States departed from its neutral stance and began supplying Britain for cash it would not have the heart [perhaps that should have been ‘gall’] to refuse continuity of supplies simply because Britain no longer had the ready cash. In other words, the United States would be underwriting Britain’s war without any guarantees. He scorned a ‘dollars and cents approach’ to “the salvation of the democracies” and in an apparent contradiction to his argument that the US should remain isolated and neutral he said: “We cannot stand up before the world and say, ‘We will help save democracy, we will help save our civilization,’ and in the next breath say, ‘We will do so only provided you pay cash’.”²⁶⁷

In other words, Borah and the isolationist lobby wanted the US to stand aloof, let the powers of Europe fight it out, and supply everyone who wanted arms and other strategic resources in a free trade environment. Was it a philosophy of the survival of the fittest, or dog-eat-dog? Hitler would have been delighted to hear the debate raging. He would have been especially delighted that nothing was said in anger about two arrangements between companies controlled by members of the Rockefeller family and some of Germany’s key war industries. In one, negotiated during 1939, the Chase National Bank secured $25million for Germany and provided information to authorities in Berlin on ten thousand Nazi sympathizers in the United States. In another, Standard of New Jersey was shipping oil to the Nazis via Spain and continued to do so throughout the war except for a break of a few months.²⁶⁸

The main reason the Roosevelt administration made little effort to defend its policy in favor of the Western Democracies was that it knew very little about the financial structure of Britain and France or their ability to pay, and self interest was still the driving motive. Roosevelt wanted no admission made that the legislation was intended to aid Britain and France against Germany and for its defence to be that it was the only way to establish true neutrality and to avoid America being dragged into war. On the other hand he left no doubt that while he wanted to favor the Western Allies on a cash'n'carry basis, and legislation could be introduced to enable government-to-government loans, American citizens should not be permitted (or required) to extend credits to belligerents.²⁶⁹ The prevailing public opinion was that the Western Allies had grown rich at the expense of the rest of the world, their empires represented bottomless pits of wealth, and they should therefore finance their own wars. In addition, belief that the allies could win was declining. Less than 30 percent of Americans favoured intervention to prevent a Hitler victory, and just as few people supported lending money to the countries opposing him.²⁷⁰

After he and Stalin had agreed how to partition Poland Hitler wasted no time in preparing orders for the administration of Germany's share. Dr Frank informed the army of them on October 3.

*Poland can only be administered by utilizing the country through means of ruthless exploitation, deportation of all supplies, raw materials, machines, factory installations, etc., which are important for the German war economy, availability of all workers for work within Germany, reduction of the entire Polish economy to absolute minimum necessary for bare existence of the population, closing of all educational institutions, especially technical schools and colleges in order to prevent the growth of the new Polish intelligentsia. Poland shall be treated as a colony. The Poles shall be the slaves of the Greater German Reich.*²⁷¹

What joys the church was helping the Poles celebrate! Warsaw was a city totally subjugated next day, October 4, when to the ominous sound of those joyfully pealing church bells, Hitler issued a special amnesty "to commemorate the victory concluding the battle imposed on us by Poland." But it was not an amnesty for the Jews. Its intent was that "actions carried out in the occupied Polish territories from September 1 until now, to express resentment of atrocities committed by the Poles, are not to be investigated as criminal acts." No one was to feel restrained in encouraging the Jews to migrate. But to what country? According to Philby it was about then, early October, that the Zionist leadership accepted the proposition of a 20 million pound payment for the opportunity of mass Jewish resettlement in Palestine. The occasion was a second luncheon at the Athenaeum at which Philby's son Kim, by then a well-established Soviet agent, was also present and was, one presumes, "feeding a great deal of intelligence to Moscow about his father's schemes."²⁷²

Hitler's staff were also acting on his orders to draw up plans to invade the West, but Britain and France continued their efforts to find an 'honourable' way to respond to his offers of peace, and Dahlerus made another shuttle between Berlin and London. Britain desperately needed the men of its dominions and colonies to fight its war for it to be able to keep its imperial grip but its dominions and colonies didn't necessarily want to send them to fight its wars again. But that was only a part of its continuing bind. If it didn't act to save the Jews of Poland either by a war to stop Hitler, by further territorial appeasement, or by providing Palestine as a national home for the Jews in conjunction with mass resettlement elsewhere, then it would certainly face a war in the Middle East coupled with a series of conflicts around the world which, together, threatened its empire.

The majority of Jewish leaders, and in particular the Zionist leadership, understood Britain's immediate plight more clearly than most people in the Western World because they had lived with the deepening crisis so intimately. They therefore knew that there could be no "final solution" to the Jewish question – in their terms, not Hitler's – until Hitler was disposed of. This meant that although they were not prepared to reduce the pressure on Britain for refugee resettlement in Palestine, they realized that it could be counterproductive to push for a political and territorial settlement while Hitler survived and to restrict their pressure to Britain alone. American support became essential from which ever angle the situation was viewed but, because of attitudes already noted, a case for support against Hitler had to relate directly to American interests or to threats to those interests and not, solely anyway, to the fate of Europe's Jews.

At the same time that that debate was raging in the United States, Britain and France increased their efforts to suppress Arab agitation in Palestine and the Lebanon. As a result, early in October the Mufti, believing that the British and French authorities were planning his arrest, fled to Baghdad where the Iraqi government gave him honorific status as a minister and he was accepted as a key adviser on foreign policy.

So: back to Hitler. While the German Catholic press continued with its incredible defence of him and his conquest of Poland, he began to systematically eliminate the country's intelligentsia, including the church hierarchy, so that its capacity to rise and claim independence yet again and to provide a strategic buffer between Russia and the West would be crushed. The political murder rate increased sharply from the beginning of October. The Vatican, apart from a few press reports of German atrocities, sat on the fence.²⁷³ Continuing indecision in the West enabled Hitler to keep the initiative and on October 6 he made public his latest time-buying "peace proposal."

Hitler told the Reichstag that he had no further claims against France; that he wanted to bury forever the ancient enmity between them; that he had devoted much effort to developing Anglo-German understanding; and that "there can only be real peace in Europe and throughout the world if Germany and England come to an understanding." He also said that "Poland of the Versailles Treaty will never rise again," that the question of the re-establishment of a Polish state was not one to be solved by war in the west, and that it was exclusively a matter for Germany and Russia. Then he listed the problems to be resolved. These included the formation of a Polish State; the solution and settlement of the Jewish problem; colonies for Germany; revival of international trade; a peace guaranteed unconditionally with reduced armaments and controls on the use of aerial warfare, poison gas and submarines; and Europe's minority problems. And finally he proposed a conference of Europe's leading nations to determine the fate of the Continent for many years to come, before the vigour of nations is sapped on the battlefields, warning that the rejection of his outstretched hand would result in another war from which the outcome would not be “another November 1918.”²⁷⁴

The British Government’s response was drafted on October 9 and referred to Commonwealth Prime Ministers for their urgent comments. Hitler did a bit of drafting that day, too. Without waiting for Chamberlain’s reply to his peace offer, he issued Directive No. 6 for his other ‘peace plan’ – the conduct of the war in the west – and briefed his staff for an invasion through Luxembourg, Belgium and Holland. He briefed his military chiefs next day, October 10, to prepare for an invasion on a date to be announced. Their general reaction was that Germany was not ready. It did not have the resources to replenish and build its naval and military strength to the required level, they told Hitler. Some of them believed that the French and British together could mount a counterattack which would be catastrophic for Germany, and the American question had not yet been resolved. Although public opinion now favoured him, the Roosevelt administration was still sitting on the fence ... and Hitler was determined. His determination, which some of his subordinates saw as irrational, coupled with their resistance to his dictatorship, his style, his social and racial policies, and his invasion plan to draw together a group of senior officers who were at Hitler’s briefing. They became probably the first organized ‘resistance group’ to plan for his overthrow or assassination.

That night rumours were spread in Berlin that Chamberlain had resigned and early next morning a broadcast on the Berlin radio wavelength announced that his government had fallen and that an armistice would be signed immediately. Even though it was soon proved to be false, it had done the trick. Public jubilation was near riotous and Hitler’s prestige, somewhat battered because of a generally adverse world reaction to his invasion of Poland, recovered accordingly. As far as the troops were concerned it would be a simple matter to open up a bit of breathing space to Germany’s west if Hitler had frightened Britain out of the war. The conspirators’ task was made more difficult.

Next day, October 11, Halifax received advice from Craigie that the work which the Foreign Office had done on a Sino-Japanese peace deal based on the prospects of talks between the Japanese prime minister and Chiang Kai-Shek were no longer relevant. The Japanese Foreign Minister was totally opposed to any talks with Chiang Kai-Shek and he had not been consulted before the proposal was put to Craigie.²⁷⁵ Those with vested interests in China could heave a (short) sigh of relief while the Chiefs of Staff took a look at the new scenario.

TIME TO TALK BOMBS

Such was the state of play around the world when Alexander Sachs decided the time was opportune to talk atomic weapons and took Albert Einstein’s letter to President Roosevelt that day. It can be assumed that in the circumstances Roosevelt, together with the Commonwealth prime ministers, had already sighted the draft of the British government’s reply to Hitler’s peace proposal, that he knew that when it was released next day the circumstances of the war would change dramatically, and that he knew also that there was no prospect of Sino-Japanese peace talks. He would have known very well that it was only a matter of time before the United States would be involved directly as an ally of Britain and therefore as a formal opponent of Germany. But in his efforts to have his policy of opposition to Hitler accepted, Roosevelt was still struggling against a tide of isolationism which was running strongly in the United States and not everyone around him was swimming with him against the tide, or for the same reasons.

The ethnic mix in the US had become more complex since the Great War in spite of efforts to keep it "pure" by the racially discriminatory migration laws which Hitler had taken good note of, and many Americans believed that for their country to remain aloof from Europe's troubles was the only way for it to avoid destructive internal conflict. There was a similar eagerness to avoid conflict through debate about democracy versus Nazism and Fascism. And then there was the Jewish question. Most Christians were not eager to think through it and they were quite happy to let Hitler work it out with Britain and the Arabs. But, in addition, there was the question of trade. While it dominated the attitudes of corporate America and its conservative politicians, it did not dominate the media message. It came in two parts. One was the general policy issue. The other was a series of specific issues which brought some powerful corporate interests together.

Economic planning had been a burning issue right through the 1930's. The factors which had triggered the Depression were such that the US had sunk into a deeper trough than the rest of the world. It therefore had a longer climb towards recovery and more serious social problems to tackle. But the nature of the totally free enterprise system does not allow for rapid recovery from both economic sickness and social sickness at the same time. They are simply not compatible without a high level of government direction and supervision. In his "New Deal" Roosevelt had put heavy emphasis on social recovery and while this had brought strong support from the lower socio-economic groups, including the major identifiable ethnic groups, and therefore greater community stability than might otherwise have been the case, it slowed down economic recovery. This in turn encouraged major international financiers to invest their capital in those markets which were making a rapid economic-recovery, such as Japan, but which were highly inflationary. Japan had adopted these policies quite deliberately to shake off Western economic domination and to finance military development which was necessary in turn to help shake off Western political domination. Preferential investment abroad naturally slowed economic recovery in the United States relative to other countries still further.

During the 1932 election campaign which brought him to office Roosevelt had spelt out the policies he intended to follow quite clearly. He said:

Our task now is not discovery or exploitation of natural resources, or necessarily producing more goods. It is the soberer, less dramatic business of administering resources and plants already in hand, of seeking to reestablish foreign markets for our surplus production, of meeting the problem of under consumption, of adjusting production to consumption, of distributing wealth and products more equitably, of adapting existing economic organizations to the service of the people. The day of enlightened administration has come.

Later, as a well-established president, he confirmed that his administration would continue the “anticapitalist attitude” which he had been pursuing when he introduced his “Wealth Tax Act” of 1935. “Our revenue laws have operated in many ways to the unfair advantage of the few, and they have done little to prevent an unjust concentration of wealth and economic power,” he said. That act increased surtaxes to 73 percent of individual incomes over one million dollars; increased corporation tax to fifteen percent in certain cases; increased excess profits taxes; increased gift and inheritance taxes; and introduced both a capital stock tax and taxes on undistributed corporate profits.²⁷⁶ It had introduced new strategies in economic planning, ushered in a new phase in government economic supervision, and introduced new elements into the relationships between governments of democracies and their private financial and industrial institutions.

Together with the revival of large scale antitrust suits and the obtaining of consent decrees, the punitive attacks on American capitalism of the “New Deal” and Roosevelt’s statements had generated a climate of hostility and mistrust. The era when the wishes of the financial power brokers, quietly discussed behind closed doors, were more or less automatically translated into policies for which the government would provide some public justification, had passed. Henceforward the power brokers and not the governments would have to satisfy the public about the validity of economic policies. Because that change coincided with rapid improvements in the general level of education, rapid growth in mass communications and the consequent development of public awareness, the role and status of community and business leaders and others who sought to manipulate community and government attitudes and decisions also entered a new phase. Official and unofficial lobbyists and public relations people, either employed or retained by common-interest trade groups or by individual corporations were already an established part of the American scene. In response to the prevailing environment they began to appear everywhere like a rash. Very soon there was no area of human decision making which remained free of motivational study and manipulation. The practice which governments had used to conceal the real reasons for many economic, colonial, military and cultural actions – “if the real reason isn’t acceptable tell them one that is” – rapidly became common to every aspect of life. The sectional and self interest of those who had gained most from the development of the American Protestant Work Ethic was being defended and consolidated by means of concepts and institutions developed under the umbrella of that ethic.^{277 278 279}

With Europe plunging towards war and each country scrambling for the available international investment capital for armaments manufacture it became apparent to influential economists in the United States that its recovery was not possible until investment was restored. But investment would not be restored while Roosevelt’s domestic policies kept profitability so low compared with that in the warring countries which were competing for capital; while low cash flow due to low US employment levels kept stock levels high and current capital underutilized, and while foreign trade remained depressed.²⁸⁰ Thus, whether in response to the current facts of life and investor pressure or in response to Roosevelt’s philosophy, export trade had to be boosted by positive decisions whenever possible. While it remained neutral it could capitalize on growing demand from each of the belligerents, especially in oil, agricultural products and military supplies. But immediately it became aligned with either Hitler or his opponents it had to put its money where its mouth was and cease trading with the block to which it was opposed. Import opportunities would be affected in the same way as exports. The business and finance lobbies, with a few exceptions based on the deeper issues of philosophy and human rights, pressed hard for unrestricted trade or, for public grandstanding, a policy of isolation from Europe's "internal" conflicts.

The most important specific case was that of the oil industry. The major oil companies, (notably the Standard group), had established subsidiaries in each of the warring countries and they were supplying twenty percent of the rest of the world's requirements from United States oil fields.²⁸¹ In addition they also controlled a significant proportion of current production from other countries, (notably in Latin America), their Saudi Arabian concessions had just come into production and they had gained additional concessions in the Middle East as well. The United States had not only developed the capacity to utilize oil at a greater rate than the rest of the world. It had also tightened the grip on world supplies which it had used so devastatingly in the Great War.

Although the US was totally self-sufficient the signs of its oil-dependence, which has since become critical, were already beginning to show. If the US aligned itself in the European war the first consequence would be loss of trade either by its own decision or by a maritime blockade of one belligerent group against the other. Depending on how the conflict ran, it may find itself linked into arguments about Middle East concessions as a spin-off from the row over Zionism and Palestine in the same way as Britain. If it entered the war on one side or the other its own oil supplies were more than adequate to fight a war and it could significantly affect supplies to those powers against which it fought. However it would certainly become embroiled in the politics of the Middle East and it had to be prepared to take military action to occupy the region in order to secure its concessions as well as political action. Naturally the oil companies pressed for military isolationism but they also pressed for political action to secure their concessions.

However the US administration was also in a bind over the petrochemicals industry. A legal and political battle which began in 1938 was gradually hotting up over links between US and German companies which greatly increased Hitler's capacity to wage war. It was not finally resolved until just prior to America's formal entry into the war.

In 1938 I.G. Farben, acting for the German government as Hitler accelerated industrial preparations for war, obtained tetraethyl lead, a key fuel additive, from the Ethyl Export Corporation which was jointly owned by Standard Oil of New Jersey and General Motors.^{282 283} As part of a deal it also received important scientific information from the Ethyl Gasoline Corporation, including the process for producing the additive. A plant jointly owned by I. G. Farben, Standard Oil of New Jersey and General Motors was then built in Germany to produce it. About the same time, I. G. Farben had developed a patented process for producing synthetic rubber from petroleum and negotiations had also involved arrangements for Standard Oil of New Jersey to produce that under licence. However, with war imminent, and on instructions from the German government, I. G. Farben withheld licence authority and technical information under patent from its US partner. Legal proceedings and negotiations were still in progress when war was declared between Britain and Germany. When Alexander Sachs called on Roosevelt the issue was still unresolved with I. G. Farben being pressed to grant the licence and to release the information. America's neutrality was an important factor in those discussions. Standard was in turn trying to withhold related licences from its American competitors – and the US Navy – although it was still releasing information on its rubber research to I. G. Farben and exploring plans for a closer relationship, or even a merger, with a Japanese firm, Mitsui.²⁸⁴

The companies involved in this and similar situations were clearly in a position to add a lot of muscle to the campaign for American isolationism. However American isolationism equally clearly favoured Hitler and the countries collaborating with him and therefore, by changing the balance of power around the world, it was an indirect threat to the interests of the United States itself, especially if Britain were to be forced to negotiate a settlement with Germany. Both Germany and Russia would be free to rearrange alliances and concessions in the Middle East; both Russia and Japan would be free to do likewise in the Far East; the United States would be isolated in a very real sense, and at the same time it would be the only power to which the Jewish community could turn for relief from Hitler and for support in its struggle for Palestine as a national home.

Like Britain, the United States was fast running out of options. Logic and simple humanitarian values should have led the president and his administration into political intervention which would have stopped Hitler in his tracks at that stage without the need for military intervention. They didn't even have to feel comfortable with the concept of the United States being "the New Israel," established – according to its own political philosophers – to lead the world along the path of the Christian Gospel. The concept had been flaunted as the basis of American existence from its very earliest days and in every significant political development since. It would be dragged out again in due course when circumstances finally forced them to make a decision. In the mean time the commercial and ethnic conflicts of interest which had developed within the great amorphous gel forced them to procrastinate and led them to assist Hitler to strengthen his position. They also made it necessary for the government to grab every possible initiative to strengthen the capacity of the United States to protect its own legitimate interests, to maintain its position of privilege in relation to many other countries, and to enable it to fill the imperial vacuums which would be left as European powers were forced to vacate "possessions" in Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Middle East.

So when Roosevelt and Sachs sat down to talk on October 11, 1939, Sachs outlined the state of nuclear physics in the United States, Britain and Germany as he expanded on the points Einstein had made in his letter. The main thrust of the message, that he who first delivered an atomic bomb would win any war while his opponents had only conventional explosives, was clear and unmistakable. But what followed from that was equally clear to Roosevelt. If one country gained nuclear capacity before all others its bargaining power – or coercion power – would be unassailable. Trade and territorial treaties would be determined almost at its whim and in confrontations over issues of political philosophy, such as Capitalism versus Communism, the initiative would be firmly in its hands, irrespective of the state of Europe after its war. If any moral justification was needed to back up the exercise the pope had already provided it in Divini Redemptoris. And as a little extra there was the potential for power generation and other peaceful industrial uses, (the technology for which would be largely a spin-off from the development of weapons), which would be of enormous benefit for mankind by enabling the gap between developed and underdeveloped nations to be bridged by limitless supplies of cheap energy.

It is not clear whether Sachs discussed with Roosevelt the real motive behind the approach to him – the need for a sledge hammer blow to stop Hitler before he implemented his final solution. However it would hardly have been necessary because the president had been kept very well informed on that issue. In addition the Jewish community was concerned about the backlash which increased every time it was seen to be pushing a preferential line. The Zionist organizations were therefore carefully tailoring their new initiatives to the total refugee problem on the basis that the only way to solve the Jewish problem was to solve the entire refugee problem by eliminating Hitler and Nazism.

Similarly it is not clear to what extent the two men discussed the possibility that German scientists might be working towards, or discussing the feasibility of the rapid development of nuclear weapons. It can be assumed that they were both conscious that there was likely to be parallel development taking place – competition – and that it could well be a case of ‘winner takes all’. However, given the great difficulty of communicating across the wartime barriers, it is unlikely that they knew that sixteen days earlier, on September 25, a group of German physicists had informed the military authorities at a meeting in Berlin of the possibility of using nuclear fission to produce a bomb of massive destructive power.²⁸⁵ However, having heard Sachs’ case Roosevelt called his secretary, General Edwin Watson, with the historic comment “Pa! This requires action.” Immediate steps were taken to establish the President’s Advisory Committee on Uranium.

BRITAIN’S DECISION FOR FULL SCALE WAR

Next day, October 12, as pre-arranged, Chamberlain announced Britain’s response to Hitler’s proposals for peace in an address to the Commons. He formally rejected both Hitler’s proposal for a peace conference in the terms of his Reichstag speech and his offer of peace in return for a free hand in Poland which Dahlerus had taken to London on September 28. Chamberlain said that the promises of the present German government could not be relied upon; if Hitler wanted peace he should show it by actions, not only words; that his vague and uncertain proposals contained no suggestions to right the wrongs done to Czechoslovakia and Poland; and he asked for convincing proof from Hitler that he really wanted peace.²⁸⁶

The die was cast. There appeared to be no backing down by either side. An official German announcement on October 13 noted that by turning down the Fuhrer's peace offer Chamberlain had deliberately chosen war.²⁸⁷

The plot was about to be acted out. Gog and Magog had gone to their war. The Jewish question, or more correctly the trouble in the triangle, was at the heart of the smouldering crises out of which it grew. There had to be a final solution to it. The church had failed to find it, but Adolph Hitler was convinced that he had the answer and he was determined to put it into effect. But not everyone around the triangle would accept Hitler's solution, especially the Jewish community. With its recollections of Hadrian and Julius Severus, Peter the Hermit, Pope Urban II and the First Crusade, Aquinas, Pope Gregory IX and the Inquisition; Pascal, Ivan the Terrible, the Knights of Malta and their slave camps, the Venetian ghetto and its successors; and of course with its immediate memories of Bismarck, Alexander and Louis Dreyfus, it was just as determined that Hitler's "final solution" would not be put into effect.

So the escalation of the war could not be avoided and inevitably its scale, conduct and outcome would be greatly influenced by the trouble in the triangle. But no one wanted to talk about it. Least of all the church-at-large which had failed to understand the challenge of Mein Kampf just as it had failed to recognize the challenge of the Balfour Declaration and all the other challenges. Hitler was already starting to clear the decks for action. He wanted no trash in the way which would inhibit the efficiency of the nation's war effort or divert funds from the national defence budget. In mid October, he ordered that all "incurable patients" were to be disposed of in a program of organized euthanasia.

While Hitler was organizing his 'razor gang' to cut all unnecessary expense and having some difficulty securing resource supplies, Britain was having difficulty financing its war and faced strong opposition to the provision of credit in the US Congress. Similarly, in spite of its pact of convenience with Hitler, Russia could not afford to be isolated from warm water ports on the Baltic either by Germany moving north or by Britain occupying Scandinavia. Therefore after a pause while each party assessed its position, the action began to quicken. Russia made the first move. In mid-October it signed pacts of mutual assistance with two of its three small Baltic neighbors, Estonia and Latvia, and by the end of October Soviet air and ground forces were garrisoned in those countries, by agreement. Lithuania had also been garrisoned – without consent – as part of the German-Soviet Border and Friendship Treaty which had been signed at the end of September. Russia now had alternative warm water access, provided the passages from the North Sea to the Baltic through Scandinavia could be kept open.

Then Britain's strategic outlook changed dramatically on October 20, only a week after the government had rejected Hitler's peace conference proposal, and while the Anglo-Japanese talks were stalled. Craigie advised London that Germany was seeking supplies of Manchurian soya beans via the Trans-Siberian Railway through Soviet Russia. This, he said, raised the prospect of other supplies being transported to Germany by the same route, and demonstrated the need for a broad trade agreement with Japan. The agreement should be negotiated in such a way that it did not prevent the stabilization of Anglo-Japanese relations. The basis should be that Japan would undertake not to export produce from Japan, Manchuria or China to enemies of Britain, and that it would prevent transit of produce from third countries to those enemies through its territory or on its vessels.²⁸⁸

Britain had been caught flat footed. Hitler had given the matter of vital supplies more thought than the Allies gave him credit for. As noted above, when he briefed his commanders on the imminent signing of the German-Soviet agreement on August 22, he told them Germany need not be afraid of a blockade. "The East will supply us with grain, cattle, coal, lead and zinc," he said. When the MEW realized that they were confronted with the start of a German scheme to circumvent Britain's blockade and to obtain rubber, nickel and tin from the Dutch East Indies, wolfram and antimony from China, copper from the United States and Japan, and vegetable oils from Manchukuo, it was galvanized into action. There were two options. The first was the imposition of a full naval blockade. That was totally out of the question. The protracted debates over division of the fleet to increase protection for its immediate interests in the Far East – and the Admiralty's blunt advice – had proven that. It did not even have the naval capacity to properly secure the regions which were of vital importance. If such a blockade was to be imposed it had to be in collaboration with all of its Allies. France? Strategically impossible. The United States? Politically impossible. The second option was to negotiate an agreement such as Craigie proposed.

After the few days which it took it to recover from the shock of Craigie's report the MEW promptly offered complete cooperation with the Foreign Office to get an appropriate agreement in place. But Treasury and the Board of Trade now realized that it meant complications for the currency markets. Sterling would fall in value against the US dollar and this would reduce Britain's capacity to buy war materials from the US even further.²⁸⁹ The ministries which had previously opposed Foreign Office proposals for sanctions because they would further antagonize Japan now wanted action which carried greater hazards. They wanted the trade agreement plan abandoned, and the blockade of Germany extended to include the seizure of German exports to cut its foreign exchange earnings and its ability to purchase imports. These would be justified as being retaliation for Germany's indiscriminate use of mines off Britain, and they played down the impact which these moves would have on relations with Germany's trading partners, including both Japan and the United States²⁹⁰ where some people were opposed to sanctions simply because it cut them out of the lucrative German market, and others had their minds on matters other than sanctions. These concerns were all complicated further by reports towards the end of October of a Russian troop buildup in the Chinese province of Singkiang which had been under Russian influence for some years. Whitehall was uncertain whether this indicated that the Soviet Union, with security assured on its western flank through its arrangements with Germany, was making a bid to prevent an expansion of Japanese influence, or whether there was an agreement between the Soviets and Japan to partition China.

On that western flank of Russia the Nazis were already planning how they would take advantage of the secret protocol to the agreement for the partition of Poland. On October 23 the director of the Reich Interior Ministry briefed the directors of other ministries on the Fuhrer's instructions regarding the treatment of Poles in both the annexed region and the Generalgouvernement when Hans Frank's civil administration replaced the military administration on October 26. On that day Frank promised the Poles in the Generalgouvernement, in which there were 1.5 million Jews making up 12 per cent of the population, that under a just rule everyone would earn his bread by work. There would be no room for political agitators, shady dealers and Jewish exploiters. Hard labour was being imposed on the Jews forthwith and, for that purpose, they would be concentrated in special battalions.²⁹¹ He had previously said: "Poland shall be treated like a colony. The Poles will become the slaves of the Greater German Empire."²⁹² On Himmler's orders resettlement was due to begin at the end of October.

Meanwhile, across the Atlantic in the 'New Israel', unknown even to the British, the President's very secret Advisory Committee on Uranium had met for the first time on October 21. It involved the three Hungarian refugees who had approached Einstein, (Szilard, Wigner and Teller), together with Sachs and a number of additional government nominees. The nuclear arms race was under way. At first the United States had the track to itself but only a few months later Britain lodged its entry, the MAUD Committee. This was established in response to a submission by two other Jewish emigrant physicists who had been repulsed by Hitler's Europe, Otto Frisch and Rudolph Peierls. Under the guidance of the head of Britain's Air Ministry Committee, Sir Henry Tizard, the MAUD Committee was soon coordinating work on atomic weapons development at several British universities and in major industries. Britain's basic motive for embarking on nuclear arms development was somewhat less complicated than that of the United States. Survival. In the unfolding circumstances it was perfectly clear that, unless it could entice the United States into the war as a full participant it was headed for defeat of disastrous proportions and the total disintegration of its empire.

Subsequently, after the United States entered the war, the development programs of the two countries were integrated and the big event reverted to a one-horse-race. In fact in May 1942 it became a case of 'no contest'. Unknown to the Allies, Hitler's Minister of War Production, Albert Speer, ordered that no further work should be done on atomic weapon development. It was then Hitler's wish that all available funds should be held for projects which could be completed to war production stage within six months.²⁹³ It is yet another aspect of the trouble in the triangle that the papacy and Hitler had unwittingly cooperated to thrust the initiative in nuclear weapons development firmly into the hands of a country which was, at the time, a non-belligerent. America. The papacy's contribution was its effort (which Kaiser Wilhelm had most firmly rejected) to suppress scientific research. Hitler's contribution was the reduction of Germany's corps of brilliant nuclear physicists to the status of highly antagonistic refugees.

But at that stage, the 'New Israel', from which Hitler had learned about legal euthanasia, was sitting on the fence with immense authority and influence and with links into each segment of the triangle such that it could call a halt to the whole exercise if it had the will. However its leaders were unable to exercise decisive leadership. They were lost in a maze of conflicting sectional interests involving commercial intrigue and political manipulation on a grand scale. They were leading a nation which saw itself as the successor to Europe's decaying Christian imperial powers and therefore entitled to the privileges of world commercial and political superiority. In short their nation was no different to any other segment of the amorphous Christian gel. It remained neutral, taking commercial and political advantage of everyone else's trouble, trading with all the belligerents, and pushing ahead with the development of the Atom Bomb to ensure that – irrespective of how long the war continued and whether it became involved or not – it could sit astride the world's political and commercial dung hill when 'peace' was restored. However the demands of self interest were too great and the "New Israel" was about to topple – perhaps it had already toppled – from its neutral perch to fall into the camp of Gog. Or was it Magog? Very soon the issue would be brought to a head.

However many Jewish community leaders in the 'New Israel', and those in the film industry in particular, were using all the influence they could to persuade their fellow Americans that it was time to throw in their lot with Britain against Hitler's Germany. This antagonized many people, especially the conservative business end of the political spectrum, and contributed to sharply increased anti-Semitic hostility and isolationism since the outbreak of war. Ambassador Kennedy even quoted Chamberlain as saying that the "Americans and the world Jews had forced him into the war."²⁹⁴ Hitler agreed with him and blamed growing American hostility on the Jewish-controlled press and the Jews around President "Rosenfeld."²⁹⁵ At least he couldn't blame the Vatican which had been secretly exerting pressure on the Polish government, through Cardinal Hlond, to negotiate with Hitler.²⁹⁶

So almost no one wanted to talk in public about the trouble in the triangle. They were content to abuse 'the Jews'. Members of the Jewish community were certainly talking about it a lot in private and with carefully chosen politicians, but generally they were avoiding it from a very natural fear that to talk about it would intensify the anti-Semitism in which they were engulfed. Few Christians understood it or cared to talk about it except within the confines of their bigotted preconceptions. People of the non-messianic faiths were greatly disadvantaged by it, and very angry, seeing it as a burdensome peculiarity of European intrigue. Among the few who did want to talk about it were Muslim theologians and Arab leaders such as the Grand Mufti whose views of the triangle, of Palestine and of Jerusalem were quite different to those of the two older and more influential partners in the triangle. However their voices couldn't be heard. They were swamped by the shouting match around them. They were pawns in the power game, they were a serious impediment to Britain's plans and no one wanted to take their theology seriously. If they did they would have to recognize that man Muhammad as a divinely inspired prophet and if they did that, where would it end?

However there was actually one prominent person who wanted to talk about the trouble in the triangle. He didn't call it that because he wasn't prepared to recognize that there was a triangle. He was trying to suppress the concept, but he had finally decided to break his silence and he insisted on having his say on interfaith affairs. It was Pope Pius XII. On October 28, 1939, the world was favoured with the first encyclical of his reign. Summi Pontificatus.

CHAPTER 23

A PAUSE TO REGROUP ... OR CAUSE FOR REFLECTION?

Fourteen years after volume one of the parody of the amorphous Christian gel of Western society, Mein Kampf, was published there was no sign of a basic change in the attitudes of the great European Christian powers. They still saw it as their right to subjugate other people and then to trade colonies or territories, complete with their people and resources, to protect their own interests. Their attitudes, being a consequence of their theology and their belief that the rest of the world existed for the benefit of Christian Europe, differed in that fundamental emphasis from the attitudes of other powers which sought territorial expansion either for living and productive space to cater for population growth, for additional resources or, in earlier eras, for wealth from tribute. Self determination was a concept of convenience which was trotted out to justify a European political or commercial position when ethnic community interest in a separate national identity happened to coincide with an economic or political interest which might otherwise be an embarrassment. That was so in the case of Munich.

The conspiracy of silence on Britain's dire predicament because of her conflict of interests in the Middle East and the manipulation of the question of ethnic language and identity in Czechoslovakia were such that the British public could not see the Munich Agreement as a surrender to force. Neither could they see it as a consequence of Western Christian Imperial self-understanding and conduct in which their country had been a key player for a very long time. It was presented as "a triumph of morality."¹ It has been described as "a triumph for all that was best and most enlightened in British life and for those who preached equal justice," and it has been justified as redressing the offence caused by the World War I settlement at Versailles under which three million Germans were subjected to Czech rule and not "merely a triumph for selfish or cynical British statesmen."² Several members of the Commons as well as the Lords, and even the head of the Foreign Office, Sir Alexander Cadogan, said the public would support the government's decisions if it had a moral position to justify it.³

In fact Great Britain was labouring to keep its grip on its empire. But at the same time the United States was providing a new twist to the old story as it moved to further undermine Britain's imperial position and prepared to build atomic bombs as an aid to achieving a position of world political and economic dominance for itself without colonial style possessions and territorial occupation. And politicking was continuing in Britain, the United States, France, Italy and Soviet Russia to determine whether the Jewish community could be sold down the drain or whether the phoney war would develop into the real thing in order to prevent Hitler from implementing his 'final solution' to the Jewish question. Unfortunately there were very few signs to suggest that either the Christian Churches or their amorphous gel had recognized themselves in Mein Kampf.

Yes. There were a few. The most prominent was the Barmen Confession and the related Declarations issued in May 1934 around which one section of the German Resistance later developed. That Declaration was subsequently adopted by several churches in Germany as a basis for their postwar renewal and it has been described as the most significant Church document since the Reformation Confessions and Catechism.⁴ If it is considered in isolation and as a positive and constructive attempt to redirect the theology and the life of a group of churches at a critical time in history, then such a description may be valid. However there is no isolation and, unfortunately, some of the negative and inhibiting documents discussed in earlier sections greatly outrank it in significance because they contributed to the development of the situation in which Mein Kampf could be written and in which positive responses had to be made. In addition, the church constitution which Hitler approved in 1931 had not been drawn up solely to relate the church to Mein Kampf but in part as a reaction against the challenge of Karl Barth's earlier writings. Subsequently Karl Barth had also drafted the Barmen Confession. This means that each of the Reich church's constitution, the deluded and contemptible Guiding Principles of the Faith Movement of German Christians which were derived from much the same sources and influences as Mein Kampf, and the Synod of Barmen and its declarations were each related to the twin but diametrically opposed challenges to the church which were posed by both Barth and Hitler.

Then there was the ecumenical movement, spearheaded by the provisional World Council of Churches, but even though its key figures were very determined they faced enormous opposition and difficulties and the movement overall was still somewhat tentative. And although its leaders were acutely aware of events and theological conflicts in Germany the movement cannot be described as a response to Mein Kampf. The establishment of the World Council of Churches and Mein Kampf were, in fact, products of a common environment and their supporters were spurred on by the same trauma – the Great War – but they interpreted the situations in which they found themselves quite differently.

DARKNESS OVER THE EARTH

However, as if to confirm that the Church overall had failed to recognize in Mein Kampf a parody of itself, the new pope, Pius XII, who had been elected to that office six months before the declaration of war in a situation which resembled the distraction of Britain's abdication crisis, issued his eagerly awaited first encyclical letter almost two months after the official declaration of war. Liberally sprinkled with a selection of the long-standing descriptions of both the Roman Catholic Church and its head which demonstrated their self assessment or self misunderstanding, that encyclical, Summi Pontificatus, was dated October 20, 1939, published by L'Osservatore Romano on October 28, and read in congregations on the Feast of Christ the King, October 29 when the whole human race was to be dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus Christ. That was the feast which Pius XI had instituted, against a lot of opposition, to assist proselytizing among Poland's Jews or, in an alternative view, as an exercise in coercion or intimidation soon after Pilsudski's Vatican-supported dictatorship had set out on a campaign of oppression against Orthodox clergy in Ukrainian communities. (chapter 20) It is a pathetic reflection of the Vatican's relationship with the Nazi regime that Summi Pontificatus – known in English as 'Darkness over the Earth' – was issued to be read on that feast day while the Roman Catholic Church was still helping Poles celebrate Hitler's magnificent victory. Even some of its own clergy were being harassed, but while Pius XII was distributing his encyclical, the first Polish ghetto was being established at Piotrkow to house Poland's Jews who were being systematically rounded up as well as those who were being deported from Austria and Czechoslovakia; orders were promulgated for Jews to wear a yellow Star of David; Hitler and Stalin were still negotiating the finer points of administration in the occupied territories; and the Vatican's concordat with Poland was in shreds as a result. But some of Hitler's colleagues were eager to put a stop to all the nonsense by alternative means. They were the group of high-ranking conspirators within the German Military High Command who had dabbled with the idea of a coup against the Fuhrer, or an assassination, and who were confirmed in their intention on October 27, when Hitler confirmed his order to invade the West and fixed the date for the invasion as November 12.

The conspirators probably studied Summi Pontificatus, like Governments of all complexions, for some indication of whether the pope was going to call his troops out either in support of Hitler or against him. Memories of the politicking for Catholic support in the Great War and of the contentious issue of papal claims to temporal authority and the papal states were very fresh, especially in view of the Vatican's support for Franco in Spain and for Irish independence. A repetition of that situation could have been catastrophic indeed. And no one wanted to face the consequences of another papal peace note like that of July 1917.

In fact Pius XII had already tried a similar initiative immediately he was elevated from Secretary of State to Pope. It culminated in his formal call on May 3, 1939, for a five-power conference of France, Italy, Germany, Poland, and Britain. Such a conference could, he said, resolve the differences between Italy and France on one hand and between Germany and Poland on the other.⁵ Hitler said it would serve no useful purpose and it was generally greeted by an embarrassed silence and regarded as either premature or pointless. It is reasonable to assume that the call was essentially that which Pius XII worked on as Secretary of State for Pius XI after his meeting with Chamberlain and Halifax only days before the late pope's death. The simplistic nature of the call, as well intentioned as it was, was reminiscent of the 1917 note and suggested that the pope was not as well informed on the real issues involved in the conflict as the world presumed. It also suggests that he was a victim of the complex conspiracies of silence as well as a participant in them and it certainly confirmed that he did not recognize the parody of Mein Kampf and the nature of the trouble in the triangle.

When the scrutineers could find no such indications of support or opposition – except for the total isolation of Soviet Russia and further encouragement for Hitler to turn against both it and everything Jewish – there was jubilation in each of the five countries named, but certainly no reason for the conspirators to be jubilant. London's Foreign Office expressed its approval. France praised it and used it for propaganda, scattering tens of thousands of copies of it over Germany in the hope of causing an antagonistic response against Hitler, but Hitler was quite happy for Summi Pontificatus to be read in Germany and Poland, although an official interpretation, more complimentary to his stand point was “provided” and this was read in some congregations. In it the name ‘Germany’ was simply substituted for ‘Poland’ in a supportive passage, and Hitler certainly did not regard the encyclical as anti-Nazi or even as critical. Mussolini's Italy allowed the text to be published, and Poland's Cardinal Hlond expressed his gratitude. For practical purposes, (considering the near split between the Vatican and the Third Reich when Pius XI issued Mit Brennender Sorge), the letter could be represented as papal acceptance of, or even support for, Hitler's and Mussolini's actions.⁶ Of course both the Nazi government and the Vatican realized the depth of antagonism between them as a result of continuing property confiscation, imprisonments, executions and the withdrawal of ecclesiastical authority, and they were equally well aware that although each could cause the other a lot of trouble in the event of a break, it was Hitler who held the trump card. The pope could really only play for time and hope to reverse the Nazis' anti-church policies in due course after Hitler was out of the way. And yet this encyclical – his great opportunity to exert pressure on Hitler and to undermine his support – certainly did nothing to remove the Fuhrer from office. ‘Playing for time’ is a very political game, and the fact that governments on both sides of the political argument were prepared to use the encyclical for grossly political purposes leaves no room for doubt that politics was far more important than spiritual considerations in its preparation. This being the case we must look for a common thread in the attitudes of all of the parties, but of the pope and Hitler in particular, which made for such harmony. It was the Jewish question.

A close look at key extracts from *Summi Pontificatus*⁷ and the way in which it was prepared show it to be a mirror of the times and of the pope's response to the situation into which the church and the world had blundered, and a complete reversal of his predecessor's bid to offset racism and anti-Semitism. Pius XII could only see the world situation in terms of political advantage or disadvantage for the Roman Catholic Church which, in his view, was the exclusive representative of the triune God on earth. He would have justified his response on the grounds that the church needed to be politically strong to become numerically strong and to beat off – or to be completely freed from – competition from Jews and Judaism, Marx and Communism, and Reformers and the Ecumenical Movement. In turn its numerical strength was, in his view, the principal measure of its success in bringing mankind to salvation through acceptance of the Catholic Church's exclusive divine sacraments and its priestly temporal authority which was, in his view, delegated directly by Christ. Whichever way we turn we cannot escape the consequences of the church's views of itself and its role as they permeated the political atmosphere throughout the world in 1939.

Work began on the drafting of Summi Pontificatus in July and it was largely the work of Fr. Gundlach⁸ whose contribution to Humani Generis Unitas had overshadowed that of LaFarge, but Pius XII was personally involved in the editing.⁹ It incorporated the central idea of Pius XI's hidden encyclical – the foundations of the unity of humanity – which is easily identified, but there was no explicit reference to racism or anti-Semitism and nothing from LaFarge's contribution to that work is identifiable.¹⁰ In other words it was only those aspects of the project which Pius XI had initiated which were pigeon-holed. Pius XII retained all the Christian triumphalism and questionable theology by means of which anti-Semitic and anti-Communist policies had long been justified.
